

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—BENJAMIN B. MINOR, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. X.

RICHMOND, JANUARY, 1844.

NO. 1.

THE EDITOR TO HIS PATRONS.

Hoping that a "merry Christmas" has gladdened your hearts, leaving them untouched by its frost, we again greet you with "a happy New Year." What matters it that chill Winter has come, binding all Nature in his icy chains, if he touch not with his torpor the generous impulses of noble hearts? Though his blasts howl around us, as now, making us almost idolize "our own fire side," where we so "tranquilly abide," it may still be sunshine and Spring within our minds. Let the frosts of selfishness never freeze the generous current of the soul; but let the genial warmth of kindred spirits, the ardor of chaste Love and the fervor of devoted Friendship keep it limpid, flowing and sparkling forever.

There is a glory and a use in Nature's winter, with all its cold and storm. With what grandeur and splendor the mountain rears its snow-turbaned head! What Beauty sparkles the gem-decked trees! What Joy fills the throng that glide, like spirits in a dream, over the surface of the shining lake! And beneath Winter's chilling robe spring the flowers and the grain. But what glory, what beauty, what good in the blasts of human passion, or the benumbing selfishness of Ignoble Natures!

The monarch of the sunny clime could not be persuaded that Winter ever laid his stiff hand upon the flowing streams and made them bear the tramp of men. If he was as ignorant of the freezing coldness of the heart, what Bliss he knew! May the constant sunshine of Christmas mirth, New Year happiness and every day joy keep you from experiencing it, and make you as incredulous of it as was the Eastern King of the existence of ice.

Another year, with its hopes, its duties and its aims, is opening before us. Different occupations invite the energy of our spirits. Go on with brave hearts and strong hands—the wilderness of Life will fall before you and smiling homes and spreading, teeming fields will reward and bless your efforts.

We approve the custom of the Editor commencing each volume with a little friendly chat with his patrons. He has to thank the firm and steadfast, to incite the faltering, to arouse the supine and invoke anew the aid of all the friends of Literary Enterprise. He has to congratulate his readers upon the delight he has afforded them, to unfold to them his plans, and to commune with them about his prospects—ah! and he has to regret that many are so indifferent to the noble cause, in which he is engaged, as to withdraw, or withhold their encouragement and support. How can any, whose hearts and minds have been visited by the "Day-star" of Knowledge, rest content, whilst any scheme for Intellectual improvement and Literary honor is demanding their support!!

For the ensuing year, our own efforts shall be unremitting and we will receive the constant aid of many of the ablest pens in the Union;—Essayists, Poets, Novelists, Critics and Historians. They have assured us of their good will and some have given solid proof of their intention to sustain us. THEY DEEM IT ESSENTIAL TO THE SOUTH TO HAVE SUCH A WORK AND CRY SHAME UPON HER SONS FOR NOT SPEEDING IT ON WITH MORE GENEROUS AID. Nothing is wanting, in order to sustain, in the heart of the South and with the South in its heart, the best toned, best printed and best filled Magazine in the whole Union, but Patrons; or, to speak more plainly, prompt, paying subscribers.

We foresee that the pretended, or supposed cheapness of lower priced Periodicals will be an obstacle in our way. Common honesty requires that those who do not furnish but three dollars' worth should demand no more. Is it not better, judicious and economical readers, to give a guinea for a guinea than a shilling for a sixpence; or, what is still worse, than imitate the gourmand, who gave his last guinea for an ortolan? Many think, that after their money has been changed into good Messenger paper, they get what is worth a premium. The existence of the Messenger, with its distinctive tone, is and has been worth to the South more thousands than enough to establish it forever. The Messenger can not be too large for a month's reading. By reduction of size and loss of character, it could be brought to the level of three dollar cheapness,—but no true friend can desire to see this done. You may lop the noble oak, until nothing is left but its unsightly trunk, fit only to be burned; or you may cut it down and leave only its misshapen stump; but, in order to enjoy its beauty and shade, you must extend its spreading branches, by watering its roots and fertilizing its soil. Sooner than see the Messenger disparaged and brought down from its present exalted position, we had rather see it fall. Southerners, you can preserve it, as it stands; and who had not rather see the proud monument, reared in honor of some noble achievement, shattered by the lightning, or uprooted by the earthquake, than suffered to moulder and decay, by the neglect of those who should have cherished and perpetuated it.

What are the few thousand patrons of the Messenger to the vast number of those to whose interest, to whose patriotism and appreciation of laudable enterprise it strongly appeals? We can not rest satisfied, nor feel proud of the South until she has sent us TEN THOUSAND subscribers.

We are almost ready to resolve that we will have this number if we have to go through the land, a second Peter the Hermit. Come then, ye sons of the South, who love your own land, and ye sons of the North, who wish a bond of union with your brethren—who wish to reciprocate that generous patronage which your every effort receives from us;—Come and enroll your names in behalf of the Messenger. To you, most generous and steady Patrons, we owe unbounded thanks, and shall strive, unremittingly, to requite you for your favors, by sending you a work worthy of yourselves. To effect this, let none be Patrons in name only—but all in deed and in truth. Let every friend enlist his friends; every gifted pen pour fourth its treasures and all unite to rear a monument of talent worthy of the Fathers we have buried, of the land which they left us, of the privileges we possess and the destiny that awaits us.

At this season of Christmas Gifts and New Year Presents, it may be expected that we should offer you something more substantial than sentiment, or exhortation. Alas! alas!! we have neither "Mysteries of Paris," Newspaper "Annals," nor any other unrivalled "Premiums," to offer you. A cordial greeting and our Messenger's stores—our "heart and lute"—are all we can give you. Oh! ye grown up children, will not these suffice! If not, then sincerely do we hope, that St. Nicholas has well filled your hanging socks with sugar plums and fire-crackers. But ye, whose devotion did not propitiate the bountiful Nicholas, be not disconsolate; for your fond mothers have, or will, no doubt, award you the portion of that "big boy,"

"Little Jack Horner,
Who sat in a corner,
Eating his Christmas pie."

But indeed we are disposed to be liberal—yes we will astonish you by our generosity. Then, "dear friends, sweet friends," if you will only turn over a new leaf with us, what will we not do for you?—Yes, yes, we must be liberal. We will give you free permission to read the Messenger through—and—to pay for it. Nor shall your precious privileges end here; for, in the best faith, we promise to renew this "charter of your Liberties" when, with the blessing of Heaven, we come to celebrate the birth-day of another year. Till then, Joy, Peace and Truth attend your steps.

To think rightly is of Knowledge; to speak fluently is of Nature;
To read with profit is of care; but to write aptly is of practice.
To be accurate, write; to remember, write; to know thine own mind, write.

Tupper.

IPHIGENIA AT TAURIS.

A DRAMATIC POEM.

IN FIVE ACTS.

(Translated from the German of Goëthé.)

The Grecian host, destined for the destruction of Troy, was assembled at Aulis. All was now ready and each Grecian bosom burned to avenge the injured Helen. There lay the ships freighted with heroes and all the munitions of war; but in vain they waited for propitious winds: Agamemnon, "King of Men," the commander of this mighty host, had killed the favorite stag of Diana, and the Goddess, in displeasure, allowed "not one favoring breeze to swell his flagging sails."

Calchas "disclosed the fates" and demanded the costly sacrifice of Iphigenia, Agamemnon's cherished daughter, to appease "the Queen dispensing light." The father's love hardly yields to the Greek's devotion; but the wily Ulysses is sent to lure the dedicated victim and her mother to the camp, under the pretence of marrying Iphigenia to the Great Achilles. The hour arrives, the Altar is prepared and the victim, now willing, is ready to die; but Diana ransoms the maiden, and enshrouding her in a cloud, bears her away to Tauris, in the present Crimea, and makes her priestess of her Temple there. What happened there the play will best unfold.

Euripides, in his works, has celebrated Iphigenia both at Aulis and at Tauris. The German poet has represented some incidents differently from him. The name of the author of the following translation would give it weight; but we must confine ourselves to saying, that it has been highly approved by a German scholar and by an excellent judge of its English Dress.—Ed. Mess.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

IPHIGENIA, Priestess of the Temple of Diana at Tauris and Daughter of Agamemnon.

THOAS, King of Tauris.

ARCAS, his Minister.

ORRESTES, Brother of Iphigenia.

PYLADES, his friend.

SCENE.—The grove before Diana's Temple.

ACT I.—SCENE I.

Iphigenia alone.

Through your deep shades, ye high and waving summits,
Of this old consecrated leafy grove,
As in Diana's silent sanctuary,
I move, e'en now, with shuddering emotion,
As if I pe'er before had trod your mazes;
Nor does my soul yet find itself at home.
So many years have I been here concealed
By that high will, to which I meekly bow;
And yet, as at the first, I am a stranger.
For ah! From all I love the sea divides me.
And, standing on the shore the five long day,
My yearning spirit, o'er the watery waste,
Stretches herself to seek the shores of Greece;
While to my sighs the roaring waves give back
Their mullen, hoarse, unsympathizing voice.
Wo to the wretch, who, far from home and kindred,
Must mourn in solitude life's dearest joys
Dashed from his lip. His thronging thoughts still roam
Back to his Father's halls, back to the scenes,
Where first the fair Sun to his eye disclosed
The face of Heaven; where the sports of childhood,
Strengthening the ties of blood, still closer drew

The silken bands that heart to heart unite.
 I do not quarrel with the Gods. But ah!
 The lot of Woman is indeed most sad.
 In Peace man governs, and in War commands;
 In stranger lands, his hand still guards his head.
 Possession gladdens him, and Victory crowns;
 And glorious Death ends all. But fate binds Woman
 To make obedience to a Tyrant Husband
 Her duty and her only consolation.
 And oh! How wretched should a hostile fate
 To strangers in strange lands consign her. Here, Thus noble Thoas keeps me. Solemn—holy
 The bond that binds me; yet am I a slave,
 And blush to own with what reluctant service
 I wait on thee, oh Goddess! thee to whom
 I owe my life; to whom that life should be,
 With free unforced devotion dedicated.
 Yet have I trusted, and I still do trust
 In thee, Diana, who, in thy soft arms,
 And to thy holy bosom didst embrace
 The disowned daughter of the King of men.
 Daughter of Jove, if thou the illustrious man
 By thee afflicted for his victim child,
 If thou the God-like Agamemnon, who
 The darling of his heart brought to thine altar,
 Hast led in glory from Troy's prostrate walls
 Back to his fatherland; his treasures there,
 Wife—son—and daughter, all preserved by thee,
 Oh! give me too at last to those I love;
 Me, whom from Death already thou hast saved,
 Save from the living Death I suffer here.

SCENE 2.

Iphigenia. Arcas.

Arcas. Greeting and hail to great Diana's Priestess
 The King by me hath sent. Tauris to-day
 For new and wondrous victories gives thanks
 To her protecting Goddess; and the King,
 Followed by his triumphant host, approaches.

Iphigenia. We are prepared to give them fit reception;
 And great Diana now the welcome offering
 From Thoas' hand, with gracious smile, expects.

Arcas. And thine, much-honored Priestess! Were thy smile,

Oh! holy virgin, also clear and bright,
 How happy were the omen. Secret grief
 Still preys upon thy heart; and still in vain
 For years we've listened for one trustful word.
 That self-same look, I still, with shuddering awe,
 Have seen, since first I saw thee in this place,
 And still, as if forged down with iron bands,
 Deep in thy inmost breast, thy soul remains.

Iphigenia. As best becomes the Exile and the Orphan.

Arcas. Art thou an Exile and an Orphan here?

Iphigenia. Can a strange shore become our Fatherland?

Arcas. But now to thee thy Fatherland is foreign.

Iphigenia. Ah true! Most true! And hence my heart still bleeds.

In Life's first dawn, while yet the unpractised heart
 Is hardly conscious of the tie that binds
 To Father, Mother, Kindred; while the scions,
 That cluster round the root of the old stem,
 First Heaven-ward begin to strive; Oh! then
 A curse seized on me, and, with iron grasp,
 Sundering that tie, bore me from all I loved.
 Then perished Youth's best joys; then withering shrunk
 The bud of promise. Rescued from the grave,
 What am I, but a shadow to myself,
 Wherein no flush of joy again can bloom.

Arcas. Still so unhappy! Pardon my presumption!
 Is it not rather that thou art ungrateful?

Iphigenia. Thanks you have always.

Arcas. Aye, but not the thanks
 That recompense the benefit; the look
 That speaks a heart content in grateful love.
 When, many years ago, mysterious fate
 Placed thee a Priestess in this holy fane,
 Thoas received thee, as a gift from Heaven,
 With reverence and love. To thee this shore
 Gave kindly welcome, tho' to all beside
 So full of horror. For what stranger else
 Had entered our realm, who did not bleed
 At Dian's altar, a devoted victim
 According to time-consecrated custom.

Iphigenia. Breath is not life; and what a life is this,
 Chained to this holy spot, as if a ghost
 Were doomed around its grave ever to wander.
 Is this a life conscious of life and joy,
 Whose every hour dreamed fruitlessly away,
 Can but prepare the soul for that grey twilight,
 Which, on the shores of Lethe, the sad host
 Of parted spirits celebrate in draughts
 Of deep oblivion,—even of themselves?
 A useless life is but an early death:
 And such is Woman's fate—such mine.

Arcas. The noble pride that sees not its own merit
 I pardon but lament it; for it robs thee
 Of what thou prizest most, and well hast purchased.
 Thou hast done nothing here, since thine arrival!!!
 Who then has cheered the troubled soul of Thoas?
 Whose gentle influence has, from year to year,
 The old and barbarous custom held in check,
 Which cruelly fore-doomed the hapless stranger
 To bleed a victim on Diana's altar,
 And often has sent back from certain death
 The ransomed captives to their native land?
 Whose winning prayer has soothed the injured Goddess,
 That she, without displeasure, sees her Temple
 Robbed of its victims, and still leads us on
 To victory and triumph? Who but thou
 Has softened the stern spirit of the King,
 Who, wise and brave, our councils and our arms
 Directs, that lightly sits the yoke of duty,
 While he, rejoicing in thy presence, takes
 The infection of thy mildness? Is this nothing?
 This to be useless? When thy very being Sheds balm on thousands? When the Gods have made thee

A source of comfort to the happy people
 To whom they kindly gave thee, and a refuge
 To the lone stranger on this deadly shore,
 Where, but for thee, his doom were sealed.

Iphigenia. What's done
 Dwindles to nothing, in the eye that looks Forward, and sees how much is left to do.

Arcas. But is it just to undervalue merit,
 Though in ourselves?

Iphigenia. 'Twere surely better so
 Than rate ourselves too highly.

Arcas. Both are wrong;
 The Proud, who scorns applause when justly due:
 The Vain, greedy of praise, who asks too much.
 Believe and listen to the words of one
 Sincerely—faithfully devoted to thee.
 Should the King speak with thee to-day, take kindly
 What he intends to say.

Iphigenia. Your words tho' kind Distress me: Often and with pain have I Evaded his proposal.

Arcas. Yet bethink thee
Of what thou dost, and what is best for thee.
Since his Son's death, the King no longer trusts
His followers as before. None—absolutely
Few he trusts at all. On every youth
Of noble birth he looks with jealousy,
As the successor to his vacant throne;
While, for himself, lonely and helpless age,
Or rude rebellion and untimely death
Seem to await him. In the arts of speech,
The Scythian takes no pride. He least of all.
Accustomed to command, and prompt to act,
The art, by devious and well-chosen phrase
To steal upon his object, is to him
Unknown. Make not his task more difficult
By coy refusal, or by wilful dulness.
Meet him complacently. Meet his wish half way.
Iphigenia. Must I accelerate what threatens me?
Arcas. Callest thou then his suit a threat?
Iphigenia. Most dreadful.
Arcas. Then for his love at least give confidence.
Iphigenia. Let him first free my soul from fear.
Arcas. But why
Dost thou from him thy origin conceal?
Iphigenia. It is, that secrecy becomes a Priestess.
Arcas. Nothing should be a secret from the King;
And tho' he questions not, he deeply feels,
In his great soul, the studied cold reserve,
In which thou shroudest thyself.
Iphigenia. Does he then cherish
Anger against me?
Arcas. So it almost seems.
He speaks not of thee, but unguarded words,
At random uttered, show his steadfast purpose
To win thee. Do not leave him to himself,
Lest his displeasure change to that, which well
May make thee tremble, and too late remember,
With deep regrets, my faithful counsel.
Iphigenia. What!
Designs he then that which no noble man,
Who honors his own name, and in whose heart
Due reverence of the heavenly beings reigns,
Should ever meditate? Means he by force
To drag me from the altar to his bed?
Then on the Gods I call, and chief on Diana,
Resolved and faithful: She will not deny—
A Goddess to her Priestess—her protection—
A Virgin to a Virgin.
Arcas. Fear not that.
The heart of youthful blood drives not the King
To the audacious violence of Youth.
But—thinking as he does, I much do fear
A sterner purpose, which his thwarted will Most surely will accomplish. Firm he is,
And fixed in his designs. I pray thee then
Be thankful—trustful, if you be no more.
Iphigenia. Tell me what else thou knowest.
Arcas. Learn it from him.
I see him coming. Thou dost honor him.
Obey thy heart, and meet him as a friend.
Give him thy confidence. The noblest men
Most readily submit them to be guided
By a kind word from woman.

[Exit ARCAS.]

Iphigenia. I see not
How I can follow this true friend's advice.
But gladly I obey the voice of duty;
And, for his many favors, to the King
A kind word will I give. Oh! that I could Tell him with truth that which would please him best.

SCENE 3.

Iphigenia. Thoas.

Iphigenia. With royal blessings may the Goddess bless thee!
Victory and Glory, Wealth and Happiness
To thee and thine may she profusely grant,
With the fulfilment of each pious wish,
That, as the multitude o'er whom thy reign
Extends its blessings, be the rich abundance
Of thy rare happiness.

Thoas. Enough for me
My People's praises. All that I have gained
Is more enjoyed by others than by me;
For he is happiest, whether King or Peasant,
Whose home is happy. Thou didst share my sorrow,
When from my side my Son, my last, my best,
The hostile sword lopped off. Then, while Revenge
Possessed my spirit, I felt not the void
Of my lone dwelling. Now—my rage appeased—
The hostile realm laid waste—my Son avenged,
I look at home for bliss, and look in vain.
The glad obedience which I once beheld
Sparkling in every eye, is now exchanged
For dark-browed care, and dumb anxiety,
While each one, musing on the doubtful future,
Obeys his childless King because he must.
Now, to this temple, which so oft I've entered
To pray for Victory, or to render thanks
For Victories won, again I come to-day,
And in my bosom a long cherished wish,
To you not new, I bear; the wish—the hope
To bear thee to my dwelling as my bride,
A blessing to my People and myself.

Iphigenia. Too much thou offerest to one unknown,
Oh King! The exile stands abashed before thee,
Who, on this shore, sought nothing but repose,
And the protection thou hast kindly granted.

Thoas. And is it right, from me as from a Peasant,
The secret of thy origin to hide?
In any country this would be ungrateful:
But here, where strangers tremble to encounter
What Law and stern Necessity denounce,
From thee, enjoying every pious right,
A guest received with favor, one who lives
According to her every wish and fancy,
From thee I hoped at least the confidence
Due to a faithful host.

Iphigenia. If I concealed,
Oh, King! the name of Parents and of race,
'Twas in perplexity and not distrust.
Didst thou but know who stands before thee here,
Whose the accursed head thy pity shelters,
Horror, perchance, would seize thy noble heart,
And shuddering, thou wouldest drive me from thy realm,
Instead of asking me to share thy throne;
Thrusting me forth, ere yet occasion offers
To end my wanderings in a blest return
To all I love;—forth to the misery
Which, hovering round the exile, clings to him
Frighting his soul with its strange icy grasp.

Thoas. Whate'er the counsels of the Gods decree
Against thee or thy house, here every blessing
Their bounty can bestow has still attended
Thy cherished presence. I can never think
That I protect in thee a guilty head.

Iphigenia. Thy bounty wins the blessing, not thy guest.

Thoas. Bounty to crime is never thus required.
Then lay aside thy coy reserve, and give
Thy confidence to one too just to wrong it.
Holy to me thou art, as unto her

The Goddess, who to me delivered thee,
And to her nod I still submit my will.
Let but occasion offer to return
To home and friends, that moment thou art free.
But if the homeward path be barred forever,
Thy friends expelled, or crushed by huge misfortune,
Then, by more laws than one, I claim thee mine.
Speak then. Thou knowest me faithful to my word.

Iphigenia. Unwillingly my tongue resumes its freedom
From long accustomed bondage, to reveal
The deep hid secret, which, when once disclosed,
To the heart's sanctuary never more
Returns for refuge; but becomes henceforth
The potent minister of good or ill,
E'en as the Gods decree. Know then my lineage.
'Tis from the race of Tantalus I spring.

Thoas. A word of Power! And yet thou speakest it calmly.

Was he thy ancestor, whom all the world
Knew as the man much favored by the Gods?
That Tantalus, whom, of old, to his high councils
And to his table, Jove himself invited:
He, in whose time-earned wisdom and experience,
Uttered in words oracular, the Gods
Took pleasure.

Iphigenia. 'Tis the same. But Gods should not Converse with men, as with their equals hold.
The mortal race, too weak to bear such honor,
Grows dizzy with the unaccustomed height.
He was not base; and he was not a Traitor.
Too great to be a servant, yet being Man,
He was no fit companion for the thunderer.
His crime was human, but severe his doom,
For Poets sing that indiscreet presumption
Down from Jove's table to the deep disgrace
Of Tartarus hurled him; and alas! his race
Still bears the hatred of the Gods.

Thoas. But bears it
Only ancestral guilt? None of its own.

Iphigenia. Ah, True! The mighty mind and Titan strength
Too sure descended both to Sons and Grandsons;
And their stern brows, girt with an iron band,
(Such was Jove's Will) repelled advice and prudence—
Wisdom and patience from their fierce dark glance
By his decree concealed. In them each wish
Became a passion, boundless in its rage.
Pelops, the strong of will, the much-loved Son
Of Tantalus, the beauteous Hippodamia
Daughter of Ctenomachus to his bed
By treacherous murder won. She to his love
Two children, Atreus and Thyestes, bore.
These saw with envy that their father's heart
Clung to an elder son, the first born fruit
Of his first love. Hatred to him unites them.
A brother's blood, in secret shed, first stains
Their hands. Suspicion on their mother falls.
Pelops of her demands his son, and she
Flies from his rage to self-inflicted death.

Thoas. Silent! Speak on. Thou hast no cause to rue Thy confidence. Proceed.

Iphigenia. Ah! Happy he
Who can his fathers' memory recall
With joyful pride. Who to the listening ear
Delights to tell their greatness, and exalts
To trace the bright links of a nobler lineage;
Himself the last. No family at once
Breeds demigods or monsters. Good or bad,
There is a series, which ends at last,
In the delight or horror of the world.
Their father dead, Thyestes rules with Atreus

In joint authority the subject State.
But short their concord. For Thyestes soon
His brother's bed dishonors, and is driven
An exile from his throne. But long before,
Full of malignant purpose, he had stolen
A Son from Atreus, and the petted boy
Had brought up as his own. He fills his mind
With evil passions, frenzy and revenge,
And sends him to the royal court to murder,
In him he deems his uncle, his own father.
His purpose is discovered; and the youth
Dies by his father's sentence, as the son
And murderous agent of a hated brother.
Too late the truth is known, that his own Son,
Before his drunken eyes, had died in torture.
Deep in his breast he locks the purposed vengeance
And calmly meditates an unheard deed.
He seems composed—indifferent—reconciled,
And lures his brother back into his kingdom
With his two sons. The boys he seizes—murders,
And to the father's table serves them up,
Disgustful, horrid food! Thyestes, gorged
With his own flesh, is seized with boding gloom;
Asks for his children, listens for their step,
And thinks he hears their prattling at the door,
When to his shrinking eye Atreus displays
The visage grim in death, and severed limbs
Of either victim. Shuddering, thy face,
Oh King! thou turnest away. And so the Sun
His countenance averted, and his chariot
Turned from the eternal deep-worn track aside.
Such are the Fathers of thy Priestess—such Their doom. What else their wicked hearts have prompted Night's heavy pinions hide, and but reveal
The dreadful twilight.

Thoas. Let them rest in silence.
Enough of horrors. Say now, by what wonder
Thou from this savage race hast sprung.

Iphigenia. My Father
Was Agamemnon, oldest son of Atreus.
In him, through life, I may presume to say it,
I've seen the model of a perfect man.
The first born of his love for Clytemnestra
Am I. Electra next. In peace he reigned,
And rest, so long denied the house of Tantalus,
At length enjoyed. But to a father's wish
A son was wanting. Soon that wish was granted,
And now between two sisters young Orestes
Grew up the joy of all; when new misfortune,
Prepared already, burst upon our house.
Fame to your ears has brought the sound of War,
Which, to avenge the wrong of one fair woman,
With all the powers of the Kings of Greece
The walls of Troy beleaguered. Whether they
The conquest have achieved, and their revenge
Appeased I know not. All the host of Greece
My Father led. Baffled by adverse winds
In Aulis long they waited; For Diana,
By their great chief offended, thus detained
The eager host, and by the mouth of Kalchas
The first born daughter of the King demanded.
They lured me with my mother to the camp,
And at the altar this devoted head
Was offered to the Goddess. She, appeased,
Sought not my blood, but veiled me in a cloud
And bore me hither. In this temple first
From Death-trance I awoke to consciousness.
'Tis I. 'Tis Iphigenia—the grand child
Of Atreus; it is Agamemnon's daughter,
Diana's property, who speak to thee.

Thoas. Thou sprung from Kings, thou hast no stronger claim

Upon my favor or my confidence
Than when unknown. 'My offer I renew.
Then go with me and share in all I have.

Iphigenia. My King, how can I hazard such a step?
The Goddess who preserved me, she alone
Has claims on my devoted life. She chose
This as my place of refuge, and, perhaps,
Reserves me for the solace and delight
Of the declining years of one whom she Enough has punished. Who knows, even now,
That my deliverance is not at hand,
If I, unmindful of her holy will,
Thwart not her plan. Devoutly have I asked
A sign by which her pleasure may be known.

Thoas. It is a sign that here thou still remainest.
Seek no excuses, for they speak in vain,
Who would involve denial in smooth words.
The baffled suitor only hears the "No."

Iphigenia. My trust is not in words that only dazzle.
I have disclosed to thee my inmost heart:
And knows not thine own heart how mine must yearn
To see my Father—Mother—Brother—Sister—
To see, in that old hall, where sorrow still
May sometimes lisp my name, Joy's reign restored,
Twining its columns with fresh blooming wreaths,
As for one newly born? Oh! send me thither,
And give new life to them, to me, to all.

Thoas. Go then. Obey thy wilful heart, and spurn
The voice of Heaven and of friendly counsel.
Be quite a woman. Yield thee to the impulse
Which, unrestrained, hurries her where it will;
For let but passion burn within her bosom,
No holy tie can keep her from the arms
Of him who lures her from the faithful care
Of Father or of Husband. Let that sleep,
And golden-tongued persuasion pleads in vain,
Tho' urged sincerely, and enforced by reason.

Iphigenia. Oh! King, bethink thee of thy noble word,
Nor let my confidence be thus requited.
I thought thee well prepared to hear the truth.

Thoas. I was; but not for this—so unexpected!
But what else could I look for? Knew I not
I had to deal with woman?

Iphigenia. Do not rail,
O King! against our sex. It is indeed
Not lordly, like your own, but not ignoble
Are Woman's weapons. Trust me that in this
To thee I am superior, that I know,
Better than thou, that which should make thee happy.
Full of fond hope as well as good intentions,
Thou urgest me to yield: and I have cause
To thank the Gods that they have given me firmness
To shun a union not approved by them.

Thoas. It is no God that speaks. 'Tis thy own heart.

Iphigenia. 'Tis only through the heart they speak to us.

Thoas. Should not I hear that voice as well as thou?

Iphigenia. It speaks in whispers, and the storm out-roars it.

Thoas. Then 'tis the Priestess only that can hear it.

Iphigenia. The Prince, above all else, is bound to listen.

Thoas. Oh no! Thy holy office, and thy claim
Hereditary to the Thunderer's table
Have placed thee nearer to the Gods than me,
An earth-born Savage.

Iphigenia. Thus it is I suffer
For confidence that thou hast wrung from me.

Thoas. I'm but a man. 'Twere better we stop here.
My word is steadfast. Serve the Goddess still

Her chosen Priestess. But may Dian Pardon
My fault, that I so long, against our Law
And my own conscience, have withheld from her
Her ancient sacrifice. From oldest times
Death was the certain doom of every stranger,
Who touched this shore; till thou with blandishments,
In which I thought I saw a daughter's fondness,
And hoped at length to see the silent love
Of a young bride, beguiled me from my duty,
Spell-bound, with magic bonds and rocked to sleep,
That I heard not the murmurs of my People.
But now they charge my Son's untimely death
But as a visitation on my guilt,
And I no more for thy sake will restrain
The crowd that clamors for the sacrifice.

Iphigenia. Not for my sake I asked it. He, who thinks
The Gods delight in blood, mistakes them widely,
Charging on them his cruel purposes.
Did not the Goddess save me from the Priest,
Preferring to my blood my service here?

Thoas. 'Tis not for us, with ready sophistry
To mould our holy usage to our will.
Do thou thy duty. Leave me to do mine.
Two strangers, in a cave near to the Sea,
Have just been found concealed. They bring no good.
I hold them captive, and the injured Goddess
Shall take them as her due,—(the first that offer,)
For sacrifices now so long delayed.
I send them hither, and thou knowest the rest.

[Exit.]

Iphigenia. Thou hast clouds, my kind deliverer,
Clouds to screen afflicted Virtue,
Winds to waft the victim, rescued
From the iron hand of Fate,
Across the land—across the Ocean.
Wise art thou to scan the future;
Still to thee the past is present;
And thine eye upon thy servants
Rests, as thy light, the life of night,
Calmly rules the silent earth.
O! withhold my hand from blood!
No Peace, no blessing can attend it.
Though slain by chance, the victim's spectre
Haunts the casual perpetrator
To dog and fright his hour of woe.
For good men to the Gods are dear,
Wherever such on earth are found;
And they this fleeting life vouchsafe
To mortals, whom they freely suffer
To share with them the cheering aspect
Of their own eternal Heaven.*

[END OF ACT I.]

* The translator is aware that this hymn sounds strangely in English. Perhaps it will be as unacceptable to his readers as to himself. It was his wish to have preserved the measure, giving a rhyming close to the lines, but he relinquished this purpose in compliance with the request of a German friend, at whose suggestion he undertook the translation. It was the wish of that gentleman to exhibit Goëthé to the American public in a dress resembling as nearly as possible his German costume. His metre, therefore, is exactly copied throughout. Hence, too, the translation is literal to a fault, as it sometimes happens that certain words are quite unpoetical in one language, while the corresponding word in another is consecrated by custom to the Poet's use. The translator is not conscious of any greater liberty than that of rendering "grasp" for "faust," "fist," and "nod" for "wink," which means the same in German as in English.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT LAW.

Views in regard to an extension of the privileges of Copyright in the United States, to the citizens of other countries, in a Letter to the Hon. Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, member of Congress. By the author of "The Yemassee," "The Kinamen," "Richard Hurdiss," "Damsel of Darien," &c.

HON. I. E. HOLMES:

House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR SIR:—You have done me the honor to request my views of the effect of the Copyright Law, as it exists at present, upon the interests of domestic authorship, and of such an extension of its privileges, as will enable the citizens of foreign countries to partake of its securities, in common with our own. Upon a subject of so much doubt and disputation, I should have been better pleased to refer you to more experienced writers than myself—to those whose greater knowledge of the business of Literature, and higher distinction in its walks, would entitle them to speak with more authority, and with less doubtful claims to the respect and consideration of the country. But, regarding the question as a vital one, and in the silence of those whom I myself should much prefer to hear, I do not feel altogether at liberty to decline the task to which I am invited. Believing, as I do, that the condition of the law as it now stands, endangers, and will long continue to jeopard, the best interests of the country, as regards its intellectual progress, not less than the minor, but still important interests of the American author, considered simply as an individual,—I feel, as an additional incentive to your application, the sense of a pressing, not to say imperious duty, which obliges me to speak. I am not conscious, however, that I can throw any new lights upon the subject. I do not know that I can furnish one additional argument to those which have been so frequently set before the American people, and, seemingly, in vain; but, I can, at least, in good faith, present an additional witness in the cause, and array, in simple order, those suggestions of my reason and my experience, which have inclined me, after frequent deliberation, to place myself on the present side of the question.

Perhaps, as a preliminary to this discussion, important, if not absolutely essential to a just perception of all its bearings, it would be well to take a hasty survey of the past history and present condition of American Literature. It is important to show, that something has been done by native authorship, to justify what might else seem to be an importunate and impertinent clamoring at the doors of Congress, for a species of bounty and shows of favor, for the benefit of those who can exhibit no proper title to consideration. We admit the necessity, on the threshold, of showing that American Literature, is not a name merely, but a thing;—that it has been a thing of works and triumphs;—

that it has honored the country abroad, and has been serving it at home; and that, to American authorship, not yet thirty years old, the nation is largely indebted for much of its public morality, its private virtues, its individual independence, and that social tone which prevents the absolute and general usurpation of opinion, in matters of taste, by foreign and inferior models;—to the rank influence of which we are particularly exposed by the premature and excessive growth of our commercial tendencies.

I trust that it will not be demanding too violent a concession from any citizen, when we assume, that a Literature of some kind is absolutely necessary to every nation that professes to be civilized. It is, perhaps, the highest, if not the only definite proof of national civilization. It is contended that a foreign Literature is not only not enough for the wants of such a people, but that, in all cases where it is suffered to supersede their own, it must prove ultimately fatal to their moral, if not their political independence. It is contended, and on sufficient grounds, that a people, who receive their Literature exclusively from a foreign land, are, in fact, if not in form, essentially governed from abroad;—that their laws are furnished, if not prescribed, by a foreign and, frequently, a hostile power; and that, as it is only through our own minds that we can be free, so, when these are surrendered to the tutelage of strangers, we are, to all intents and purposes, a people in bondage.

The proposition, however startling it may seem, is by no means too strongly put. Unhappily, our own national experience furnishes us with an illustration, which is beyond the denial of the most bigoted mind. It applies, with singular force and directness to the actual relation, in which we have long stood, and still measureably stand, to the controlling intellect of Great Britain. There is no disguising the pernicious influence, which, to this day, she maintains over our moral and mental character. There is no concealing, as there is no defending, the odious servility with which a large portion of our population, in the great cities, contemplate her haughty aristocracy; borrow their affectations, ape their arrogances, adopt their prejudices, and shackle themselves, hand and foot, in the miserable folds of their meretricious and highly artificial society. The disgusting meanness which hangs upon the heels of her travellers,—which beslaughters them with caresses, and, subsequently, requites their natural scorn with blackguardism, is shocking to the national pride and debasing to the national character. Unhappily,—though I am pleased to think that the great body of our people, particularly the rural portions—revolt at such proceedings and keep from participation in them,—the few who are guilty of this servility find too facile a sanction for its exercise, in the readiness with which, as a whole, we receive the opinions, adopt the laws, and borrow the institutions of a country, the entire habits and objects of which are singularly adverse to the leading ideas upon which our own government is founded. We still, as a people, entertain most of those feelings of implicit deference for the men and measures of Great Britain,—her opinions and some of her worst prejudices—which distinguished our provincial dependency upon her; and so conscious is she of this fact, that, but recently, within a few months, one of her leading reviews has had the audacity to assert, that we cannot confer reputation at all; that domestic opinion, in the United States, cannot, in Literary History, distinguish a favorite son;—that the verdict of British authority is absolutely necessary before we can dare take to our hearts, and acknowledge with pride, the intellectual achievements of a native. Mr. Alison, in his recent History of Europe,—a work in which it is difficult to say whether the ignorance, or the malignity of the author, in all that concerns the United States, is greatest,—adds his testimony to the same effect. He says, “Literature and intellectual ability of the highest class meet with little encouragement in America, the names of Cooper, Channing and Washington Irving, indeed, amply demonstrate that the American soil is not wanting in genius of the most elevated and fascinating character, but their works are almost all published in London—a decisive proof that European habits and ideas are necessary to their due development.”* As if the same writers, and a thousand more, were not also published in America! But the assertion, and not its correctness, is what we have to deal with. That it is not wholly correct, we know—that it is sufficiently so, however, to prove the servility of an influential class

* The ability to create, should be, we think, prima facie evidence of an equal ability to judge of the thing created. The country which produces the genius cannot be incapable of determining his degree. One faculty seems inevitably to involve the other. The reflection of a single moment would stifle the absurdity which denies it; and, if it cannot silence the malignant sneer of our enemies, should be sufficient to overcome the doubts and cavils of our friends. Our own people, at least, may learn from the fact a satisfactory lesson of confidence in themselves, which should tend very much to free them from the usurpations of foreign judgment. But the statement of Mr. Alison, quoted above, goes one stride further in absurdity. That the writings of certain American authors are published in London, “is a decisive proof that European habits and ideas are necessary to their due development.” It is impossible to say where that law of logic is to be found, which leads to any such conclusion. As well may we say that, as the writings of Walter Scott and Bulwer are published in New York, it is “a decisive proof that American habits and ideas are necessary to their due development.” The fact is, that this view of the case presents an additional argument in its favor, derived from the greater diffusion of their books among us than is probably the case in England. The number of copies in an American edition of a successful novel writer is very far greater usually than the English editions—a fact arising not from any superior appreciation of the merits of the author, but simply from the greater cheapness of the volumes.

among us, and to justify our complaint, is, unhappily, beyond all question. Such a condition of dependence must always prove a difficult, but not, I trust, an impassable barrier to the moral progress of any nation which has not gone through an infancy of its own. Its feelings, tone and character, however different may be its necessities, its objects, its climate and condition, will still be impressed and determined, in the absence of an independent native Literature, by all the qualities which marked it as a colony. The mere severance of that public interest which bound it to the maternal nation, by no means constitutes mental, or even political independence; and the enfranchised people, may, in most respects, be as thoroughly, if not as explicitly, the subject people still, as at that humiliating period when their proudest distinction was to prove their loyalty under stripes, and to add the tribute of free gifts, to the unsparing exactions of a power of which they felt little but the weight. It was the policy of the Mother Country then, as it is her hate now, which sought to keep down the national intellect, to suppress thinking, to throw every impediment in the way of knowledge, and to perpetuate her tyranny over American industry, by paralyzing, to the utmost extent of her power, the original energies of American genius. The declaration against printing presses and newspapers, so bluntly made by one of the Colonial Governors—Berkeley, of Virginia—was the insidious, if unavowed, principle of the powers which he represented, in all that related to the concerns of America. That the colonies should be officered from abroad—that the provincial should neither preside in the cabinet, nor command in the field, was one of the admirable means by which she contrived for so long a season to maintain this policy. It was this portion of her scheme, however, more than any other—more than tea-acts or stamp-acts, or butcher acts—that led to the final throwing off of her authority. It was the native mind of America beginning to assert its claims to self-government—beginning then, to assert in politics that which the same native mind, within the last twenty years, has, for the first time, begun nobly to assert for itself in letters and the arts. It is still the policy of Great Britain that we should not succeed in this assertion—that we should still be her subject province, in one respect, if not in all. Her thought, on this subject, is very much the offspring of her wish!

A native Literature is the means, and the only means, of our perfect independence. Of the importance of this agent to a people, and to the American people in particular, it may be necessary that we should fortify our own views, by reference to those of a deservedly great authority. We are the more anxious to do this, as it appears to us that our people have really but a very imperfect appreciation of the subject, and regard with a strange indifference, as if the matter did not in any ways concern them, the great and singular struggle, now in progress, between the native and the foreign genius;—the genius loci now, for the first time, struggling into birth and claiming to be heard; and that maternal mind, throned in the empire of song and thought, and upheld by the mightiest masters of art that ever made a nation famous, from which we proudly claim to have derived all the qualities which should accord, in the progress of time, a like eminence to the genius of our country! We take, from the writings of Dr. Channing, the following lucid and comprehensive paragraph.

"The facility," says that great writer, "with which we receive the literature of foreign countries, instead of being a reason for neglecting our own, is a strong motive for its cultivation. We mean not to be paradoxical, but we believe it would be better to admit no books from abroad, than to make them substitutes for our own intellectual activity. The more we receive from other countries, the greater the need of an original literature. A people, into whose minds the thoughts of foreigners are poured perpetually, needs an energy within itself to resist and to modify this mighty influence; and without it will inevitably sink under the worst bondage—will become intellectually enslaved. We have certainly no desire to complete our restrictive system, by adding to it a literary non-intercourse law. We rejoice in the increasing intellectual connexion between this country and the old world. But sooner would we rupture it, than see our country sitting passively at the feet of foreign teachers. Better have no Literature than to form ourselves unresistingly on a foreign one. The true sovereigns of a country are those who determine its mind—its modes of thinking—its taste, its principles; and we cannot consent to lodge this sovereignty in the hands of strangers. A country, like an individual, has dignity and power only in proportion as it is self-formed. There is a great stir to secure to ourselves the manufacturing of our own clothing. We say, let others spin and weave for us, but let them not think for us. A people, whose government and laws are nothing but the embodying of public opinion, should jealously guard this opinion against foreign dictation. We need a Literature to counteract, and to use wisely, the Literature which we import. We need an inward power proportionate to that which is exerted upon us, as the means of self-subsistence. It is particularly true of a people, whose institutions demand for their support a free and bold spirit, that they should be able to subject to a manly and independent criticism whatever comes from abroad. These views seem to us to deserve serious attention. We are becoming, more and more, a reading people. Books are already among the most powerful influences here. The question is, shall Europe, through these, fashion us after its pleasure! Shall America be only an echo of what is thought and written under the aristocracies beyond the ocean!"

No language could put the importance of this subject more clearly before the mind; and, without dwelling upon the point, we will proceed to show that the necessity of a national Literature, great as it is, to the people of every country, is of far more importance to the people of the United States, than it can, by any possibility, be to any other. In our case, the colonial habit of deferring to the Mother Country is maintained and strengthened, in spite of our political emancipation, by our employment of the same language. Could we have found a new dialect—a tongue of our own, suitable to our condition, and expressive of our liberties, on the same battle-field where they were won, we should, by this time, have been in possession of a Literature, in which they might have been proportionably and permanently enshrined. The securities for mental independence on the part of France, Germany and other great nations of Europe, are to be found chiefly in the obstacles which their several languages present, as it were, upon the very threshold, to the invasion and usurpation of strangers. The unknown tongue stands to the intruder in the guise of a bearded sentinel, jealous of every approach, and resisting the ingress of all not possessing the parole. We have no such securities. The enemy approaches us with the smooth and insidious utterance of our mother tongue, and we are naturally slow to suspect hostility in any such approach. How admirably may we illustrate the important bearing of this isolated fact, by a reference to the social and political relation in which we stand, comparatively, with France and England. The former we know, almost entirely, by acts of kindness. By her aid, we struggled into national individuality. With the exception of the quasi war with the Directory, the result of that Ishmaelite aspect in which that body stood to all the world, she has borne towards us, from the first day of our political freedom, the most encouraging and friendly countenance. Such, too, has been the aspect of her people. The books and bearing of her distinguished travellers among us have been marked by an equal sense of urbanity and justice.* England, on the contrary, almost

* Would the British people desire the best, the most honorable and impartial commentary on the character of their feelings toward this country, let them compare—contrast rather—the deportment of the distinguished Frenchmen who have honored us with their presence, and that of their own travellers. Let them read the Beaumonts and De Tocquevilles, and turn from their thoughtful, candid, and elevated views, to the sickening spite, the low malice, the cavilling and querulous peevishness, the dishonest representation, the perverse will, which cannot be made to see the brighter aspects of the object, but turns perpetually to the more grateful survey of those which may offend, by which the volumes of the Marryatts, the Trollopes and from the beginning, has put forth all her energies to enslave or destroy us. Failing in this attempt, she resorts to others, which, if less dangerous and hurtful, are as little legitimate, and prove the character of her feelings to have remained unchanged. To this day, her writers, her travellers, her leading men, with few exceptions—the officers of her navy—the agents of her government, and those who give utterance usually to her feelings and opinions—speak of us, habitually, in terms either of frank hostility, or downright scorn and contempt. Yet the affinities suggested by the employment of a language in common, make us tolerate all the insults of the one, as if we still yearned for the ancient wallow of colonial dependency;—and with what miserable time-serving sycophancy does a large and active class among us contrive to solicit the contumelious expression of such among them, as deign to look in person upon us,—examining our ways and means—our manners and customs, as if we were in reality, by nature, an inferior people, and not, unfortunately, too nearly like themselves not to be confounded with them in every other part of the world!* On the other hand, dealing with the French, and prompted by the hostile sentiments which a foreign tongue seems naturally to inspire, we are ready to quarrel on the slightest provocation. Of their Science, Arts, Literature,—their inventions and discoveries, we have little, or no general knowledge, except through discolored British media, the prejudices of which we unconsciously imbibe, and thus form antipathies to a great and friendly nation, with the same unhappy facility, with which we take on trust all the tastes, sentiments and opinions of a master, by whom we are much more frequently reviled than instructed.

The birth of a home Literature is the great and sufficient remedy for all these errors and absurdities—and that Literature is born! The war of 1812 gave an important blow to the mental supremacy of Great Britain over this country. Prior to that war, what was the humiliating position in which we stood to that nation! Politicians will not have forgotten the scornful reproach, uttered, it is said, in the very ears of our President, (Madison,) the Dickens's, are blackened and branded. The commentary is not less fatal to the nation which receives, than to the travellers who write, with such goût, narratives, which, if true, should give pain rather than pleasure, to the people, who are told such enormities of their kindred and descendants.

* This, so far as our relation to the people of Great Britain is affected, is an amusing truth which reflects the happiest commentary upon the ridiculous pretensions of the latter, on the subject of manners and politeness: on the continent, John Bull and Brother Jonathan are usually put into the same category, and pronounced equally incorrigible. If, in the estimation of the politer nations of the South, there be any difference between them, it is that Bull is more insolent, and his descendant more impertinent. We know not, so far as other nations are concerned, that either of them, on this score, has any thing to boast.

"You cannot be kicked into a war with Great Britain." What was the language of the British Commissioners at Ghent, met just after war had been declared, to treat with our own, for the consummation of peace?—a proceeding which smacked so much of national timidity, as almost to justify the insolent demands of the enemy! The substance of their language was, "we do not care to grant you peace, 'till we have subjected you to a sound thrashing." But that the honor of the nation was entrusted to sound native minds,—men of stubborn, independent intellect—it must have been dishonored.* But what must have been thought of the morale of the nation when, even in time of war, its special representatives were approached in such a spirit by the very people with whom we were in conflict! The intellect of the nation was despised, rather than its spirit. The spirit of a civilized nation depends so greatly upon its intellect, that the estimate which we make of the one, involves the other also. What had the United States done in intellectual matters, to compel the respect of other countries? Nothing! literally nothing! Our orators were numerous and able, it is true—but the achievements of the tribune and the forum are usually of domestic recognition only. They present no enduring, or obvious memorials, before the eyes of foreign nations. Our commerce was increasing our manufactures. We had shown no mean ingenuity—no inferior skill, in contending in most of the arts of trade, with rival nations. But in the superior arts, in the sciences, in poetry, painting, statuary, classical and general Literature, the nation was totally unrepresented abroad! There was no sign-manual, characteristic of American genius, to be placed before the eyes of legitimate and reluctant Europe. Before this sign-manual could be made, it was necessary that the American mind should be emancipated from its memories of colonial servitude. The war of 1812 gave the first impulse to a consummation so desirable. The scornful deportment of Great Britain forced upon our people, in their own spite, a painful, but proud feeling, of their individuality;—made them sensible of what was due to national character and national pride. Perhaps, the lesson was only taught and learned in part,—but it was a first lesson;—to be followed up by others. The savage excesses in which the British soldiery indulged—their horrible outrages at Hampton and other places, and the Hunlike brutalities at Washington, contributed to disturb our sympathy with British superiority, while making us properly resentful of their arms. The very disgraces to which the nation was subjected in Canada, were productive of admirable effects, in impressing upon us, even through shame and stripes, a better sense of national dignity than we seemed before to entertain. Our ocean-victories followed, at the happy moment, to confirm in us the new-born sense of pride and patriotism. That war, so equally distinguished by humiliating disasters and exhilarating successes, did very much to sever the links that bound the mind of the nation to its old colonial faith. A general intellectual awakening seemed to follow it,—and we suspect that the records of our patent office, (taken as one of the signs of intellectual progress, though in matters merely utilitarian,) will show a more remarkable advance in the history of domestic inventions, from the year 1815 to that of 1835—a term of twenty years—than can be shown by any other country, of similar population, in the same space of time. The arts are kindred. Those of mere utility and those of beauty and refinement, however dissimilar in their uses and habiliments, belong yet to the same great family. They are not hostile, though the one presides at the piano, while to the other is deputed the humbler duties of putting the household in proper order. The physical wants of the individual supplied, those of his intellect clamor for their dues. It is a sufficient proof of the natural intellectual tendencies of the American people, that their anxiety for their mental supplies did not linger and wait upon those which concerned the animal nature only. The non-intercourse with Great Britain, which had cut off the supplies of blankets, woollens and other commodities of like nature, had been far more decidedly beneficial in cutting off the supply of books. It was in the very midst of the conflict that American Literature, such as it is, first sprang into existence. The Port-Folio, by Dennie, one of our best periodicals, was first published in 1812. This was not the only instance. The laws of demand and supply did not fail to produce their effects, and the same national spirit, which clamored for our own manufactures, was equally busy, if less clamorous, in striving to supply the lack of Literature. The preparation of school and classical books, which has since become one of the most extensive businesses of the American publisher, may be said to have begun at this period. At all events, we shall be perfectly safe in saying that, prior to 1815, the issues from the American press were not only reprints wholly from foreign sources, but were confined chiefly to works of science and education. We need make no special exception in behalf of the domestic histories, which, in small editions, were generally so many appeals to local patriotism, and accordingly, most usually, were published by subscription. As little may be said of the young poet, who, here and there, in some one or other city, sent forth his slender volume at his own expense, rather with the view to seeing his verses in print, than with any sanguine hope of finding purchasers for them. For this was the period, rendered somewhat famous by the contemptuous sneer of the British critic, contained in the phrase,—since made proverbial by the noble commentary which American Literature has passed upon it—“Who reads an American book?” Verily, up to this period, writers of American books were few indeed. The national mind, in every thing that belonged to the fine arts, belles-lettres and the superior sciences, seems to have acknowledged its incapacity, and to have surrendered itself, passively, to the foreign teacher, which had so recently been its tyrant. No works of art issued from the native press—no fancy, no fiction, no humor, no romance! The imagination of the nation—the resources of which are, in reality, wondrous and unsurpassable,* crouching in shadow, with wing folded, and head drooping upon its bosom,—was not even conjectured to have an existence!

It was natural enough that, in the newly-born passion for thorough independence, which distinguished the feelings of our people at the close of the war of 1812,—and which led to the adoption of a government system for the protection of domestic manufactures,—the policy which this feeling declared, should also extend itself to other objects than those which concerned the physical being only. The policy which declared for making our own woollens, necessarily gave some thought to books. But no such protection was afforded by government to this branch of domestic industry. The notion seems to have been, if our bodies are

* This remark may surprise those, who, not regarding the thousand circumstances which have tended to discourage the progress of the American imagination, in its legitimate direction, infer its absence, from the deficiency of its imaginative Literature—a deficiency, which, we hope to show, exists only in the ignorance of our critics as to what the nation has really done. But the proofs of the most vigorous imaginative presence are every where around us—in the boldness of our public and social designs—in the rapid and vehement energies of our people,—in the very extravagance of their contemplations, the unfamiliar elevation and novelty of their modes of speech, their swelling character, and really remarkable progress. The history of the people of the United States is itself a great and astonishing romance. It is a history belonging to that school of which Robinson Crusoe is an admirable example. Here is a nation, like the individual, cast naked upon the desert, ignorant, unlettered, poor, desolate, yet, out of themselves and the wondrous resources of their nature, contriving means against all enemies, without and within—shaking themselves free from the “old man of the sea”—no inappropriate term for the mother country—founding a great empire, building great cities, sending forth noble fleets,—penetrating the wildest regions—winning the mastery every where, and now confronting the masters of the old world and challenging them to a fair field and no favor. This is the cause of quarrel and vexation, of sneer, and hate, and disparagement. And all this the work of fifty years! Verily, if this do not prove the presence of a daring wing, then never nation possessed one. The imagination has more to do with the ordinary works of utilitarianism, than ordinary people seem to imagine.

free from foreign dominion, it matters little that our thoughts, our feelings, our souls, should still remain in bondage. The noble and emphatic sentiment, already quoted, of Dr. Channing,—“We say, let others spin and weave for us, but let them not think for us!”—suggesting, as it does, the only great, true and patriotic principle, upon which the opinions of a citizen should be moulded, in all that concerns such a relation, would have shocked the genius of the spinning Jenny, and caused the throes of a moral earthquake in every manufacturing mart from Passamaquoddy to Pittsburg. The slavish nature, however, which thus preferred the most ordinary interests of humanity, to those which are calculated to lift it into excellence, and to the rarer walks of achievement, was rebuked by the better genius of the nation: and, without any protection from government, without a tax on any other branch of business, that of American Literature was begun. To the genius of Fennimore Cooper, we feel confident in saying, we owe the first signs of a power, the first unfoldings of a wing, which has since soared so famously, and which is destined to still higher flights, if not denied and delayed by untoward and unfriendly circumstance. The first writings of this author appeared in 1819. How closely upon the footsteps of war! How soon was the question of the British Reviewer—“who reads an American book?”—answered by the writer, whose works, but a few years after, were read in the language of every nation in Christendom! As if to illustrate the contest through which the nation had just gone, and to maintain the vigorous spirit which she had shown in dealing with an enemy equally insolent and powerful, the earliest work of his pen, which drew the eyes of the country upon him, was founded upon events in the great struggle, with the same enemy, in 1776! The publication of “The Spy,” which was the work in question, had an effect upon the American people, infinitely beyond any pleasure which they might have gathered from its perusal, as a romance. It was contemporaneous, in publication, with “The Pirate” of Walter Scott—a work which did not give such ample development to the powers of its author, and thus afforded an additional opportunity to the American reader, to institute comparisons between them, not unfavorable to the native writer. Even as a successful imitation only of Walter Scott, it was an event to rejoice a youthful people, hitherto doubtful of their resources—nay, denying them—ashamed, for the first time, of their own previous unperformance, and solicitous of fame in new departments;—when they discovered, suddenly rising in their midst, a genius—until then unknown—full of vigor, and marching, with admirable bearing, upon the very track hitherto trodden only by the “Great Unknown!” The event opened the eyes of the nation, already anxious to give the lie to the scornful reproach of incapacity, urged, not more by the British reviewer, than the European reader. Her eyes suddenly became unscaled, purged, like those of the eagle, whose mighty youth had been mewed up; and the universal feeling of her people might be compared, without extravagance of figure, to that of the explorer,—long desponding, wearied in his search and hopeless of success,—who, at the least expected moment, sees land!—sees the green slopes, the wild, gorgeous shrubbery, and the huge mountains of the unknown empire, suddenly standing out upon his sight! The “anch’io son pittore!” of the modest painter, was suddenly ours. We, too, could have our possessions in the intellectual, as in the natural world. All was not a blank in taste and Literature. Europe shall yet receive us, and we shall have our word in her high places of politeness and refinement! The conviction, that we too might put in our claims to appear among those nations which had long before been endowed with the universal tongues of art and song, was one of those convictions that never sleep until they have realized all the proofs which are necessary to the full establishment and recognition of their pretensions.

It does not militate against the claim here advanced for Mr. Cooper to show that the novels of Charles Brockden Brown—works in fiction of a rarely imaginative and highly original complexion—were published in America so far back as 1798, 1801. We could show, with little difficulty, that there were other names of men of genius, at periods equally remote, by whom—the mere date of their publication being alone considered—the writings of Mr. Cooper were anticipated. But, so far as their effect upon the public taste and spirit is concerned, they might as well have remained unpublished to this day. Their works had no circulation, did not, in the least degree, affect the popular feeling, and prompted no farther search after a vein which was equally rich in quantity and kind. It is to their misfortune and to the reproach of the country that this was the case. But the truth is, the nation was not then prepared to recognize its own genius—had not then the courage to assert a genius at all, without first securing the British imprimatur. Her training for this, from necessity, the hands of the foe—defeat, shame, foreign and domestic reproach—was yet to come. The genius of American Literature was born and could only be born, when the American people were prepared, to receive and entertain her, to acknowledge her charms and to assert her pretensions. Such seed is seldom wasted—it comes with the occasion that demands it, and is very apt to come, “broad cast,” when the soil is ready for its growth. There is a potential significance in this last little paragraph, upon which we have need to linger. The Literature of a nation, having but the single audience, cannot long exist, or must exist under the most humiliating disadvantages, if that nation, whether through ignorance of just standards, deficiency of taste, or imbecility of will—or all combined—is incapable of awarding an original decision upon the merits of its authors. The only authors of a nation, who illustrate its career, and help its progress in the paths of moral improvement, are those who represent its spirit and partake its characteristics. This is more particularly true of a nation whose government recognizes the people as the only sources of its power. If the nation, then, be base and slavish, distrustful of its own resources, and doubtful of the genius of its sons, their achievements will be watched with distrust, and met with every species of discouragement. Zimmerman gives a most deplorable picture of the degraded intellectual condition of the German nation,* in this very particular, in their servile homage to the French genius in the time of Voltaire—the French being the courtly language, and French philosophy, (so called,) in the accursed scepticism it taught of all things noble, having fairly emasculated the popular spirit, equally of its originality and its faith. The wonderful birth and progress to excellence of native German genius, but a few years after the lament of Zimmerman, is equally astonishing and encouraging, as it shows this prostration of a nation's mind to depend, not upon any thing radical or organic, and to be eradicable by certain conservative influences which are probably deeply seated in the genius of every nation. Where this intellectual prostration is found, the motive to authorship is almost wholly wanting; and the superior genius, in obedience to his intellectual tendency, in utter despair of his country, expatriates himself; and, in the countenance afforded by other countries, quickly learns to forget, and even to repudiate his own. This melancholy history is true of several Americans, whose patriotism, under the existing circumstances, it would be difficult to reproach. Nor is it the least evil of this condition of the national mind, that it will not examine the intellectual claims of its own citizens, and dare not award its judgment upon them. It is not content with being passive merely: with the sycophancy which is characteristic of such servility, it seeks to anticipate the foreign arbiter by judgments hostile to the pretensions of its sons—taking for granted—with the usual littleness of a self-esteem that lacks all the other essentials of judgment,—that an unfavorable decision is a safe one—at least for itself—and permits it the privilege of seeming to assert the position of the judge, when, really, it maintains only that of the executioner. American criticism has but two frequently exhibited this one characteristic of judgments only, in considering the claims and performances of American authorship.

What followed from the first successes of Mr. Cooper and the appreciation of his countrymen? We say appreciation, for the fact is undeniable, that public opinion in America, did not wait in his case, as it had ever done before, for the award of British tribunals. The verdict was equally instantaneous and favorable; and the courage which dictated it was the result of that new spirit of independence, which was the great fruit of the war of 1812. Of the long line of beautiful fictions, the work of his hand, which adorn the infant Literature of our country, it is not within our province to speak. Our present objects will not admit of individual analysis, which might seem invidious, and is not essential to our history. But the effect of his successes upon the native intellect, in stimulating its movements, giving courage to its exertions, and converting it from a concern of amateurship and dilettantism into an employment and a profession, was absolutely wonderful! and here, by the way, it may be well to remark, that the Literature of a people depends wholly upon the fact that it is made a profession. Nothing has ever come from amateur performances in letters or the arts. It must be a daily work, an habitual labor, exercise leading to perfection, and the stimulus of daily necessities impelling to daily exercise. If the reader would learn any thing on this head, let him look to the history of British Literature. He would see how little we owe to the Sachvilles, the Rochesters, the Carews; the Sacklings, et, id omne genus—the tribe of clever gentlemen about town,—and how much we owe to the day-laborers in letters—the constant workies—the Shakespeares, the Johnsons (Ben and Sam) the Popes, the Drydens—not forgetting that wondrous galaxy of genius, which, in spite of degradation, poverty, public scorn and private misery, still fondly labored at the shrine of the British Dramatic Muse, leaving a vast storehouse of material, wild song and wondrous story, from which the more slenderly endowed moderns will long continue to replenish their exhausted censers. I need not

* Here is a passage by way of sample. The American reader will be apt involuntarily, to apply the language of Zimmerman, spoken of the Germans, before the awakening of the national genius, to his own country. The histories are not unlike, as well in the sleep as the awakening.

"In Europe (America?) there exists a great nation distinguished by laboriousness and industry, possessing men of inventive faculties and of great genius; in as great number as any other, little addicted to luxury; and the most valiant among the brave. This nation, nevertheless, hates and despises itself; purchases, praises and imitates only what is foreign; it imagines that no dress can be elegant, no food or wine delicious or even palatable, no dwelling commodious, unless stuff, taylor, clothes, cook, wine, furniture and architect come to it at an excessive expense and from abroad, and what adds a zest to all, from a country inhabited by its natural enemies. This singular nation exalts and praises solely and above measure, the genius and the wit of foreigners, the paintings of foreigners, and especially with regard to Literature, foreign books, written in the most miserable style, are solely purchased, read and admired by these insatuated people, who know little even of their own history, save from the faulty, unfaithful and malicious relations of foreign authors!"

more especially designate the Beaumonts, the Fletchers, the Massingers, the Fords, the Dekkars, the Shirleys, the Rowleys, the Middletons and hundreds more—the true depositories of English genius—springing up in legions, as if, to use the humble figure employed in a previous paragraph, they had been sown, broad cast, by the lavish hands of a Deity who never sows in vain! That, up to the period which we have designated as the commencement of American Literature, the writings of Americans were not, and could not, be held in estimation, was due simply to the fact that Literature among us had not arrived at the dignity of a profession. The song was written by the gentleman in night-gown and slippers; the tale by one who apologized, usually, for this wandering into forbidden grounds—possibly alleging a vacant mind, or an erring mood, for the solitary trespass; and promising, if forgiven for this, never, in like manner, to offend again. It would be something wonderful, indeed, if the expectations of the reader, under such assurances, should be extravagant—still more wonderful if he should attach any importance to a pursuit, which the amateur seemed, prima facie, to regard as trifling if not improper. That this will be the natural condition of the popular thought, in a country subject to new and trying necessities of the humblest kind, is natural enough. That it should continue to be the popular thought, when the necessities of life are overcome, when want is driven from our doors, when plenty smiles upon the land, and other lands are drained for their luxuries, would indicate a most miserable intellectual inferiority, which, happily, is not our case. On the contrary, as we have shown, a national necessity led to the birth of a national Literature. With the requisitions of the people, the professional author sprang into existence. From a single belles-lettres writer, we soon possessed hundreds, eager for notice in the new vocation; and struggling, on short commons, to be heard in song and story. If they could live by this profession, their demands, as is every where the case in the history of British Literature, were readily satisfied. Those who allege cupidity and mercenary views against the literary man, because he seeks adequate compensation for his toils, betray a singular ignorance of literary history. With a few splendid and recent exceptions, authorship has been most usually the least productive of occupations. There is scarcely an original living writer, whether in America or England—as there has been no dead one—who, if pecuniary results were his objects, would not instantly resort to any other occupation. I can scarcely direct my attention to any other, in which the employé is not more at ease in his worldly concerns—better provided with the luxuries of life, and better prepared for the enjoyment of them. Literature is a self-denying vocation, taxing thought, and imagination, and sensibility—vexing the dreams—depriving the nights of renovating rests, enfeebling the frame and souring the temper. Its consolations are chiefly from within, in the exciting nature of studies and contemplations, which, while they exhilarate the fancy, by their intoxicating effects, enfeeble and destroy the frame. "Poetry," says Coleridge—himself one of the greatest geniuses of the age in which it starved—"has been to me its own exceeding great reward," and what he has said so felicitously has been probably felt by all who have ever professed, what seems to me to have been singularly misnamed, when called "La Gaie Science." Such it may have been to the Minstrels of Provence: To the professional poet, however, its pleasures may be said to "be born of pain and nurtured in convulsion." The law of nature, however, by which they are born poets—"poeta nascitur"—keeps them in shackles. Their obedience is maintained in spite of them. They acknowledge an iron necessity not less unyielding than that of the Grecian Fates!

If such, in all countries, seems to have been the destiny of the belles-lettres writer—if such are his sufferings, (and the painful history of British Literature abounds in proofs,) and such, and so unsubstantial his rewards, what are the inducements, even under the best circumstances, to authorship in America!—Here, where we receive unlimited supplies of the best books, in every department, and in our mother tongue, from Great Britain; here, where the same books are presented to us at one fifth the cost at which they are sold in the country where produced; here, where a general doubt almost universally seems to have prevailed, as to the intellectual capacity, for such writings, of our own people; here, where we were accustomed to defer to a foreign country the highest and noblest duty of a people, that of forming, upon intrinsic standards, our own judgments in almost every intellectual matter! With all these things to discourage,—the public looking on indifferently,—the publisher receiving reluctantly,—the mental productions of the native, the local genius could not be restrained; and, stimulated by impulses born equally of patriotism and the muse, the first offerings of American Literature promised to be equally valuable and abundant. It would exceed our limits were we to attempt any catalogue raisonnée, of what has been done by native authorship, within that period which we have allotted to the achievements of American letters; but, by the help of a valuable pamphlet which is before us, prepared and published in London, by Mr. George Putnam, of the publishing house of Wiley & Putnam, we are enabled, without trouble, to array some facts bearing upon this subject, which are better calculated than any thing we could say to prove the importance and patriotism of American authorship. This pamphlet, we may say in this place, contains some admirable answers, drawn chiefly from the argumentum ad homines, in reply to the sneers of the British critics, on the subject of American intellect. It is shown that, in nearly every department of Literature, American writers have advanced to a position of the highest respectability, frequently equality, and sometimes superiority, in comparison with those of Europe,—that hundreds of American books are annually republished in London, frequently as English books, with their titles altered, their prefaces suppressed, and all those distinguishing marks obliterated, by which their origin might be detected;—that some of their most distinguished Reviews do not scruple to appropriate entire articles from American periodicals, taking care to alter the ear-marks, the titles, the signatures, &c., and sometimes to suppress the word America and substitute that of England. We make an extract from Mr. Putnam's preface in illustration of these startling assertions, the shocking dishonesty of which is only best understood, when it is remembered, that they decry us, in the very moment of their robbery, with the declaration that we have nothing fit to steal.

"But, 'who reads an American book?' asks the Edinburgh Review. A good many do so, without being themselves aware of it. The case of the 'oldest' London Review appreciating the articles of the 'North American' well enough to appropriate some of them entire, as original, accidentally omitting to mention their origin, is not a solitary one. American periodicals have contributed 'considerably' to those of England, in mutually innocent unconscionableness. Some few American writers would scarcely recognize their own offspring under their new names and foreign dress. Who, in looking over a list of titles, would suppose that 'Quebec and New York, or the Three Beauties,' was the same as 'Burton, or the Sieges,' and 'Cortes, or the Fall of Mexico,' a reprint of 'The Infidel';—that 'The Last Days of America' is no other than Mr. Ware's 'Probus,' and 'Montacute,' only a new title for 'A New Home,' that Mr. Muzzey's 'Young Maiden' and 'Young Wife,' are translated into 'The English maiden' and the 'English wife,' and Mr. Spark's 'Life of Ledyard, the American Traveller' is only made more attractive as 'Memoirs of Ledyard, the African Traveller' (anon), and two volumes of his 'Writings of Washington,' in 12 vols., are reprinted with the original title and apparently as if complete. Dr. Harris' 'Natural History of the Bible,' 'Bancroft's Translation of Heeren's politics of Greece,' and Everett's 'Translation of Buttmann's Greek Grammar' were all reprinted and sold as English books. Judge Story's 'Law of Bailments' was chopped into fragments, and appended, here and there, by Mr. Theobald, in his notes on Sir William Jones. These are a few specimens. One more may be mentioned: Mr.

Neal, of Philadelphia, published, about 1839, a volume called 'Charcoal Sketches,' with illustrations; his name appended in full. This volume appears entire, plates and all, in the middle of 'Pio Nic Papers,' etc., 'edited by C. Dickens, Esq. 3 vols: London, 1841,' &c. The American books reprinted in England, as English, within the last ten years, according to the same authority, are reported as follow:

This will help us to an understanding, not only of what has been done by American authorship in ten years, but what is the estimate of its value, by a people, to whose opinions we slavishly defer, and whose judgments upon us are always studiously disparaging. Mr. Putnam, in farther considering this subject, adds:

"We have also good English authority for the opinion, that the Hebrew Grammar, by Nordheimer; the Hebrew-English Lexicon, by Robinson; the Greek Lexicon to the New Testament, by the same; the Commentary on Isaiah, by Barnes; System of Theology, by Dwight; Geography of Palestine, by Robinson; Anthon's Text Books; Prescott's 'Ferdinand and Isabella'; 'Medical Jurisprudence,' by Beck; Ray's 'Jurisprudence of Insanity'; and 'Webster's Dictionary of the English (!!!) Language,' are all the best works, in their several departments, in the language."

The popularity of Cooper and Irving and Brockden Brown, and others of our belles-lettres writers in England is already known, and Mr. Putnam tells us that the "only translations known in English of the classical works of Eschenburg, Butmann, Gesenius, Jahn, Ramshorn and Winer are the American." From the same comprehensive pamphlet, we take the following table, which will assist the reader greatly in his inquiry into a subject hitherto too little regarded. It proposes to show, though necessarily very imperfectly, the number of American publications for the last fifteen years.

Here the domestic supply exceeds the foreign one, and this is the result of but fifteen years of exercise in a department entirely new to the intellect and the energies of the nation. This table too, it may be well to remember, includes only the publications of the chief marts of literature, Boston, New York, Philadelphia and New Haven. The publications of obscure presses in cities not notoriously publishing are scarcely likely to enter into such an estimate. But let us give another of Mr. Putnam's tables, giving the American publications for one year only,—that of 1834.

This table fails to include the law and medical publications. It fails also to regard the periodical works which form and have always formed—and, we may add, will always form—so large a portion of American Literature;* but with all these defi-

* The vast extent of our territory, and the sparseness of our population, will always tend to the large employment of periodicals, particularly monthly and weekly publications, for the diffusion among the more remote settlements of the amount of literary, social and political knowledge which they require. This condition of the country leads to the publication of a large proportion and greater variety of these works, than, we suspect, is the case in any country, however extensive, of Europe. Not only do most of the States possess their literary periodicals, whether quarterly, monthly or weekly, but, in some of the States, they are numerous, of all sizes and degrees of power. In addition to these there are numerous literary newspapers (so called) which furnish that strange melange—a sort of mental olla-podrida,—with which our English brethren seem to be particularly disquieted. The taste of these publications is certainly none of the best,—wanting in congruity, and jumbling together, in one mass, the most irreconcilable objects of study and reflection. But they are addressed to a poor people, who have just a sufficient appreciation of Literature to demand the commodity, and who have not yet reached that degree of literary acumen which prompts them to resolve upon quality in preference to quantity. In Europe, the same class of persons want bread rather than literature; and, so far, the fact is not unfavorable to the American. Of our periodicals, if they cannot claim to be fully equal to the ablest of the foreign, they at least make such an approach to it as to render some of their articles, (as we have seen,) acceptable as original, to the pages of London and contemporaneous reviews. Our monthly periodicals we regard as quite equal, and, in some respects, superior to the average of British monthlies. That they are more honest, as more independent of book publishers and political parties, is beyond either doubt or question. Nor do they emanate from a single publishing section, but appear in almost every quarter of our widely extended country;—a circumstance which, besides the advantages which it afciencies, it cannot fail to be remarked with pride and wonder, that the domestic is still far superior to the foreign supply, showing conclusively the fact that the intellectual resources of the nation are fully adequate to its wants; and that, with no more encouragement than is required to put the native on a simple footing of equality, in the market, with the foreign author, the latter must have been nearly, or wholly superseded. Thus we see, that, in almost every department of letters, the works of original American production—Education, Theology, History, Biography, Jurisprudence, &c—exceeds the reprints of foreign in a proportion, not less than three to one; the one exception to this fact, to which we have drawn the attention of the reader by an asterisk (*)—that of novels and tales, or, as we may say, purely original and inventive Literature—being one to which we may be permitted in this place to devote a few moments of consideration. Lest any hasty judgment may conceive the relative deficiency in this class of writings, in the American side of our table, to result from any want of those creative and imaginative resources which are chiefly requisite to the production of all works of fiction,—we may suggest some of the peculiar disadvantages and difficulties under which this particular branch of native authorship exists. This disability results from the greater proportion of writers engaged in this species of composition than in any other. While, for example, Great Britain possesses not more than five living historians, she possesses more than fifty professional writers of fiction, not to speak of hundreds more, who occasionally go aside from other walks, to try their powers in this department. The American writer of fiction is consequently exposed to a degree of competition, to which no other branch of literary labor is subjected. Some idea of this competition may be gathered from the vast number of the reprints of European novels and tales (95) reported in one year of our table; and yet these form but a really small number of the works of this class produced annually in Great Britain. The seductions of this species of writing brings hundreds into the field of competition, while the colder and more laborious character of the studies in history, biography and metaphysics, serve always to keep the number of laborers within certain and easily defined limits. Besides, we do not find that the American biographer or historian is at all engaged in competition with the European. The works of biography and history, written by Americans, are fords of easy diffusion, tends also to the greater originality and independence of their tone, modes of thinking and expression. In addition to these, similarly scattered over our immense territory, are 1640 newspapers, daily, tri-weekly or weekly, all of which, in greater or less degree, furnish their readers with a certain amount of original and selected varieties, and are, to a certain extent, injurious to the regular business of a professional literature. ●

most usually devoted to American subjects, subjects of which the European student is either totally unaware, or to which he is, in all probability, wholly indifferent. Thus, with the exception of Irving's Conquest of Granada, which is semi-historical in character, and Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, we do not, at this moment, recall the name of a single American historian who has gone out of America for his subject. It follows from this, that, while the American historian, or biographer, free from competition, is almost sure of a publisher,—the American novelist must take his chance, in the same field, with hundreds of others, all of whom, as their works cost nothing to the American publisher are likely to be preferred before him. Unless he has already obtained a local reputation, which renders it inevitable that an eager demand will be found for his writings, he may wait for months, and even years, without provoking the consideration of the publisher; and hundreds of works are written, equal in merit to one third of the European reprints, which, as the authors have not yet acquired the "magic of a name" are offered to the publishers, gratuitously, and in vain. This is a point which shall be resumed hereafter.

Enough, we think, has been already said to show the value of American Literature, its sudden rise into importance, the number of its productions, their great variety, and intrinsic value. This value, too, we have endeavored, incidentally, to show, being attached to them, not merely by any excess of national self-esteem, but, in the absolute want of it, and, even against their own will, by our hereditary enemies. We have seen that, while the British continue to sneer at the American intellect, its resources in fancy and imagination—the arts of general letters, they do so in the teeth of the vital fact that they are consuming—nay, preferring—the fruits of American Literature, in almost every department—our works of history and education—our belles-lettres, theology, and jurisprudence. We do not dwell upon the humiliating fact, that they are making these appropriations clandestinely, disfiguring the commodities which they steal, in order to prevent their recognition. It is enough for our purpose, that they make use of the commodity, that they approve of it, applaud it, and frequently prefer it to their own.

Such, then, is the history of American Literature for the twenty years in which it was struggling into existence. Such were its triumphs and achievements in spite of every disadvantage, in spite of the competition with the intellect of the maternal nation—speaking the same language—in possession of the same market, and secure, not only of the market, but of the exclusive faith and confidence of the American people. In that brief period, amidst these disadvantages and disabilities, we produced our metaphysicians, our historians, our philosophers, our poets, our novelists, and, through them, compelled a hearing in the European courts of art and refinement, as we had already done, through our statesmen and warriors, in the cabinets of European politics. What might have been augured from such a beginning? What a long and glorious future was to be inferred from such a dawn! The calculation rests with every reader. Enough for us to say that, according to all reasonable measures of conjecture, it would seem to be impossible, easily,—the circumstances being suffered to remain unchanged—

"To fix a barrier to the giant's strength
Or curb his swiftness in the forward race."

But the circumstances of his career were not suffered to remain unchanged. His strength has suddenly been paralyzed, his swiftness has been curbed, his limbs are no longer free, his flight is no longer upward, onward, contending for the goal. He lies prostrate—his limbs fettered—his strength and spirit humbled and prostrate in the dust. American Literature is as suddenly silent as if it never had a voice. Its authors, if they have not ceased to write, have almost ceased to publish. Some of them, through sheer necessity, are driven to other and less congenial occupations; and the books which are now given us from the press, are a kind which, evidently, if they give bread to publisher and printer, can afford little or nothing to the writer. The inquiry into the cause of this singular and sudden change must be reserved for another communication.

I am, sir, with sentiments
Of real respect, very Faithfully yours,
W. GILMORE SIMMS.

NIGHT.

BY ANNA MARIA HIRST.

There is a holy silence in the air,
An audible stillness soothing to the ear;
The moon is passing in a golden glare
Over the azure of the starry sphere,
Save, when a cloud of fleecy, silvery grey,
Dims for a moment her delicious ray.

Hail to the Night, the noble, nun-like Night!
The city slumbers in a sleep, as sound
As though some seraph on an earthward flight
Around the scene a heavenly charm had wound,
And over mortal eyes a spell had shed
To make this seem—a city of the dead!

Nought breaks the silence but the cricket's note,
An orison that breathes the singer's bliss,
Poured thankfully from out its tiny throat
Upon the low breeze that my brow doth kiss—
A lay of love in joy, in rapture given.
To One, who hears it 'mid the hymns of heaven.

I gaze from out my lattice, and I see
 Each loftier object glow with liquid light;
 Palace and prison, temple, spire and tree,
 Rise up, like Titans, gleaming on the night;
 And far away the river runs, its breast
 Dimpled with stars that lie in dreamy rest.

I love the day, the sun, the liquid sky,
 Undimmed and stainless as was once my heart
 When life was like a garden, and my eye
 Had seen no sorrow, nor I'd felt its smart,
 For it doth seem a warrior, clad in light;
 But more I love the melancholy Night—

The noble night; for, over my spirit's care,
 She breathes a soft and all subduing charm;
 And, in the coolness of the midnight air,
 When seated in my chamber, dark and warm,
 I trace the presence of God's guardian things,
 And deem its breath the fannings of their wings.

B. B. DONNA FLORIDA,

A Poetical Tale, by the author of "Atalantis," Southern Passages and Pictures," &c. Charleston, Burges and James. 1843.

The Author of this Poem, Mr. Simms of South Carolina, is the most extensive, and one of the most popular writers in the South. Every department of authorship has engaged his attention, and in each no inconsiderable success has crowned his efforts. Even northern exclusiveness has admitted him to a participation in the bright rewards of fame. Had his literary efforts been even far less successful, great would have been his meed of praise, for his high aims and noble resistance to the tendencies and circumstances by which he was surrounded. The genius of the South is glowing, but yet how little is it employed in sustained and continuous literary pursuits! The eloquence, which so often pours forth in the forum, the legislative hall and on the hustings can be and is transferred to the inspiring page; but how seldom and, comparatively, by how few! Hence, it often happens that the pens of scholars and orators amongst us are rude and most ungraceful. Yet, Mr. Simms has made Literature his profession, his maintenance and his delight. History acknowledges his services; Fiction, well pleased, exultingly bears his conceptions to Nature and Nature owns them; and Poetry greets him with her smile; whilst Virtue makes no complaint for the injustice too often inflicted upon her. Were Mr. Simms to present himself to the Goddess of Poetry to receive the most welcome smile, to which he is entitled, he would not take "Donna Florida" as his offering; but we do not hesitate to say that this offering would be acceptable. "Atalantis" is of a higher aim and higher attainment, and "Southern Passages and Pictures" would better sustain the author's title to the reputation of a Poet.

After two careful perusals, we commend Donna Florida to our readers, because its perusal will well repay them, because it has beauty and humor; because it is a continuous poem, with variety of incident and delineations of character. One who looks into Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America," will find that we have an almost countless throng of poetical writers; and, when he has gone through that long list, he can sum up many others not included in it, and who are just as worthy of a place as many who are. If he be a lover of poetry and ambitious of his country's fame in this charming department, he will ask, where are the bold conception, the sustained design, the outwrought idea of the master mind! Here, some production will arrest his attention, displaying no common genius, but the subject is often unworthy, is not elaborated and is evidently hastily despatched. The monthly, the weekly, the daily call and they print. Hardly one "longing after immortality," one ray of Hope beyond the grave, inspires their song, or illuminates their pages. Poets, of America! be not so impatient;—hoard your wealth; garner your thoughts in the store house of your minds, and let them "tarry long in their inner chambers." So shall the little you may do outweigh, outlast, outshine all that you ever have done, or ever can do, as you now seek Fame. Better far to leave one rare jewel to your children, never having seen it sparkle on yourselves, than deck yourselves with imitation gems whilst you live. Value not so much the mere sheen and flash, as the excellence and preciousness of that which emits it. Aim higher. You versify enough; but walk more difficult paths, attempt higher flights, that will require the sustained wavings of your bright pinions. Plan, study, execute for immortality. Eagles of thought, fly straight towards the Sun!

But, in our earnestness, we forget Donna Florida. This poem, occupying four cantos, was mostly the production of the author's youth, and, as such, he confesses a partiality for it, which induced him to publish it, notwithstanding some weighty objections in his own mind. Being of that class of persons, who endeavor to form a just judgment relatively to all the circumstances, we are glad it was published. The author's candor has, in the preface, given a fair criticism of the poem and, of course, he must expect many to concur with him. The metre and style of the Poem are borrowed from Don Juan, which the author thinks unfortunate. All poems are likely, in these respects, to resemble others that have been written; yet the more celebrated and unique the model, the more will the imitation suffer from the contrast. But the author has not borrowed his thoughts, nor his subject from Byron. It is true that the waywardness of his reflections, and the melange of pathos, humor and sober thought are copied after the Noble Bard, and there are many points of resemblance, many concurrent ideas; but the delineations of character are the author's own. Still the poem suffers greatly from the contrast with its original, in every respect, but one. It discards, with one or two slight exceptions, the impurity of its model. Having said thus much, we will proceed to consider the poem, pretty much as if Don Juan had never been written.

The subject is the Love of Don Ponce De Leon and his adventures in America, whither he comes in search of the fabled "Fountain of Youth." The constant readers of the Messenger may recollect an article that appeared some time since, from the pen of another South Carolinian, on this subject.

The story purports to be told by the author's grandam, on whose tongue many legends warmed, "some beyond scope of rhyme and more of reason."

The poet says,

"And if to you such legends be dear,
Sit down, and while the warm South is breathing o'er us,
We'll bring the spirits of the Past before us."

There lived in Arrágon, a most beautiful, though fickle and teasing maiden, the envy of every lass and the adored of every beau. She did not scruple to trifle with the hearts that sought her favor, and returned with scorn the hate of the envious;

"She heard the sighs of man and groans of woman,
With an indifference that was scarcely human."

Her various charms the poet sets forth with almost wearying prolixity; and makes her, indeed, a lovely coquettish creature. "Her eyes the polar lights in Love's astrology;" her mouth, "that rosy bible on which love has sworn." She was young, scarce sixteen—"graceful as any willow by the wave;" and very much like Araby's daughter;

"Lovely as any pearl beneath the tide,
Down 'neath the Mexic waters, deep but clear."

But we do not see the beauty of the useless repetition in these two lines. The Poet heaps too many pretty things upon his heroine and the description is so unnecessarily protracted, that it is interrupted in several places. Yet the author seems to have "had his eyes open;" for he boldly declares,

"With a tradesman dread,
Lest you should not appreciate my wares,
I'll dwell at large on each particular head, &c."

He should have remembered that tradesmen sometimes prevent an appreciation of their wares, by dwelling too much on their value.

This fair girl had a sire, "a thick, short, gouty, drowsy, frowsy knight," who cared for nothing, but "how to boil eggs," and left her to do as she pleased. Among the numerous suitors of the Lovely Leonora, there was one whose fame, won in the Moorish wars, had filled the nation. This was Ponce de Leon, the bravest of the brave, but time had laid its silver on his head, and something of its stiffness on his limbs. He woos the lass, reckless of her mischief; and, Othello-like, strives to move her by his dangers past and glories won. But "When he boasted in his loudest strain,

She said, 'ah! me, you can't do that again!
You're old now, good Don Ponce, your brightest days
Have vanished in the wars.'"

The sturdy knight laid vigorous siege; but his attacks were less effectual, than they had been upon the Moorish castles, and he was forced to retire in despair; but not without a serious expostulation with Leonora. Most disconsolate Ponce—and all, the Poet says, for want of Quirk's patent wig! But the Romantic tale of a Portuguese sailor soon revives his hopes, and the withering Ponce dreams of tasting a draught of immortal youth. He rushes to the presence of Leonora, who mocks at his wondrous tale, though related by the "soberest man on earth" and attested by the Alcayde. Ponce holds up the record and beseeches her to read it.

"The maiden laugh'd more merrily than ever;
'You read it, good Don Ponce;' she slyly cried.
'What, take precedence of a lady, never!—
'No, dearest, I would have you satisfied';
Again the lady laughed; the knight was clever;
Prompt at evasion, though it touch'd his pride;
For on his cheek a deep red flush'd the brown—
But still he kept the paper upside down.

"And, spite of all her laughter, he proceeded:
'Be mine, dear Leonora. Let us seek
That fountain, then—its waters, haply needed
By all, will bring back beauty to my cheek;
Life, youth and love, not ignorantly pleaded,
From heaven, shall be our ministers, and speak
For each desire that gathers in the breast,
Ere yet it rises to our thoughts confess'd.

"The youth that is perpetual, won from heaven,
Shall bless us twain on earth. The flow'rs shall bloom
Perennial, and all blessings shall be given,
Unqualified, untainted, free from doom;—
No treasure then can from our grasp be riven,
Life shall have no denial, earth no tomb;
Days dawn and set, and every day endear ye
To other days!—'Ah!' said the maid, 'how weary!

"What, shall there be no quarrels—no commotion,
Will tempests sleep—shall I not use my tongue;—
Will the storms cease to scare us on the ocean;
Shall we no more by sweetest woes be wrung;
No widowhood!—no children!—'What a notion!
Replied Don Ponce. 'Why, shall we not be young,
Forever loving, Leonora!—'can, sir,
You stop awhile,' said she, 'and take my answer?

"This fountain, should you find it, is a treasure,
That richly must repay your toil and care;
When you have found it, it shall be my pleasure,—
Provided always that it makes you fair,—
To be your wife, sir, at your earliest leisure,
On one condition more, which you shall hear:
Namely, that you shall bring across the ocean,
Some dozen bottles of this princely lotion.

"They shall be bottled by your knightly hands, sir,
That so there may be no deception done;
You shall, to have the bottles clean, command, sir,
At least three days of washing for each one;
Fill'd, then,—cork'd, sealed and labelled,—understand, sir,—
And thenceforth sacred to my use alone;
You shall, in all your troubles, storms and strifes, sir,
Watch these same bottles as you love your life, sir.

" 'These unto me deliver'd, and your youth
Renew'd, as you avow it then will be;
Your love the same as now, soul full of truth,
No loss of member or of strength to see;
My promise, which I make to you in sooth,
Shall be fulfill'd, bear witness, heaven, for me;
Provided, while you're seeking youth o'er sea, sir,
There comes no lovelier youth a-seeking me, sir.' "

Leonora then sings him a Lay, very unequivocal in its insinuations. "Fizz, fuzz, pop, bang, the knight's rage was terrific." Still, he protests that the waters when bottled lose much of their virtue, and urges Leonora to go over as his bride and see him quaff the rejuvenescent draught,—but she was

"Sorry she could not then afford relief;
Must first behold the change on beard and hair;
And then, if no one better graced came seeking,
He might renew, on terms, his present speaking."

Leonora's treatment of Don Ponce is malicious and heartless; but, allowing for the intentional exaggeration and burlesque of the author, true to Nature. What a dance, do young belles, even now, often lead "old bachelor" lovers! The ordinary associations connected with this subject constitute one defect of the Poem; but there are many accessories, skillfully used by the poet, which counteract their influence.

No alternative is left the defeated Ponce, but to seek that enchanted Fountain. With saddest heart, tho' tearless eye, he bids adieu to Spain, and follows the sun as he goes "down behind the billow's breast."

Like Harold, he pours forth his lament, which suffers from the contrast, though there are some good things in it. His indignation breaks out against the relentless beloved, for

"Packing him forth o'er sea and wood and mountain
To bottle water for you from that fountain."

Hope of gain, love of adventure, flight from punishment and attachment to himself had collected him a bold and motley crew. Among them was "a tall, brave looking lad, whose sparkling eye secured the Knight's attention."

" 'Your name? Who are you?'—thus to the unknown Spake Ponce de Leon.—'We have met before!'
'Perchance,' replied the youth; 'but I am one
You know not—of my lineage proud, but poor;—
Of friends bereft, by cruel fate undone,
I seek my fortune on the Indian shore;—
I feel that I have in me soul and strength,
And trust in God to make them known at length.' "

" 'Tis a brave spirit;—but, declare your name!'
'That I must make;—a pride that will not bear
The sting of sympathy, and feels its shame,
Forbids me yield my father's to your ear:
Too proudly chronicled by deeds of fame,
Let it be silent till mine own appear;
When I have won my laurels I will speak,
What now would bring the blush upon my cheek! "

" 'Meanwhile, I am Don Ferdinand de Laye,
Provençal lineage;—this shall be my style;
Till, with occasion, I may pierce my way
To glory, that my deeds may win one smile!—

'Ha! then, you love?'—The youth responded 'yea,'
And a slight redness tinged his cheek the while,—
'I love, Don Ponce, but love without a penny
Is sure, in Spain, the maddest love of any.' "

" 'Unless it be the grey-beard love;' our knight Thoughtfully murmured. 'Strange!' he mused a space;
'This youth and I were both in better plight
Were we but fortun'd in each other's case;
Had he my wealth, his barriers would be slight,
Mine were all tumbled an I wore his face;—
The devil take these women—how they worry us,
Tease, tear, vex, wear, and flurry, hurry, scurry us! "

Don Ponce makes this proud lad his confidant and unceasingly pours his laments into his ear. This De Laye was Leonora's own Alphonso: and when no one was near he feasted his heart with her love-breathing letter. De Laye, too, sings his parting strain:

"That sun which sinks with glorious train
Beneath the dark blue sea,
Shall hail me when he soars again,
Far distant, love, from thee;
Yet when he rises in the east,
I'll fancy that he bears
A tribute from thy heaving breast,
Affection's gift of tears."

"Yet, though the soothing dream be vain,
Of joys at future meeting;
Of early bliss renew'd again,
As dear and not so fleeting;
Yet shall the bird of better days
From memory's labyrinth wander,
To glad the pilgrim's devious ways,
With music sweeter, fonder."

"Yes, thou wilt watch that sun's last tint,
As in the west declining,
Thou seest him leave his latest print
On rocks where I am pining;
And think and fancy brighter days,
When we may see it streaming
Its fires upon our mutual gaze,
In milder lustre gleaming."

"Farewell, the home that hope endears,
Where young contentment found me,
Nursed in the arms of friendly years,
With spring-flowers bursting round me;
Farewell, dear maid,—yet, ah! the song
That wakes such fond emotion,
Is silenced in that thunder gong,
That shakes the realm of ocean."

After a long voyage they reach America, where opens the fourth and best Canto, containing much really heroic. The author now invokes the Muse and takes occasion to pay a patriotic tribute to his country. The Poet should ever seek to celebrate and exalt his land.

"She must have health and strength—a wing that soaring
Through cloud and storm may make the heavens her own;
An eye that far, thro' depth of sky exploring,
May challenge the keen glances of the sun;
A wealth of thoughts and images outpouring,
Worthy the wondrous world; her wing hath won;
And, still subservient to her song, the splendor,
Of all that makes her realm, of rich, and wild, and tender!

"Her rocks, her streams, her mountains as they stand,
Homes of the pure, the beautiful in heaven;
Skies softly set, that, spreading o'er the land,
Show brides of rare beauty, morn and even;
And oh! the mighty rivers, wild and grand,
With seas that leap from heights by thunder riven;
And all the thousand tributary sights,
That in our forest land, reveal such dear delights.

"Of these must she partake,—whatever glory,
Boon Nature yields us of the bright, the fair,
Shall, in her every feature, have its story,
Prove her original and make her dear:
The giant tree by years and moss made hoary,
The wondrous cavern and the fountain clear;
Hills, vales and streams must still reflect her beauty,
Inspire her strain and win her constant duty.

"A rare and wondrous form, she rises slowly,
Even by her own magnificence oppress;
Though proud her glance, yet is her aspect holy,
As speaking the sweet peace within her breast;
Though distant still, yet neither dim nor lowly,—
The single star that flames upon her crest
Shall blaze upon the nations till they own,
The sovereign is most worthy of the throne."

Don Ponce and his hardy warriors, De Laye second in command, are soon engaged in deadly conflict with the Indians. Leonora is their watchword; and as De Laye even more loudly utters that dear sound, the ignorant Ponce applauds his devotion to his leader. Foremost in the fight is De Laye. He breaks the ranks of the enemy, "whirls, shouts and stands alone." Now comes the gallant Seminole to meet him. What can be more grand than the noble son of Nature, stepping forth in the pride of prowess, the solemnity of battle and the majesty of his free forest and mountain spirit! Thus appears Mico.

"Never did Art in happiest hour unfold,
So proud a presence;—never to the eye,
Did mortal, fashioned in superior mould,
The cunning scrutiny of Art defy;
Or woman love, or rival man behold
A shape more perfect in its symmetry:
The Apollo, with his ready shaft to strike,
Was only not inferior, yet how like!

"The lion in his port, and in his glance,
The eagle, free, commercing with the sun;
Yet, subtle as the serpent's, to entrance,
The victim that he only looks upon;
How swift and yet how graceful his advance,—
How fearless, as with fight already won;
He seeks no common foe, no feeble prey,
But, scorning all beside, at once confronts De Laye."

We wish we could venture to give, in full, the conflict between the two champions. It was of varied success and of doubtful issue for some time; at length, the horse of De Laye is slain and his sword shivered by the battle axe of the Indian. Whilst the Spaniard is avoiding the fast blows of the vigorous chief, and all escape from death seems well nigh hopeless, a pistol shot prostrates the Indian; but the magnanimous De Laye spares his fallen foe and he is borne from the field. Don Ponce did not appreciate this noble chivalry and blamed De Laye for sparing the heathen's life. "Saul had slain his thousands, but David his tens of thousands," and jealousy was now burning in the breast of De Leon. In rage, he strode the bloody field, muttering curses on his rival, and coldly slaying the wounded Indians. Now, too, he complains of De Laye's taking the name of Leonora upon his lips. Still his jealousy he conceals, and

"Smiling, smirking, like an ancient sinner,
He kept his wrath in cool till after dinner."

Thus abruptly terminates Donna Florida, before we have got to the title of the book. We have dwelt so much upon it, because it is a Southern poem, which afforded us pleasure, and gave us occasion to offer a few suggestions, deemed important; and because we wished, by a full analysis, to give the public, whose award the author awaits, the means of deciding whether it shall be continued and finished. It is but an "introduction" to a story sufficiently interesting in the sight of the author and susceptible of poetical embellishment to make him desirous of giving it a proper shape and utterance." Whether he will continue it, in this form, or not, depends upon the decision of the reading public. We can not but deem it injudicious and unsatisfactory to invoke the public judgment of a contemplated production from a mere "introduction," which confessedly furnishes no clue to the interest of the sequel. We say yes; not because the author would stake his reputation upon it; but because, without attempting a great deal, it is interesting and highly creditable, and the American Muse should be encouraged to take extended and contiguous flights. The sequel, too, will command the matured powers of the author and will certainly embody a pure and lofty home-patriotism.

With a few critical remarks, we will dismiss the Poem. The digressions are, to use the author's own words, "too long and too artificial, for the success of a composition, which, forbearing personal sarcasm and domestic satire, makes no appeal to those vulgar tastes, which delight in nothing half so much." The reflections are often just and well-timed; but sometimes the author, we suppose, gives place to humor rather than to his true sentiments. In some passages, the good and bad in human nature are well contrasted, as in the case of woman. Sometimes, too little attention is paid to perfecting the rhyme and metre. However, a little irregularity may relieve monotony. We have marked some places where there appears to be too sudden a descent in the style, or sentiment; as in this, when De Laye spares Mico;

"A generous feeling in his bosom swelling
Denies that one so fearless, battling so,
Should perish prostrate, weaponless and maim'd;—
A feeling that Don Ponce severely blamed."

Leonora would hardly speak thus to Alphonso, in a love letter:

"Perchance 'twere wisdom to impose a check on
Your ardent spirit, when you reach those shores,
Lest you should find some Indian's venom'd arrow,
When you least think it, sticking in your marrow."

In description, a writer may ridicule and burlesque any thing, however serious, if it suits his humor or his purpose; but when he puts language into the mouth of another, it must be suitable to the feelings and sentiments of the speaker. Fickle and coquettish as Leonora was, she would not trifle with De Laye. She might use the following, in ridicule of Don Ponce:

"Yet should you of these waters get supplies,
Fill me some dozen bottles, cork and seal 'em,
Or find a way from old Don Ponce to steal 'em."

Still it may be doubted whether the poet has not been a little inconsistent in making Leonora satirise, as it were, her sex's weakness and love of cosmetics.

We were struck with the truth of the following paradox in social and domestic philosophy—

"Its (the world's) double singles and divided pairs."

It well expresses the too frequent divisions of closest unions and the resources of individual happiness. We wish we could, in conclusion, give you the denouement of the tale. Let us guess. De Laye gains verdant laurels in the South; turns out to be the son of Don Ponce, is acknowledged by him, receives his wealth, marries Leonora, and brings her to this country, where she becomes Donna Florida. Thus Don Ponce consoles himself with a daughter-in-law instead of a wife and goes down to the tomb, his youth as unrenowned as if he had never heard of the immortal Fountain.

CHAOS.

BY WM. OLAND BOURNE.

ORDER sprung out of Chaos! Darkness deep
Enshrouded Earth, which had no form nor mould,
While howling winds the turbid waters sweep
Along the shore in mountain billows rolled;
Here, satyrs 'mid the gloom fit converse hold,
And spirits of the deep their counsels laid,
While sea to shore the solemn mysteries told
In whispering ripples, when the storm 'was staid,
To give its audience to the silent sternade.

The beetling crag raised high his rugged brow,
Like some dark prince of night in awful mood,
Till wide-spread, wild convulsion laid it low,
Leaving its fragments where it once had stood;
Or there the shifting rock sublimely rude,
Denuded of its soil in silence lay,
Without a root to spring in solitude;
Or fierce volcanic fires intestine play,
Heaving a thousand hills and strata while they may.

No fertile vale retired in modest bloom,
To shrink from sight while decked in beauty's robe,
No fragrant flowers shed round their rich perfume
To please the sentient wanderers of the globe—

Nor birds nor bees the honeyed goblets probe;
No lofty trees their fruitful branches rear,
No gladdened beasts the annual yield consume,
No sun rolls round to mark the changing year—
The darkened spot of earth is desolate and drear.

And this was CHAOS! Nature knew no rest,
But the loud roar of Ocean with its surge
Poured full upon Oblivion's awful breast
Its wrathful, deep, and unrecorded dirge;
Alarmed at sounds like these, the shores emerge
In mural cliffs, and every element
Which spoke its ragings to the farthest verge
Of Earth's extended void, in wildness spent,
Sported with earth and sea and rent the firmament.

But order, peace, and law must be supreme,
And Anarchy must leave his terror-throne;
To die away at Heaven's effulgent beam
And leave no impress where he once was known;
Then on the lab'ring void a ray was thrown,
Leaping in glory from the fount of light,
Owning no source but God's command alone
To fill the wide expanse, and make it bright,
And drive to deeper gloom the shadowy veil of night.

Behold the change, and with unshaken eye,
And strong unwavering powers behold the scene!
See where the fallen and conquered princes lie,
Tamed and subdued to see the light serene,
As Day flings forth his broad reviving sheen;
See the wild ruin on the page of gloom,
Which stamped its heel upon the young terrene,
As, just escaping from the troubled womb
Of unknown night, it felt its vigors spring and bloom.

"LET THERE BE LIGHT!" and all the universe
Awoke in smiles to greet the dawning year,
And the glad song with ceaseless praise rehearse;
Creation strung its lyre, and swept its clear
And rich, harmonious tones from sphere to sphere;
Joy leaped upon its course with quickened bound,
Till realms illimitable gladly hear
The swelling notes, and catching quick the sound,
Send it to farther worlds to speed its course around!

PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

A book of thoughts and arguments, originally treated. By Martin Farquhar Tupper, Esq., M. A. of Christ Church, Oxford. London, Joseph Rickerby (1st. series) 1838. J. Hatchard and Son, 187 Picadilly, second series, 1842. Philadelphia, Herman Hooker, both series in one vol; 1843.

We had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with Tupper's brilliant thoughts, several years ago, in Philadelphia, during a most joyous period, at the house of a clerical friend, to whom the first series of the London Edition had been presented. Charmed with its Christian philosophy, its deep reflection, its exalted sentiment and its poetry, its pages gave no little delight. We were not long in seeking to possess it. Sure enough, Jonathan had found out its merits; but being too anxious to turn a penny, had jumbled its nicely divided verses into close paragraphs. It was too much like finding favorite poetry printed en masse, and we declined the purchase. Since then, several efforts to obtain the work proved ineffectual, until a short time since, when, in Philadelphia, we borrowed our old acquaintance and were able to procure the second series of the London Edition. But now we are indebted to Mr. Hooker for the entire Work, neatly and beautifully arranged like the original. We wished it for the purpose of treating the readers of the Messenger to some of its gems. There is one circumstance connected with the American edition important enough to be mentioned. In the absence of an International Copyright Law, Mr. Tupper sold his imprimatur to Mr. Hooker and called upon the honor of the American publishers, not to interfere with his reward.

That the work will commend itself to all tastes as it does to ours, we do not expect; for some have a horror of philosophy and of sober serious reflection. In these days of laughter-loving and comicality, many like humor only. We derive much enjoyment from a hearty cackination, and we trust have an appreciation of wit, of which, among all the fun so prevalent, there is now so very little. But that mind is not to be envied which enjoys the light and the humorous only and always, and has no taste for moral and religious sentiments. Tupper's thoughts are numerous, and many of them exquisite and poetically expressed; but there is hardly a light one among them; though he finely exhibits the value and importance of smallest trifles. The chapters are short and can be read at intervals, thus not wearying any with their lofty seriousness. Some will say, "Have we not the proverbs of Solomon, and who wants any more?" Tupper himself shall answer—

"What, though a guilty man renew that hallowed theme,
And strike, with feebler hand, the harp of Sirach's son?
What though a youthful tongue take up that ancient parable,
And utter faintly forth dark sayings, as of old?
Sweet is the virgin honey though the wild bee have stored
it in a reed;
And fair the living flowers, that spring from the dull cold sod.
Wherefore, thou gentle student bend thine ear to my speech?
Commend thy mind to candor and grudge not as though thou hast a teacher,
Nor scorn angelic Truth for the sake of her evil herald,
Heed not him, but hear his words and care not whence they come.
The viewless winds might whisper them, the billows roar them forth.
Let us walk together in the shaded paths of meditation;
And charity not be a stranger at the board that is spread for brothers."

Surely the reader must now be prepared to judge with mildness and charity, and will not let his "Judgment set her seal until she hath poised her balance."

The topics treated are numerous and diverse; familiar, yet important; associated with the home-spun duties of life and yet linked with the loftiest aims and aspirations of the human mind. In his graspings after the sublime, the author sometimes becomes turgid and a little grandiloquent; after the original, sometimes incongruous, but seldom obscure. To many, his thoughts will appear often labored; and the wonder will be whence came this,—it is strained and not the spontaneous outpouring even of a gifted mind. This is, doubtless, sometimes true. But some minds are so full of thought, so expanded in the range of their associations, so teeming with rich suggestions, that their ordinary flow seems forced to those of more contracted sphere. It is as natural for Niagara to pour its earthquake flood as for the rivulet to trickle down the hill. Tupper draws from every legitimate source; and the useful Arts and Practical Sciences have furnished him many beautiful and striking illustrations. How beautifully and forcibly he has unfolded some of the many paradoxes in human life! "Truth in things false;" "Good in things evil;" "Hidden uses;" "Indirect influences;" "Trifles" and the like. The tone of the whole is deeply religious, as are many of the subjects.

"To meanest matters I will stoop, for mean is the lot of mortal;
I will rise to noblest themes, for the soul hath an heritage of glory;
The passions of puny man; the majestic characters of God;
The feverish shadows of Time, and the mighty substance of Eternity."

These are the themes and for the most part they are worthily and wisely treated. Wisdom must have charms and communion for one who can thus portray her.

"Few and precious are the words which the lips of wisdom utter:

To what shall their rarity be likened? * * * * *

They be chance pearls, flung among the rocks by the sullen waters of oblivion,
Which Diligence loveth to gather and hang round the neck of Memory:

They be white-winged seeds of happiness, wafted from the islands of the blessed,

Which Thought carefully tendeth in the kindly garden of the heart:

They be drops of the golden dew, which the wings of angels scatter,

When on some brighter Sabbath, they quiver most with delight.

Yet more, for the half is not said of their might and dignity and value;

For life-giving be they, and glorious, and redolent of sanctity and Heaven.

As the beaded bubbles, that sparkle on the rim of the cup of Immortality;

As wreaths of the rainbow spray, from the pure cataracts of Truth.

They be gleams of the day spring from on high, shed from the windows of the skies."

For the sake of brevity, the collocation of some of these has been altered, which mars their beauty.

In such a work, one would suppose that every thing was suited to all political creeds. But this, like all others, exhibits one of the characteristic glories of the English mind; its complete identification with the land of its pride. How thoroughly imbued are British authors with a spirit of Nationality—ever upholding and maintaining the principles and policy of their vast empire! American Literature will want its stimulus and its reward, until a like spirit sways our national mind. For this end, we must be more cut off from the constant imbibing of British and other foreign ideas and feelings, which now strangles and drowns our nationality. These United States are the most curious and in some respects the sublimest Paradox and wonder in the world. Standing in the midst of powerful opponents, who are almost omnipresent by the influence of their genius and the improvements of Art and are anxious to fulfil their prophecies and wishes, by making our system prove a failure, we receive, with open minds and arms, every thing foreign, whether in Literature, Science or Art, however it may militate against the principles on which our Institutions are founded, or the interests that cement us. The thoughts of Legitimacy and Aristocracy are not as our thoughts; their hopes, wishes and plans are not as ours; and when sentiments and feelings and agencies engendered by and suitable to them are brought to bear upon us, what can prevent them from producing an effect? The virtue and intelligence of the Nation have resisted and expelled, a great deal that is most pernicious, but the poison may be stronger than the antidote; the tares may choke the wheat; and the enemies of our Principles are designedly and incidentally sewing them thickly in the fertile and now too open fields of this Union.

Foreign ideas are thus constantly imported and imbibed; and to think they have no effect is to dispute the whole doctrine of influences, of cause and effect; to deny the power of mind. At this time, changes are wrought and systems built and overthrown mostly by the power of intellect. Pawns, knights and castles are banished from the political chess board and the game played with Kings, Queens and Bishops. Ten thousand agencies are continually operating unfavorably upon the National sentiment and men of intelligence take foreign texts, (from Alison, for example,) and preach against the vital principles of our National existence, in their gloomy harangues upon the evils under which they say we suffer. Mind must counteract mind. We have Genius of our own. Imbue it with a lofty home-spirit and encourage its labors. An International Copyright Law will do much towards this, and there should be no delay in adopting it. It may be asked, were not Tupper's works published under a quasi copyright law; and would a regular International Copyright Law prevent the publication of English and other foreign works? Certainly not; but the value and character of those published would have to be higher. But we need a counteractive and that will be found only in an elevated National Literature, breathing the very soul of American Liberty and filled with the spirit of American patriotism. To produce this, the Copyright will have vast influence.

Leaving the subject of International Copyright to the abler pen of Mr. Simms, we will pursue our objections to Tupper. In the chapter on Subjection, he enforces submission to "the powers that be;" but does not seem to have drawn the distinction between subordination and submissiveness;—between obedience to Lawful rule and subjection to tyranny. In many passages, just obedience is inculcated; but in the fervor of his compliments to the then Maiden Queen, Victoria, and his zeal for British Policy, he oversteps the bounds of Truth and Justice and makes a mock at freedom.

"Whence then cometh the doctrine, that all should be equal and free?"

It is the lie that crowded hell, when Seraphs flung away subjection.

No man is his neighbor's equal, for no two minds are similar; And all things, from without and from within, make one man to differ from another."

Mr. Tupper here only repeats the stale objections to the celebrated passage in the Declaration of Independence; which objections we recollect to have met with in the works of one Harriet Martineau. No sensible mind could ever have thought that Thomas Jefferson and his compatriots had not observed the inequalities in the personal endowments and conditions of men. These very inequalities demand that they should all be equally at Liberty to fall into, or to rise to those ranks and positions, for which their differences fit them—not upholding a besotted fool, nor an arbitrary despot on a throne; nor binding perpetually the proud heart and lofty spirit in the shackles of subjection. Thus are all men equal:—to rise, or fall; to enjoy, or suffer; to rule, or bow the neck, as Heaven and their own wills and deeds may direct and prepare them.

The author proceeds—

"Woe unto him, whose heart the syren song of Liberty hath charmed;

Woe unto him whose mind is bewitched by her treacherous beauty;

In mad zeal flingeth he away the fetters of duty and constraint,

And yieldeth up the holocaust of self to that fair Idol of the Damned.

No man hath freedom in aught, save in that from which the wicked would be hindered;

He is free toward God and good; but to all else a bondman."

To be "free toward God and good," he must often be free from man and evil. The smile of approbation can never rest upon him who lightly yields his heart to resistance. But we infer from the ideas of the author, that what he would call "in mad zeal flinging away the fetters of duty and constraint," others whose hearts are charmed by that sweet, not Syren, song of Liberty, would deem and maintain as a laudable assertion of rights. Tupper's philosophy of subjection not only does not suit this people, but, it appears to us, would have upheld the infamous John in his mean and despotic career; and have repressed every longing of the British nation for louder strains of the "Syren Song of Liberty."

THE TWO WARRIORS.

* N. C. BROOKS.

He ordered his winding sheet to be carried as a standard through the city and a crier to proclaim "This is all that remains to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East."
Russell.

I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course.
I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness.—2nd Epis. Timothy, Chap. iv.

I.

Around the dying conqueror hangs
His panoply of war;
The shield and the battered helm that shone
Amid the thick ranks a star,
His blade that had led the battle on—
His lance, and his iron mail
Where oft the sabre's lightning flashed,
And hurled the arrowy hail.

II.

And festooned around the emblazoned wall
The captured banners droop,
While with heavy folds his gonfalon
Bends o'er with an eagle swoop.
To the polished steel and the purple fold
The warrior's eye is dim;
And deaf is his ear to the battle's call,
And to victory's pealing hymn.

III.

Like mockery rise to memory's view.
The deeds of his early fame—
The fields he had made all red with blood—
The imperial halls with flame;
And vain is that guerdon of his toils
The tangle of a crown,
Distained with the blood of countless hosts
In the battle cloven down.

IV.

Now of all the wealth of the cities, poured
In tribute at his feet,
Of all the pride of the captured crowns,
Is left but a winding sheet;
And the heralds bear its snowy folds
Where swept his flag of state;
"Lo! this is all that now remains To SALADIN THE GREAT."

V.

On his buckler of a thousand fights,
The weary warrior bows
His head, with its tresses silver white,
And with blanched and withered brows;
No helmet is now upon his head,
Nor is cuirass on his breast.
His sword is sheathed—his warfare is o'er,
And soon he will be at rest.

VI.

Yet his dim and aged eyes grow bright
With the rays of heavenly truth;
And his face with the kindling glory burns
Of an immortal youth,
Where'er his vision doth fall upon
The Cross he has borne abroad,
With the Spirit's flaming sword unsheathed,
That was stained by the Son of God.

VOL. X—4

VII.

No guilty victories can dismay
The soul of the dying brave;
He bore his sword in the name of God,
And he wounded but to save.
Now the song of triumph greets his ears
In heavenly strains begun;
And his dying eyes behold the crown
That his valorous arm has won.

VIII.

In deathless bliss, by the stream of life
He will tread the ambrosial shore,
Where the summer's heat and the winter's cold
Can pain the sense no more;
His weary feet shall no longer fail,
That the burning desert trod;
And his eyes, grown dim in the cause of Heaven,
Shall behold their maker God.

MR. WEBSTER'S BUNKER HILL ORATION.

The most objectionable feature in Mr. Webster's Oration is a learned attempt to trace back three hundred years, through the phases of philosophical history, for two operative causes, producing in their effects a desire for commercial gain on the one side, and a longing for religious liberty on the other, and then assuming the consequences of these two causes as the two motives, so opposite in merit, which induced the settlements of Virginia and Massachusetts, and then instituting upon this false basis an invidiously unjust comparison between them;—the motive of gain being assigned to those who colonized Virginia, that of seeking religious liberty to the settlers of Massachusetts. First, then, as to the motive of gain as charged upon Virginia.

The motive of commercial gain cannot be proven from history to have planned and executed the expedition to one State more than to the other. For argument sake, I concede the motive assigned to Virginia, and can conceive nothing wrong or disreputable in it—nothing in which she cannot honorably maintain and challenge the most scrutinizing comparison with Massachusetts. Having, then, made the concession of motive on the part of Virginia, it is left for me to prove from history a like motive influencing and fitting out the expedition to Massachusetts. I quote, therefore, from the accurate and learned Bancroft, the favorite historian of New England, vol. I., p. 305: when speaking of the settlers of Massachusetts, who sailed from Leyden, he says—"The whole company constituted a numerous partnership; the services of each emigrant were rated as a capital of two pounds, and belonged to the company; all profits were to be reserved till the end of seven years, when the whole amount, and all houses and lands, gardens and fields, were to be divided among the share-holders according to their respective interests. The London merchant, who risked one hundred pounds, would receive for his money tenfold more than the penniless emigrant for his entire services." Mr. W. may contend that this proof is only applicable to the projectors, who fitted out and dispatched by their means the expedition, and not to the real and actual settlers, whose intention, by their emigration, was permanently to locate themselves. But does he not perceive that the argument cuts both ways? and that, if a distinction is to be introduced to exculpate the actual settlers of Massachusetts from the motive of gain, and to inculpate the projectors of the expedition, the distinction also carries with it the same force in the case of Virginia to free the one class and to bind the other? Having, then, conceded for Virginia, and proven on the part of Massachusetts, that the colonizing expeditions of both were influenced by the same motives, and that if a distinction is to be drawn between the projector and settler, that it is of equal and binding force upon both States, I have, therefore, in the motive of gain, proven a parity between the two settlements, and consequently the falsity of the positions assigned them in the comparison instituted by Mr. W., on that ground, in exaltation of the one at the expense of the other.

Civil society, in all ages of the world, has been divided and subdivided into different classes of men, contradistinguished one from the other by the different manners and customs belonging separately and peculiarly to each. These manners and customs are the arbitrary and legitimate laws established by nature, by which the motives of action and the general principles found to exist in each people separately are made manifest, and traced, with undeviating accuracy, from every posterity of the present to its remotest ancestry of the past, thus forming a consanguineous chain, linked together by manners and customs, to subdue, by its distinguishing marks, the almost immeasurable chasm between the most distant lineage and its far off descent. Mr. Justice Blackstone defines those customs to be legally binding as law and in themselves evidence, that have been used so long "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Customs, therefore, that do now and have immemorially existed in Virginia and Massachusetts, are the proper and accurate criteria by which the principles and motives of action that influenced the settlers of each state, are to be determined. Virginia generosity and hospitality have now become the universal axiom for refined civility. A Virginian's intercourse with his fellow man has ever and always been marked by an effacement of all penuriousness of conduct. Profuse to a fault, that noble trait of character often opens the portals of his heart when prudence would dictate them to be closed. The frosts of adversity nip not his fellow-feeling and the blight of years rolls by him in the exercise of hospitable civility, whilst neither want nor penury can congeal the warm flowing of his generous bosom. The utmost idea of the kindest welcome, that the generosity of nature can offer to man, extends not beyond "Virginia hospitality." Golden thoughts of intellect have been incased in the mutilated language of olden time by the flight of centuries, yet they have rolled on under the weight of mind and genius without finding a phrase to impair its meaning. The languishment of poverty, hitherto untasted, may blanch the blushing cheeks of her daughters, may sear the bloom of expectation in her ardent sons, yet that warm glowing welcome, that generous effusion of soul, found embedded in hearts moulded by nature and culture to ennoble the relations of life, like the natural mass that lessens visually, but indestructibly defies division, will remain to the last without change or diminution by nature or time. We have, then, the habits and immemorial customs of Virginians to establish their generosity and want of penuriousness from the present day, up to the period of their first emigration hither; and, therefore, from these immemorial customs, we have abundant evidence, that the persons, who composed that emigration, exercised in all the relations of life an unbounded generosity, and handed it down to their posterity; and, of consequence, were not led hither as "creatures of gain," as asserted by Mr. Webster.

Directly the reverse of this might be proven in the case of Massachusetts, by adopting the same method of argument in tracing out the motives of her settlers by their manners and customs, as they do now, and have immemorially existed; but enough has been done by vindicating, I trust conclusively, the assailed reputation of the Fathers of Virginia, without desiring, in a spirit of vindictiveness in pursuing the subject farther, to consign the position, from which, by irrefragable proof, they have been removed, to their compatriots of Massachusetts.

It has long been a saying, that folly has its corner in the brains of every wise man; the verity of this proverb becomes strikingly accurate after perusing our colonial history, in endeavoring to reconcile truth and facts to the declaration of Mr. W., "that the stars which guided the settlers of Massachusetts, were the unobscured constellation of civil and religious liberty." I am aware that prejudices of the strongest cast are to be combatted in proving the negative of this assertion, for "it is not unusual for the world to reject the voice of truth because its tones are strange." Virginia, however, is yet the victim of the contrast, and the stern, unbending record of history must become her champion and vindicator; for her settlers are, by inference and force of comparison, made to acknowledge as their guide a "constellation" opposite to that of "civil and religious liberty." First, then, as to civil liberty. The quantum, that influenced each settlement hither, can only be estimated by the different systems of government established by each after their arrival. The foundation of our civil liberty, according to Mr. W., consists "in free forms of government founded on popular representation." I suppose there are no people, who would consider their civil liberty safe, when its total preservation depended upon local or municipal representation without any form of general government. That State, therefore, in which we find the first representative assembly of the people convened, was more thoroughly animated, both before and after its organization, by the spirit of civil liberty. Consequently, Mr. W., by his own testimony, completely vindicates the colony of Virginia from the taint of his own declaration, and places her far in advance of Massachusetts in proclaiming "civil liberty" and equality of rights: for he tells us that the people of Virginia sought for a charter that would allow them "to constitute and establish the first popular representative assembly which ever convened on this continent—the Virginia house of Burgesses." To Virginia and to Maryland alone belongs the sole credit of establishing the first organic system of government founded upon representation—the only legitimate source of civil liberty in the New World. Twin sisters of the same origin, by a singular coincidence of circumstances, the same sun that smilingly shed his glory upon the birth-day of civil representation in the one, permitted not another ray to the other, without carrying with it from the shades of night, the tidings and the possession of a similar regeneration. For, as the learned Bancroft observes, "just one day before that memorable session of Virginia, when the people of the ancient dominion adopted a similar system of independent legislation, the representatives of Maryland convened in the house of Robert Slye," (the present ancient and venerable, yet beautiful and splendidly situated mansion of Mr. Edmund J. Plowden of St. Mary's County,) "voted themselves a lawful assembly without dependence on any other power in the province." It was not until many years afterwards, that Massachusetts, warmed and influenced by the spirit and example of these two noblest assertors of our "civil liberty," organized a representative assembly to direct her affairs of government. So much for "civil," now for "religious liberty." I know not what Mr. Webster may understand by the term "religious liberty," but if he means to convey the idea of an exclusive worship, only permitting toleration to itself and denying freedom of conscience to all others—trampling upon intellectual liberty by banishment, or sacrifice at the fagot and the stake—if such be his understanding of "religious liberty," then I readily concede that its "unobscured constellation" led thither the settlers of Massachusetts. But if the Jewish Synagogue, the Cathedral of the Catholic, or even the "Mosque of the Mussulman," when reared beside the hundreds of temples of protestant piety, be evidences of that brotherly charity and universal toleration, which is the true and only meaning of "religious liberty;" then do I emphatically deny that the settlers of Massachusetts sought either in spirit, precept, or truth, a jot or tittle of "religious liberty;" and I ground and defend my assertion upon the very explicit and conclusive statement of Mr. Bancroft, himself a New Englander; who says, that

"Roger Williams, upon landing at Boston, found himself in direct opposition to the whole system upon which Massachusetts was founded," because, (mark now the reason,) he was the advocate of "the sanctity of conscience; and declared that the civil magistrate should restrain crime but never control opinion; should punish guilt, but never violate the freedom of the soul,—because, he would blot from the statute book the felony of non-conformity; would quench the fires that persecution had so long kept burning; would repeal every law compelling attendance on public worship; would abolish tithes and all forced contributions to the maintenance of religion; would give an equal protection to every form of religious faith; and never suffer the authority of government to be enlisted against the Mosque of the Mussulman, or the edifice of the fire-worshipper, against the Jewish Synagogue or Roman Cathedral."

Though lengthy, I have transcribed the above quotation, because its members should form a sentence, that should be memorialized not only to remind us of the requirements of our own constitution, but to awaken in our bosoms the gratitude due to one of the two boldest assertors of intellectual regeneration. It was for advocating these cardinal principles of "religious liberty," for lending his capacious and comprehensive mind "to quench the fires that persecution had so long kept burning" in Massachusetts, that Roger Williams was condemned and banished from her soil; being considered by her settlers too liberal and heretical to remain within their confines, whilst holding opinions of religious freedom, that proclaimed his ostracism, "because, upon landing at Boston, he found himself in direct opposition to the whole system upon which Massachusetts was founded."

It has been our pride and boast that we live under a government of such mildness, that in the administration of its many parts, not a drop of human blood has been shed for State crimes. Would to God that the annals of Massachusetts did not deprive us of the higher and still nobler boast, that the soil of our country has never been stained by the disgraceful slaughter of one human being at the unhallowed shrine of religious persecution. Proudly may we point to every other colony of our nation, and no foul stigma of bloodshed in religious warfare crimson a blush of disgrace upon our escutcheon: but to the everlasting misfortune of our Fame, a few harmless and innocent Quakers dared to sunder the chains, that were forged for the intellect, so far as to question the conscriptive principles of the Plymouth Theocracy, and they calmly yielded life to the murderous exactions of a religious code, that imprinted a disgrace, which manties all time with its pall, and calls up the crimson blush of posterity. It is exceedingly painful thus to scarify old sores, and to call up the truthful records of history to chide the deeds of our sisters of the union; but it should be remembered that such a course is forced upon us in defence of the fair fame of an illustrious member of our confederacy, against the unjust assault and invidious comparison of him, who, by the election of his own State, has become the expositor of her sentiments, and by his commanding talents "a monument of national illustration." It is the only effective remedy left to soothe and eradicate a wound otherwise mortal from the skilful shafts of the assailant. The contest was forced upon us—Mr. Webster is the aggressor—the panoply of truth and reason are our shield and defender. If after defending our outposts, the war has been transferred to Africa, we have but returned the sword for the lance—"legem sibi dixerat ipse." Mr. Webster labors to establish his positions and comparisons by reasoning out his premises to their natural results, but it seems to me irreconcilable with a regard for truthful deduction, when professing to cull those premises from the historical narrations of the colonization of British America, that he should have omitted the vast influences of the settlements of a Penn, a Rogers, a Calvert and others, who brought hither the genuine spirit of religious philanthropy, and founded an asylum of reception for the persecuted of all nations. Calvert and Rogers particularly were the champions of intellectual liberty, as distinguished from that mere corporeal freedom that would permit equal liberty to the body in civil affairs, but at the same time fetter the action of thought when directed to religious observances, by laws restrictive and penal against the sanctity of conscience. It was at a time, (as history somewhere remarks,) when the fearful feuds of religious warfare deluged the greater portion of Germany in the blood of its own citizens; when the vengeful ire of captious faction swept desolation over Holland; when France had yet to boil in the fast warming caldron of the approaching contest; "when England was gasping under the despotism of intolerance;" and some years before Descartes planted modern Philosophy on the doctrine of free reflection—that Williams and Calvert asserted and proclaimed, both by word and in their colonies, the sublime precepts of intellectual freedom; from which as a necessary and inevitable consequence every other species of liberty must flow. By their becoming the authors of the emancipation of the mind from the incubus of religious tyranny, they were fortunate above the rest of mankind in leaving a superior claim upon our gratitude. He, who sang the immortal Æneid, touchingly tells, in lines that melt the soul into pity, of the untimely fate of Nisus and Euryalus, and leaves preserved in golden verse a memorial of their dying friendship—it is no less appropriate as an apothegm to keep alive the memory of our two moral Lights of man's intellectual regeneration:

"Fortunati ambo, si quid mea carmina possunt, Nulla dies unquam memori vos eximet ævo."

"The colonists of English America were of the people, and a people already free." To answer Mr. W., I must borrow the idea of an eloquent defender of "ancestral fame," "our boast then should be that we have preserved, not originated a government"—that our constitution existed in crude and undigested elements, intangibly scattered through the theoretic systems of England, which required but the plastic touch of the compiler to methodize what has been heretofore pronounced the sublimest original of all human conceptions in government—that its framers were but the plagiarists of English invention, the promulgators of English, not American doctrines—that they have usurped the title of "Fathers of the constitution," and deceptiously promulgated an absolute, instead of a "derivate" claim to originality in its formation—that being "a people already free," the prize, for which they braved the toil of eight years of war and carnage, was but an illusive phantom of the imagination, magnifying oppression—rendering the result and its consequences alike unimportant, whether victory crowned or defeat blasted their efforts. Such doctrines are too palpably absurd, too erroneous in themselves to admit of serious refutation, even when supported by the high authority of Mr. Webster.

But he continues, "England transplanted liberty to America." To answer this declaration, I shall, by quoting Mr. Webster's own Oration, permit him to apply a complete and unqualified answer in confutation of himself. He says that France after forty years of revolution, bloodshed, and suffering, obtained the declaration, that "all Frenchmen are equal before the law." "What France had received only by the expenditure of so much blood and treasure, and the exhibition of so much crime, the English colonists obtained by simply changing their place of residence, and leaving behind their political institutions." The colonists then were not "equal before the law" previous to "changing their place of residence, and leaving behind their political institutions," and that government, which deprived any portion of its citizens of this boon, cannot be said to have possessed, or dispensed through its laws, political or civil liberty; but England, according to Mr. W.'s declaration, did deprive a portion of her citizens of this boon; consequently England cannot be said to possess or dispense through her laws political or civil liberty. And if she does not either possess, or dispense liberty, by what process of reasoning or regard for accuracy can Mr. W. make her "transplant, to America," what she never possessed! Again: he continues. "But another grand characteristic is, that in the English colonies, political affairs were left to be managed by the colonists themselves." Consequently, the colonists were the authors of their own liberty, being left the management of their own "political affairs," by England; and, therefore, neither England nor any other power "transplanted liberty to America:" and more thoroughly does Mr. W. confute his own statement of the transplantation of liberty by England, by his very true remark, "that home government was the secret of the prosperity of the North American colonists." For there is no fact better established than the cold, unnatural neglect of her colonies by England. Their bodies alone, to use the Doric phrase of Mr. W., were "transplanted" "on bare creation," 3000 miles from the civilization of man, to conquer the wilderness and its savage inhabitants, though often oppressed by the pinchings of hunger and starvation. America, however, by "leaving behind the political institutions" of England, and by the infusion of liberalism into her laws and governments, after a few centuries, became a theme of the sublimest contemplation to the statesman of England. Her mountains and her valleys, her prairies and her forests dotted the vast expanse of a continent possessing every variety of soil, visited by the temperature of every climate, washed by two oceans that bore to her ports the contributions of the world, and watered by the most majestic bays and rivers, with their bosoms burdened by the industry of her sons—such a country could not but attract the cupidinous gaze of the most ungrateful of parents. Our Mother Country, attracted by the glare of wealth, no longer permitted "home government" to her offspring, but instead of liberty, "transplanted" a tyranny to America in the shape of "imposts and excises to eat out our substance" and to replenish her exhausted coffers from the treasures, that ourselves and ancestors had carved from the bosom of the wilderness. At this period she demanded an absolute, unconditional submission and obedience to her will. Our Fathers met the aggression in a becoming spirit and proclaimed in their sublime declaration of Independence, that they were not "a people already free," but struggling to be free, that although they enjoyed, from the time of their emigration to the revolution—a rude species of liberty, yet it was but a vacation of authority, not a relinquishment of the right to rule; that England, always tyrannical in her external administration of government, had ever held her dread power in terror over them. But apart from this, can any one read the immortal instrument of Independence in which is enumerated a catalogue of the darkest and most atrocious actions of tyranny that ever disgraced a government, and afterwards come to the conclusion, that whilst subject at all times to the decrees of such a government, we were ever "a people already free," and that England ever "transplanted liberty to America!" Impossible! Because no one believes that the signers of that instrument published a libel upon

England, and deceived the world, and (which is more culpable) their allies by that solemn declaration of the usurpations they had endured. If our territory, instead of offering to the cupidity of the Mother Land a rich mine of almost exhaustless treasure by taxation, had presented nothing else but a beggarly waste, thinly inhabited, like the barren rocks of Nova Scotia, or Cape Breton, that appealed by their distress to her sympathy and humanity for relief, we would have lived until dooms-day, undisturbed, in cold neglect; would yet have been permitted "a home government," would yet have been unmolested in "leaving behind the political institutions of England," and would, perhaps, yet have been a colony of England, with a government not of English, but of essentially American origin. The great error of Mr. W. consists in confounding the institutions of America with those of England, in taking from America and bestowing upon England the credit of political systems, which we either as Americans by nativity, or Americans by emigration, when we ceased to be Englishmen by Leaving England, established and founded. And hence his great error in searching for the origin of our liberty, by riddling and sifting the phases and convulsions of civil society in England for two hundred years, to find the seed of a Liberty-tree, which (to give his idea) was planted by the emerging of a "middle class" from feudal bondage, sprang up by the doctrines of the reformation, was nurtured by an hundred years of commercial adventure, and, I suppose, to perfect the allegory, matured by the combined influence of all these causes, till all England reposed under its shade, and "transplanted" a scion from its trunk to America. The figure, however, to a sagacious rhetorician of Mr. Webster's celebrity, wants a completion other than that I have given it; for inductions deck not allegorical members. The historian has given the finish, which Mr. W.'s research should never have omitted—the art of printing—which has done more by its influences to enlighten mankind and awaken them to a just sense of their wrongs, and thus to infuse liberalism into the English government, and every other species of government, than the three grand causes combined, of emersion of the middle classes, of the reformation and of commercial adventure, brought forward by Mr. Webster. Mr. Hallam, who has excelled all ancient or modern writers in giving a clear and concise exposition of the origin and several parts of the British constitution, declares that "we (the English) are deceived by the comparatively perfect state of our present liberties, and forget that our superior security is far less owing to positive law, than to the control which is exercised over government by public opinion, through the general use of printing, and to the diffusion of liberal principles in policy through the same means." Mr. Webster's perception of consequences would not have permitted his omission of this important cause, in searching for the origin, or rather in giving the progression of English liberty, did he not know that its influences were calculated almost to destroy the effects of the causes that suited his proposition, by its superior force in establishing his deductions. They were auxiliaries to the main cause of printing and it is a gross perversion of history, by Mr. Webster, in making them the chief and operative causes in the gradual production of English liberty. Another brief reference to Mr. W.'s Oration and I have done with its many inaccuracies. In his enumeration of the institutions of England that came hither with the settlers of Massachusetts, he says, "the habeas corpus" came. Although "habeas corpus" was an express provision of "Magna Charta," yet by disuse, or political necessity it had become entirely obsolete. For there is no recorded instance in English history to put an end to false imprisonment during the Plantagenet rule by the writ of "habeas corpus;" and the high notions of prerogative, under the Stuarts and Tudors, made its use very rare. But by the statue of Charles II. it was rendered "actively remedial by express enactment of parliament." Now the reign of Charles II. commenced in 1660, and the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth in 1620, just forty years before the use of the writ of "habeas corpus" became known in English jurisprudence. Its use, therefore, had no existence in England previous to the settlement of Massachusetts, and consequently it was not only morally, but metaphysically impossible for the settlers of Massachusetts to have conveyed hither the use of a thing, or custom, when that use did not exist. So much for this chronological error of Mr. W., used by him with great effect in completing his very labored apotheosis of the Massachusetts settlers. The ornamental parts of Mr. W.'s Oration I have left untouched, thinking it of more importance to show his falsifications of history, and by it to exhibit the erroneous reasoning of his Oration.

NOT AGAIN.

BY A. B. MEEK.

Not again, not again
Can my heart its dream renew !
Brighter forms may meet my view ;
Sweeter tones may wander by,
With a dreamier melody ;
Spirits beckon through the trees,
White robes flashing on the breeze ;
But they lure and tempt in vain ;
My sad heart will wear its chain
Not again !

Not again, not again
Wine, that on the sand is poured,
To the cup may be restored ;
Fragrance, on the wild breeze shed,
Bless the floweret whence it aped ;

Music seek the broken lute,
Long forgotten, longer mute :
And the heart, once quelled by pain,
Can its early bliss attain

Not again !

Not again, not again !
Tempt me then no more, sweet girl,
To imbibe the liquid pearl !
Though your face might win a saint,
From his temple's dim restraint,—
Yet my heart, while owning this,
Turns insensate from the bliss.
In its gloom it must remain,
Doomed to smile in beauty's train
Not again !

Not again, not again !
For, in bright and trusting youth,
Wounded was my bosom's truth :
O'er my heart was thrown a spell
Stronger than weak words can tell,
And a face, as angel's bright,
Darkened Hope's devoted light :
Joy to me since then is vain,—
I can trust Love's syren strain
Not again !

BLINDNESS AND THE BLIND.

No. IV.

Before I pass to a short notice of the most celebrated Institutions for the instruction of the Blind, with which I intend to close these few desultory remarks, it may not be thought inappropriate to say a few words upon a question which has lately appeared to claim the attention of several distinguished philanthropists, viz: the expediency of uniting into one Institution a school for the Blind and one for Deaf mutes. To a superficial observer, such a union must appear preposterous on account of the difference in the mode of instructing each class, and yet such a union is not only possible but in many respects would appear to present decided advantages. In countries where no Institution for either class of these unfortunates has been established and where their numbers do not appear sufficiently large to warrant the erection of two separate Institutions, the friends of both may unite in recommending to the public to establish one compound Institution, and thus united, they may effect what neither alone would have been able to accomplish. There can be no doubt, also, that on the score of economy, such a union would be very desirable as the expenses of one compound Institution containing one hundred pupils would be materially less than those of two separate establishments containing fifty pupils each.

The proper mode of viewing this question, however, is to investigate the effects which this union must produce upon the intellectual, the moral and the physical welfare of both the Blind and the Deaf mutes. To do this, understandingly, we must premise a few observations on the peculiar situation of Deaf mutes, the means which are generally employed to obviate their misfortune and the success which appears to attend the efforts which are thus made in their behalf. The peculiar condition of the Blind has already been sufficiently explained.

Deaf mutes are born with the same internal faculties, emotions and passions as other men, they have by nature the same desire and the same mental capacities, but they are deprived of one of the most important physical organs, by the use of which man converses with his fellow-man. Each individual presents the phenomenon of an immortal and thinking spirit, pent up within what is, without a metaphor to him, a prison-house of clay. The imprisoned spirit seeks to effect its escape. It longs to break down the wall of separation which divides it from its fellows, for man by his very nature is disposed to "exteriorize" himself, to express outwardly what he feels inwardly. In endeavoring to communicate with his fellow-man, the Deaf mute is compelled, in the absence of words, to resort to the indication of present objects, and to the delineation by motion and gestures, of those which are absent. This language, if it deserves the name of language, wants the lightness, the simplicity and the precision of our oral language; it is unwieldy in its material and burdensome in its use, therefore but little adapted to become the medium of communication between man and man. But, besides, this language is not understood by the vast majority of mankind. Although the most simple of the natural signs which the Deaf mute employs, may be comprehended by all with whom he comes in contact; there is a variety of natural signs which are not so obvious in their meaning. The very infirmity under which the Deaf mute labors leads him to examine surrounding objects with extraordinary minuteness, with a view to describe them to those with whom he communicates, and though the signs which he employs in his descriptions may be natural, they may not be readily comprehended by those who have observed these objects with less care than himself.

The great object, therefore, in the education of Deaf mutes is to give them a knowledge of the language which forms the medium of intercourse between their more favored fellow-men either by a visible representation of our audible sounds, that is, by making them understand the meaning of our written words, or by teaching them to imitate the motions of the lips, etc. of speaking persons and informing them of the meaning of these motions. For this end alone numerous Institutions for Deaf mutes have been established which, whatever their beneficial effects in other respects may be, must expect to stand or to fall according to their success in this peculiar task.

Without wishing to detract aught from the fair fame of those who conduct these Institutions, truth obliges us to say that the results have not realized the expectations of the philanthropists. We could point out several individuals of good talents, who, after a residence of five or six years in a Deaf mute Institution, cannot write the English language intelligibly, and we believe that the oldest Institutions in this country have not produced one single graduate able to write the same language with ease and fluency. To use the expression of one of the most distinguished of Deaf mute instructors; "the art of instructing the Deaf and Dumb, may be said, notwithstanding what it has accomplished in past times, to be materially in arrears of the science."

The reason of this failure can be made very plain to every philologist who is aware of the fact that the study of language is not the study of a science, but the study of an art, and that it must accordingly be prosecuted not by the method of abstract principles but by the assiduous exercise of familiar practices. No doubt there is a science of language, and that a very profound one, and there is also a science of each individual language, as there is an anatomy of each individual man, but you must have the man before you can dissect him, and you must know the language (vulgarly speaking) before you can make a science of it. What is the practice of nature in the matter? How do little children learn languages? It is a very simple matter, but a matter like all the great primal truths of existence, the neglect of which, in the study of languages, has puzzled many a hopeful scholar and perplexed many a famous pedagogue. It is by the continued and persevering repetition of a certain sound, in plain, palpable and direct connection with a certain known and familiar object that a child learns both to understand the words of a language when spoken and to speak them himself with understanding. By the institution of nature, therefore, it appears that to learn a language easily and profitably a person must be put into an atmosphere, so to speak, impregnated with it, and he must remain in that atmosphere for a certain considerable period, greater or less according to his capacity of perception and imitation, till these signs, in connection with the things of which they are the symbols, have become an habitual and customary part of his associations, and every artificial or imitative system of teaching languages must be good or bad according as its machinery approaches to, or recedes from, this original norm which nature has set up. We meet daily with the proof of this fact. Among so many children who receive instruction in the French language, we see that not one succeeds in acquiring even a tolerable knowledge of it, except those who have been forced for some length of time to use that language exclusively as the medium of communication with the persons who surround them. A still more striking example of this is often witnessed on the continent of Europe amongst the fashionable Englishmen, who, with their attendants, repair to the baths of Germany; for while master and mistress hear nothing but French and English from the fashionable society that frequents the baths and return from their German tour as guiltless of a Teutonic guttural, as if they had never left their native land, their servants, on the other hand, have heard the native dialect from the mouth of the German grooms and chambermaids, and have, with very little perceptible trouble, in three months, acquired a more practical knowledge of a language, of which they know not a single printed letter, than many a famous scholar has done by solitary study in three years.

The application of this principle to Deaf mute Institutions is very simple. We have already shown that the only natural method which a Deaf mute has of expressing his thoughts is by the features of his face and the gesticulations of his body, especially of his arms and hands; these gesticulations constitute his natural language, consequently the language of his choice, the medium in which he loves to communicate his thoughts, especially if he be with other Deaf mutes. Our letters and words not being familiar to him, he will not use them except he is obliged to do so. In common Deaf mute Institutions, ninety-five hundredths of the inmates being deaf and dumb, the temptation to use the natural sign language, a language readily understood by all and natural to a large majority of them, is very great. They are like English children learning French in an English boarding school; you may by strict discipline coerce them to speak French, but the moment that coercion is removed they will prattle away in English. Still, to learn the English language well, a constant practice of it is indispensable; it is not sufficient that in school-hours they be taught how to translate their thoughts from the sign language into English; they must learn to think in English, or else their language will always have the labored stiffness which characterizes translations. A union with blind persons in the same establishment must, therefore, have the most beneficial effect upon this great object in the instruction of the Dumb. The natural signs being mostly if not entirely taken from the visible properties of objects and being addressed to the eye, it cannot be made the medium of conversation between the Deaf and the Blind; they will have to resort to alphabetical language, in which constant practice will soon render them perfect. That this kind of intercourse, can and will take place, has been fully demonstrated by experience. About two years ago, some of the Blind pupils of the Virginia Institution undertook a journey through the Eastern part of this State, in connection with some Deaf mutes of the same Institution. Nothing was done on the part of their teachers to promote intercourse between the two classes, and still in the short time which the journey occupied, most blind persons had learned the different positions of the hand which constitute the alphabet of the deaf and dumb, and could converse with their mute fellow-travellers as far as these had a knowledge of alphabetical language. Laura Bridgeman, the celebrated deaf, dumb and blind girl at the Boston Institution, converses readily with the blind girls who surround her; she has not been allowed to use any natural signs, and has, in consequence, acquired a wonderful dexterity in the use of the manual alphabet. Not only can she make herself the letters with great rapidity, but she reads them as fast as an expert sign-maker can make them. In the European Institutions at Zurich, Stockholm, Grönd, etc., in which both Blind and Deaf mute persons are instructed, these two classes mix together in harmony and appear to enjoy the society of each other; it is said that the instruction of the Deaf mutes in these Institutions is divested of its greatest difficulties by their intercourse with the Blind.

But the intellectual advantages which the deaf and dumb would derive from associating with the blind would not be confined to mere improvement in language. Any one who has been acquainted with Deaf mutes and Blind persons of the same age, who are under instruction, can not fail to have perceived how greatly superior the Blind are in all kinds of knowledge that does not depend immediately upon light and shade, or colors. This arises, not from any natural superiority, but from the fact that the Deaf are obliged to spend a long time in learning language, which the Blind learned as other children do, while playing about the house, and that before he acquires a knowledge of language the Deaf mute must be totally unacquainted with all those things which are removed from his immediate field of observation. The advantages which the Deaf mutes would derive from daily intercourse with persons superior to them in knowledge must be obvious.

The moral effect which such a union would produce upon the Deaf and Dumb must necessarily be salutary. If inclined to be vain, the sight of beings, also deprived of the use of an important organ, and still far superior to him in knowledge would teach him humility; and if melancholy repinings should oppress him, he has before his eye a number of beings whom it has pleased Providence to visit with an affliction as great as his own.

Let us now see what the effect upon the Blind would be. Intellectually they would not derive as much benefit as the Deaf, because being superior in mental development and acquirements, they would be rather the communicants than the recipients of knowledge, but we know that nobody can teach without learning. The Blind, therefore, could not be losers; indeed, the effort which they would be obliged to make, in order to use the manual alphabet with facility, would be a useful exercise to them. Physically considered, it would be a great advantage to the Blind to be associated with the Deaf; the Deaf could lead the Blind, they could explain many appearances of things which the Blind can not get a knowledge of by handling, and in the work department there are many articles which the Blind could readily make, all to nice finishing, which requires sight; this might be done by the Deaf mutes.

In conclusion, we must say, therefore, that we hail with pleasure the announcement that attempts are being made to unite in this country the instruction of the Deaf mutes and of the Blind, because, we believe that by such a union, the instruction of both classes will be materially facilitated. We trust that the eminent philanthropist who first broke the ice in this undertaking will not be discouraged by the difficulties which private interest and dogmatical ignorance are sure to throw in his way, but that he will pursue the noble course which he has so well begun until success crowns his efforts and fulfils his most sanguine expectations.

THE COMING ON OF NIGHT.

BY HENRY B. HIRST.

Down drops the dying sun:
The low breeze creeps among the nodding boughs
And over the shutting flow'rets gently flows—
Night cometh robed in dun.

Her quiet step is heard,
Like the far echo of some trickling spring,
Or the faint murmur of the downy wing
Of some lone woodland bird.

And from the dreamy sky
The moonbeams fall, fringing the trees with light,
Or playing on the river pure and bright,
That wanders singing by.

And from the sleeping stream
The mirrored stars a spiritual light
Fling hazily over grove and rock and height,
That smile beneath their beam.

Forest and field are still.
Nature seems wrapt in slumber, wholly dumb,
Save, when the frog's deep bass, or beetle's hum,
Or wailing whip-poor-will,

Disturb her weary ear;
Or the far singing of the silver rill,
That sings while leaping joyous down the hill
Her dreamless sleep to cheer.

It is a night of love!
Oh! blessed night! that comes unto the poor
And rich alike, bringing us dreams that lure
Our souls to One above.

CHEAP LITERATURE: ITS CHARACTER AND TENDENCIES.

BY A SOUTHRON.

Much has been spoken and written of late, concerning the recent system of cheap publication, so extensively adopted in the larger cities, and from thence, radiating into all sections of our Union; and varied, as the minds and characters of the writers, have been the speculations to which it has given birth; and we only venture to contribute our mite, because we entertain some peculiar views upon the subject, which we desire to submit to the dispassionate judgment of the public; for which, the writer of this article, and not the Review must be held responsible.

That this movement has been productive of important results, no thinking man can doubt—and infinite has been the self-laudation of enterprising publishers, who first set the ball in motion; and proportionably bitter their assaults upon the “grasping Book-Barons,” whom they charge with the crime of lèse-majesté against the Sovereign people!—the privilege of acting as the high priests of literature, being considered ample reward for them; and the desire of profit, unworthy of their high vocation.

“Wisdom” now, literally “cries aloud in the streets, and no man regards her;” if the ragged urchins who throng the thoroughfares, and dog the footsteps of strangers, vending cheap publications, may be regarded as her heralds. Books are thrust before you as you walk the public streets, or, plunged in dreamy reverie, inhale the fragrance of your mild Havanna on the balcony of your hotel; the shrill cry of the news-boy rises above the din of the crowded streets, blends with the splash of the steam-boat paddles, and even the swift whirl of the locomotive cannot bear you beyond it. Time was, when books were so valuable for their rarity, as to be chained like criminals to the desks of libraries, which became shrines of pilgrimage to the earnest votaries of thought; but the order of things has been totally reversed; men do not seek books now, but are happy to escape from the venders of them; and beholding these things, the glad public claps its hands and cries aloud, that a “new era has dawned upon the world, when knowledge, so long the privilege of the few, has become the property of the many!” and that the intellectual millennium has at length arrived. And if, amidst this exulting uproar, a dissenting voice is raised, it is either totally disregarded, or scoffed at, as inimical to the great interests of the people. Unpopular as the avowal may be, we yet do not hesitate to declare that our sympathies in this matter are with the minority; for we not only believe, that this system tends to lower the standard of excellence among the educated few, but go still further, and openly assert as our belief, that it is calculated to lower and debase the minds of the great mass of the people. This assertion may seem to involve a startling paradox, since it would appear, that the multiplication of books at almost nominal prices, would naturally tend to diffuse information among all classes of the community, and to spread the light of knowledge as well "into the huts where poor men lie," as into the luxurious mansions of the rich; but there is one important consideration usually lost sight of, and it is this, that to ensure a healthy state of mind, as well as of body, more care should be paid to the quality, than the quantity of food provided for it. "All knowledge is not nutriment;" far from it! there is a knowledge of evil, as well as of good;—a philosophy of vice, as well as of virtue,—and woe to that people, who are dependant for their mental food, upon the foul jackalls of literature, who revel only in its garbage and corruption.

That this point has already been reached by the American people, we are not prepared to assert; but that such is the inevitable tendency of the state of things now existing, we expect to prove to the satisfaction of all candid and unbiassed minds.

The question, then, rests upon the inquiry, not as to the number or price of the books published and circulated, but as to their general character, and the influence which they are calculated to exert upon the public mind; thrown, as they have been, suddenly into the hands of multitudes of those, whose previous reading (to say the least) had been exceedingly limited. And here, in the outset, let us not be misunderstood,—the strictures about to be made, are applicable only to the "cheap publications," strictly so called; the reprints of standard works, which the old publishing houses have been recently driven into, to counteract (if possible) this movement, are neither, when collected, so cheap, nor as widely circulated as the penny publications of obscure publishers in New York and elsewhere; the New World press, and a few others also, deserve to have it said of them, that if they have effected but little good, they also wrought but little positive harm; having been outstripped in the race for public favor by more unscrupulous competitors, who now have the field; and it is against these "petty instruments of mighty mischief" that we now declare a war "even to the knife."

We arraign them then, at the bar of public opinion, because, in the first place, they have crushed the hopes of our American authors, and blasted our prospects of possessing a national literature!

In the second place, because they have lowered the scale of national honor, by enticing our people to participate in, and benefit by a wholesale system of injustice and fraud, both against foreign authors and publishers, whose property they have fraudulently appropriated! often adding insult to injury, when the wrong was complained of!

And in the third place, because the character of the works which have had the most widely extended circulation, is such, as to taint and corrupt the youth of our land, by their open and shameless licentiousness. Such are a few out of the many charges which might be preferred, but these are sufficient for our purpose, if we can prove them, and this we now intend to do, as far as such charges are susceptible of positive proof. In an article recently contributed to the Democratic Review, by one of the most vigorous and original thinkers of the day, the remark is made, that "the present tendency with us, is to the creation of a literature, which levels downwards and not upwards: instead of feeling it an imperious duty to instruct and elevate the mass, the tendency among us is to take our law from the mass; and to bring thought down to a level with the narrow views, crude notions, and blind instincts of the multitude." And he then adds, that "if this tendency is continued and encouraged, our whole intellectual world will become superficial and void, and American life too feeble a thing to be worth preserving!" This is a strong and by no means a flattering picture; but let any candid man look around him, and answer, whether it be not a faithful one; and if so, let him then decide, whether he will lend his voice to swell the popular clamor, or singly, if it may be, raise it to vindicate, what he believes to be the right; for our own part, the ground we have assumed, we are now prepared to defend. But before entering into the proofs which substantiate our first charge, it may not be amiss to trace the connexion necessarily existing between the tendency complained of and the want of a national literature; creating the relation of cause and effect, the latter being the cause, the former the effect.

It is admitted on all hands, that the first great requisite of a free people is the general possession of an enlarged intelligence; an ignorant people cannot possibly long continue a free people, because, to ensure the maintenance of rights, the intelligence to detect infractions of them is required; and this is especially the case in a country like ours, where everything being dependent on the popular will, it is of vital importance that that will should be guided by the dictates of an enlarged and liberal reason.

The only certain mode of securing this desirable end, is by extending to the whole people the advantages of education; not alone by the more obvious means of primary schools and colleges, wherein the rudiments only are required; each man's education, properly speaking, only commencing at the period of his terminating his collegiate course; but by throwing open to the student a national literature, wherein works adapted to the "form and pressure" of the time and country in which he lives, may be found to teach him his rights and duties both as a man and an American citizen. For information on these points, he must turn over in vain the classic pages of antiquity, or the productions of modern authors, living under forms of government totally adverse to our own. In all enlightened times and countries, this matter of possessing a national literature has been regarded by sagacious statesmen as the one thing needful, to cement the jarring and discordant elements, which constitute a people, by a feeling which all could share—a feeling of national pride in the productions of its own citizens, forming a kind of neutral ground, on which conflicting sects and parties, casting aside their differences, might meet in friendship, as the tribes of Greece were wont to assemble at their Olympia. Not alone valuable on this account, since it is the most enduring, as well as the most useful of a nation's possessions; for, embodying the choice thoughts of her most gifted sons, it is bequeathed to posterity, as that nation's richest legacy; the undying portion of her, which is to preserve her memory intact, long after her feats of war and state-craft have been interred in the "Limbo of Vanities," among other forgotten things. For does not England owe a greater debt to her Spenser and her Shakspeare, than to her long line of forgotten Kings? Does not the antiquarian, even now, seek to trace the records of her early history on the vivid page of Chaucer, rather than in the musty tomes of the Domesday Boke, or other ponderous folios, which slumber in the dusty nooks of old libraries? Well did that statesman understand how deeply the character of a nation is tinged by its literature, who asked "to have the making of the songs of a people, and he cared not who made their laws;" for he knew that the laws were engraven only on their memories, while the simple songs sunk deep into their hearts, and were transmitted to their children's children.

Tried then by this test, what is the condition of our own country. Does it not present the strange anomaly of a thriving, energetic, and resolute people, whose physical wants are all supplied by their own unaided efforts; who claim as their highest privilege, the right of governing themselves, yet totally dependent on foreign nations for their intellectual food! thankfully receiving the crumbs, which fall from the tables of their German, French, or English masters! Well might Mr. Hillard exclaim, in that noble discourse delivered at Boston, that "A nation, skilled in all the arts that multiply physical comforts and conveniences, but in which the imaginative faculty lies paralyzed and lifeless, disturbs us with a sense of something, incomplete and imperfect; it reminds us of a world without children!"—rather let us say, of a gigantic body, perfect in all its parts, but moved by a complex mechanism and not by a living soul; a monstrous Polyphemus, with but a single eye, and that turned only to the acquisition of sordid gold—blind to the priceless treasures of intellect and heart, which constitute the only true wealth of a nation.

Dreadfully indignant were we, years ago, when Sydney Smith sneeringly asked, "who reads an American book?" and if words could kill, immediate would have been the death of that reverend jester; yet the question might almost be reiterated now, with the slight change of "who writes one?" for American authors are becoming, as a class, valuable for their rarity, and unless a favorable change takes place, threaten to be soon extinct. We do not here mean to class as authors, the writers for magazines and daily newspapers, though probably the greater part of the talent of the country is driven into that narrow channel; many of them being men of great ability, who, under a better state of things, would be authors of high celebrity; but the fleeting existence of the journals for which they write, and the ephemeral nature of their contributions, chiefly on matters of local interest, do not permit them to be ranked among authors by profession. If then, so many of these writers have evinced, even on the contracted theatre they have chosen, abilities of no common order, why is it, that none of them attempt sustained and elaborate works; works such as "Posterity will not willingly let die!" because there is no encouragement for literary effort; because the public seeks amusement and not instruction! because even our authors, who have already gained a continental reputation, fail to gain the ear of an indifferent public; and in despair lock up their writing-desks, and hope for better times.

It is true, that there are a few illustrious exceptions, for Prescott, Sparks, Bancroft and a few other kindred spirits, to whom the love of historical research brings its own reward, still prosecute their useful labors; in the field of fiction, Cooper, like his own Leather-stocking, still treads with elastic foot the green sward and the prairie, while Simms, our Southern novelist, "abates no jot of heart or hope," but perseveres in the career he has so well begun; Stephens has opened for us a wide field of speculation by his discovery of ancient cities in our new world; and an occasional burst of melody from the Northern lyre, touched by the fingers of Bryant, or Lowell, gives us the assurance, that though unstrung, it is not yet shattered: yet these are but "rari nantes in gurgite vasto," and the support and maintenance of American Literature now mainly depends on the zeal and honesty of a few of our best magazines, which have the penetration to know and love the forcible and true, in thought and expression; and the integrity, unawed by popular or party clamor, to publish and proclaim it!

Where are our authors, and how employed? Washington Irving, taking lessons in diplomacy at the grave Spanish court! Bryant, the editor of a party print, the most prosaic of all human occupations; Halleck, turning his attention from book-making to book-keeping, of the two, we doubt not, far the more profitable employment ; Cooper, almost the only one who keeps the field, waging war against a pestilent horde of hornets, which have been attacking him, much to the delight of the public, who however should recollect that, "Insects have driven the lion mad ere now," and that it is an indication of a very unwholesome state of public feeling, (to say the least of it,) when such attempts are not frowned down by an indignant public. Where then is our literature, we ask again ? and the only reply which can be given is, that it must be sought for in the ephemeral pages of Magazine or Review, or in the still more fleeting columns of the weekly, or daily newspaper ; and in these fragile depositories, we often meet with bursts of eloquence, of pathos and of poetry, worthy of a stronger casket ; and evincing the hidden germs of talent needing but light and culture to spring up in full life and vigor, and produce a boundless harvest.

It is a mournful thing to contemplate, when the voice of a free and prosperous people can find only such an imperfect utterance as this : not naturally dumb, but finding none to listen to its first imperfect utterances, and train it to clear and open speech ! It is a proof, that there must be something at bottom radically wrong—what that something is, it behoves us to investigate. Let us see if we can trace it. It may be replied to this, that we have inherited a literature with our language, that the English literature, with its world-renowned names and priceless treasures of thought, is ours by right of birth, and that we need no other ; but is this true, can any one pretend, that the works of the master minds of England, are familiar to the great mass of our people ; and their names regarded as household words ; alas ! it is not so, and every educated man knows and deplores the fact. Some of them no doubt are familiar to the people, as Shakespeare for example, but he is the property of the whole civilized world ; so too with Milton, and probably a few of the more recent English authors ; but to the great bulk of our people, the "well of English undefiled," from which they are told to drink, is a sealed spring, and they are driven to quench their thirst at the muddy and polluted streams of German mysticism, or French licentiousness. Our very language has shared in the general deterioration ; it is no longer the bold manly Saxon tongue which is spoken now, but a piebald jargon of mingled Latin, French and English. It has become ungenteel to speak good English, it must be plentifully interlarded with scraps of French, or Italian, to please the fastidious ear of "good society," and the sweet and simple ballads which made music of the English tongue, when warbled by some artless girl, have given place to Italian "Cavatinas," and "Dolce Concentes." We know that these opinions may subject us to the charge of being "Gothic" and "old-fashioned," and to such other elegant phrases of fashionable contempt ;

while with another and better class, we will be accused of underrating the intelligence of the American people ; since many well-meaning persons do not scruple to affirm, that for the diffusion of knowledge our country is preëminent. The statement of one simple fact will answer these : by the recent census it was ascertained, that there were in the United States 540,000 free white persons over the age of twenty years, unable to read or write ; and it was further proven by the same document, that 45,000 of these were to be found in the State of New York, the very centre and focus of this cheap publication. When we consider the natural repugnance men always feel at avowing their ignorance, we must be convinced that the number instead of being exaggerated falls far short of the reality, and the state of things it exhibits should be anything but flattering to our national vanity.

In the early stages of colonial existence, the people did not feel the want of a literature, because they were in fact too busy to read ; their very existence was but a continued struggle against cold and hunger ; their time fully occupied in felling gigantic forests, and contending against the wiles and artifices of savage men, the supply of their animal wants, and the support of their wives and families left no leisure for the cultivation of their intellects. The descendants of the Puritans, again, thought One Book all sufficient, they cared not for what was written in any other book, than the Book of God. Possessed with a gloomy fanaticism, they turned with sullen scorn from the accomplishments, as well as the frivolities of their foes, the Cavaliers, and despised the cultivation they had never known. In the South alone was literature regarded ; the descendants of the Cavaliers, absorbed in reverential love for Mother England, (no step-mother then,) acknowledged her literature, as well as her laws ; both sufficed for them. Under such a state of things, American Literature could not be expected to take root ; and accordingly, we first find indications of a growing Literature, after the revolution, when a Literature peculiar to the men and country sprang up, some relics of which we still possess ; such, for example, as Trumbull's "McFingal," Barlow's "Columbiad" and other similar productions strongly imbued with the spirit and prejudices of the time. But they, too, were a busy race,—busied in framing constitutions and making laws ; and for a long time the death struggle between the Federal and Democratic parties convulsed the whole country and absorbed the minds of all intelligent and educated men ; for some time subsequent to the Revolution, the facilities for obtaining education were limited to a few, and these chiefly became political leaders, but the excitement gradually subsided, and the long breathing-time of peace which intervened, gave leisure and opportunity of mental culture, which was not neglected by the youth of the country. Education had always been duly regarded by the early settlers, and Harvard and others had set the example of founding colleges, and contributing a "bushel of books" to begin with; but now the school-master rose into importance, and by his humble, but useful labors, became an important element in the prosperity of the American People.

With increasing cultivation and intelligence, a demand for native literature arose and American authorship raised its head; Paulding and Irving in "Salmagundi," proved to the people, that wit and humor were not confined to one side of the Atlantic; and the publication of the "Sketch-book" convinced our neighbors, over the water, of the same fact. C. B. Brown showed that Godwin might be rivalled, if not surpassed, in powerful delineation of single passions, and delicate anatomy of the human mind. Edwards, in his acute and powerful work "on the Will," proved that America possessed a metaphysician fully able to cope with any in Scotland, or elsewhere; and Bryant and Halleck strung their lyres to notes of rival sweetness. But the arts of peace were again banished by the clash of arms, and, when that ceased, by the contests of rival political parties, continued, under different names, and with different principles and watchwords, down to the present time; during which time Literature, though not very ardently cultivated, was yet slowly but surely progressing, as many names, eminent in history and fiction can testify, when the death-blow was given by some of her pretended friends, under the pretext of "introducing her to the Million." It is a curious thing, that, from time immemorial, there has seemed to be a natural enmity existing between authors and publishers, although from their close connexion one would suppose otherwise; in most other trades, between the maker of a commodity and the vender of the same, a friendly relation subsists; not so with authors and publishers; from the time that the "learned lexicographer" knocked down his bookseller, to the present day, the quarrel has been kept up, until the final blow has been stricken, which has brought Literature, (in this country at least,) down to the "last stage of a decline." Under a system of liberal remuneration to authors, and moderate profits to publishers, both parties were gradually progressing to the entire satisfaction of the public; when the idea suggested itself to the mind of an "enterprising publisher" in New York, that this was but a slow way of getting rich, and that a "good speculation" might be made by establishing a system of small profits and quick returns; and inasmuch as piracy was more profitable than free trade, he determined to reprint in a cheap form the popular English Magazines, for which, as he paid nothing, he had but to reimburse himself for the expense of paper and printing. This scheme was carried into execution; the moral sense of the public was, at first, a little shocked;

it did appear somewhat unfair, that an editor, who paid fifty guineas for an article of Macaulay's or Wilson's, expecting to reimburse himself by the circulation of his review, should thus be forestalled, by one who had not paid a cent for it, except the postage on his single number sent him by his "London correspondent;" but then the work was so cheap, and the times so hard, that the public shut its eyes and gulped the dose. But the hole opened by one, others thought they might creep through too. The misfortune of encouraging an immoral principle, does not always appear in its immediate effects, but in the consequences to which it inevitably leads. Other publishers were smitten with the value of the discovery and pressed on in the footsteps of their brother, the sympathies of the good-natured public were enlisted by the assurance that it was their interest the publishers had at heart in this move, that they had long been grievously imposed upon by the regular publishers, and as a proof, they could now procure from them the same works at one tenth of the former price. The eager public swallowed the bait so skilfully offered; dreadfully incensed were they against the mercenary publishers, who had so long, as they thought, been plundering them; and proportionably grateful to the public-spirited citizens who had opened their eyes to the fact.

The newspaper press, too, which, in this country, in nine cases out of ten, follows, instead of attempting to lead the public sentiment, took up the cry, and Cheap Literature literally deluged the land. In spite of Shakspeare's opinion to the contrary, every day's experience teaches us, that "much is in a name," and it was verified in this instance; for the public did not pause to inquire whether this literature was cheap or not, but took it for granted, and proceeded to act accordingly; they did not reflect that there is a kind of Literature which would be dear at any price, or even at no price at all; They did not consider that money is not the only standard of value, though the most common and obvious; and that even a gift, might be dearly paid for, if the acceptance of it entailed a breach of moral honesty upon the acceptor; and, therefore, the wrongs sustained both by authors and publishers of the pirated works, were not reflected upon; they did not consider that this cheap system was founded in fraud and supported by injustice, and heedless, or forgetful of the true but homely adage, "that the receiver is as bad as the thief," each individual shifted the responsibility off his own shoulders, and profited by the fraud which he thus aided in sustaining. Nay, some of the publishers rendered bold by impunity, and the apparent sympathy of the public, had the effrontery to tax with ingratitude the indignant authors, whose labors they had appropriated to their own profit, reproaching them with an indifference to fame, because they murmured at robbery; the American who can read without a blush, the letters of Carlyle and Sydney Smith, upon this subject, must entertain very different views of moral honesty from ours ; since the reasoning of the publishers to them, resembles closely that used by the sage Augustus Tomlinson in " Paul Clifford," who comforts the dispirited traveller, whose pockets he has rifled, with the assurance, that he has been made to perform a benevolent action in relieving the wants of the distressed.

We are aware that these are hard truths, but as we believe them to be true, no sensibility shall prevent our giving them utterance, and expressing plain things in plain words ; to the motives of those who differ from us, we accord all due credit, but it does seem to us that no chain of reasoning, however subtle and ingenious, can do away with the force of the plain statement of facts set forth above. We are not ignorant of the fact, that many ingenious defences have been made for the publishers to palliate their invasion of the rights of authors ; some even going so far as to deny that an author has any property in the creations of his own mind, and that by the act of publication, he makes them the common property of all mankind, and loses all claim upon them ; this argument cannot possibly stand the test of a moment's reflection ; if admitted, it would strike at the root of all intellectual labor, and make the very existence of copyright a continued injustice.

Can it be seriously urged that one Butcher and Tailor, who cater solely to our physical wants, shall be amply remunerated ; while he, whose labors are directed towards the cultivation of the most noble portion of our nature, who addresses himself to the immortal mind of man, shall lay his priceless gifts at our feet, and there, like a poor pensioner, humbly wait for the alms which we may be pleased to bestow upon him : if such are to be the rewards, and such the position of those, who waste the flower of their youth and the vigor of their manhood, in painful and protracted study, " Slaves of the Lamp," uncheered by the sweet smile of woman, or the inspiring plaudits of the crowd ; how mad must he be, who would voluntarily incur a doom of such painful drudgery and abject slavery !

The topic is a fruitful one, but we think enough has been said to sustain the positions we have advanced, viz : that the system has crushed and destroyed all native authorship, and that it is based upon the most glaring wrong and injustice ; and we therefore proceed to substantiate our third charge, which is, that the character of the most widely circulated publications of this class, is such, as to taint and corrupt the minds of our youth. The injury complained of in the second charge is of a nature not immediately perceptible to superficial observers, the bad effects being consequential, rather than immediate ; but this last evil is of such an open and glaring character as to be obvious to the dullest perception, and of itself, sufficient to cast the whole system into disrepute, if fully proven and sustained.

The first works with which this movement commenced, as we before observed, were the republications of English Magazines ; then succeeded the rapid and cheap republications of English novels ; the sale of these was so profitable that reprints of standard works of fiction followed next, with occasionally, a work of grave and solid character, to give a character to the undertaking. A thirst for works of fiction was thus created among the reading public, the demand exceeded the supply, and they were compelled to eke out with works of very inferior merit, and these tended to vitiate still further the public taste by the application of stimulants until solid food was distasteful to them ; although, as yet, no positive evil has been done. But the unprecedented success of this new movement called another class into the field ; the harpies of Literature came flocking in unbidden to the banquet, and defiled with their filthy touch the food which was to be set before the people ; the licentious novels of Charles Paul de Kock and George Sand (Mdme Dudevant) and other kindred spirits were translated and published in pamphlet-form, thrown before the public just at the time when it was thirsting for new excitement ; they spread like wildfire, and were followed by others of similar character, until the public sentiment, in the large cities, became so vitiated, that works of gross immorality were openly vended in the public streets. Nor did the evil stop here, for it spread in a black and filthy stream over the length and breadth of our land.

It may be thought that we had exaggerated the extent of this evil, but we do not speak from hearsay, but from the evidence of our own senses. During the last two years, we have visited almost every section of our Union, and the books which met our view more often than any other, were the pestilent French novels to which we have alluded ; through the untiring energy of agents, these books have penetrated into the most secluded villages, tainting the public morals and scattering the seeds of vice broadcast over the land ; and this is the substitute which " Cheap Publication " has given us for a wholesome Literature of our own.

De Kock has been called " The Bulwer of France," but the very coupling of their names together is an insult to the latter, who, if he has at times deviated from the strict line of propriety, would yet scorn to prostitute his talents to the detail of scenes of low vice and criminal indulgence, and such seems to be the sole aim and end of the French novelist, to render virtue ridiculous and vice attractive, and the very talent he displays in the prosecution of his task renders his novels the most dangerous as well as the most fascinating to inexperienced youth. But they are " very cheap," " only one shilling," and, therefore, prudent fathers of families must encourage a system which reduces so much the price of books, &c.

George Sand (M^{de} Dudevant) is, if possible, worse in her morals, (if the term may be applied to the absence of all morality,) than Paul De Kock, but as she is a lady, or at least a female, we will pass both her and her novels by in expressive silence. Is it wonderful then, that the moral tone of a people, who encourage and foster a system based upon fraud and productive of such fruits, should become lax and licentious in the extreme; and is not this tendency already indicated, by the rapid and alarming increase of crime, in every portion of our country where a dense population affords facilities for its commission?

Is not repudiation both by States and individuals daily becoming more fashionable? Are not breaches of trust becoming matters of every day's occurrence? Is not the defaulting cashier of a bank now regarded only as an able financier? and is not the confidence between man and man each day shaken more and more? Let him who can shut his eyes to the fact with the proofs staring him in the face; we cannot if we would. The great want of this country is a want of faith; we do not mean religious faith, but use the term in its most comprehensive sense of confidence in human integrity and honesty, without which, enlarged views and liberal feelings cannot exist among a people; for the public mind, for want of some nobler subjects of contemplation, will be absorbed in projects of speculation, and narrowed down to mean and selfish views of human nature and human life.

The phrase, "knowledge of the world," was once construed by a sarcastic wit to mean "a knowledge of all the rascals in it," and this definition would seem with us to have become a part of the popular creed, since one of our most upright and honest statesmen has been declared "impracticable," from his open sincerity of character!—a stronger commentary on the state of public feeling could not be made than that afforded by this simple fact. There is but one remedy for this unwholesome state of public feeling, and that is, the diffusion of intelligence, not by a Cheap Literature, but by a wholesome and a manly one, of native growth, and suited to the temper and spirit of our people and to the institutions under which they live; such a Literature as would spring up spontaneously in our free country, were the foul weeds which choke its growth unsparingly rooted out. The wise and good of our country have perceived this and struggled to effect this end, but the hydra-headed monster, Cheap Literature, stands in the path and bars all further progress; how then can we combat this monster, who deludes the people into accepting poison in place of food; there is but one remedy, and that is a remedy which the most respectable authors and publishers of our country are now combined in praying for, and their prayer is echoed by the plundered authors and publishers on the other side of the Atlantic, and it is the passage by Congress of an International Copyright Law. A measure which will do no more than an act of simple justice to foreign authors, and will free our native authors from the deadly incubus which now stifles and paralyzes them with its hateful pressure. For the honor of the American Congress, we trust that it will no longer sanction, by its silence, this barefaced system of piracy and plunder, but proclaim Martial Law, and hang up to the yard-arm all who shall hereafter violate the laws of national courtesy and national honor.

THE AXE OF THE SETTLER.

BY MARY E. HEWITT.

We are not aware that the following poem has ever appeared. The authoress thinks it has not, though she once gave it another direction.—Ed. Mess.

Thou conqueror of the wilderness,
With keen and bloodless edge—
Hail! to the sturdy artisan
Who fashioned thee, bold wedge!
Though the warrior deem thee weapon
All unseemly for the brave,
Yet the settler knows thee mightier
Than the tried Damascus glaive.

While desolation marketh
The course of foeman's brand,
Thy blow aye scatters plenty,
Abundant through the land.
Thou op'nest the soil to culture,
To the sunlight and the dew;
And the village spire thou plantest
Where of old the forest grew.

Thou hew'st forth mighty navies
From the erst unyielding wood;
Their keels on every tide to float,
Their flags o'er every flood.
When the broad sea rolled between them
And their own far native land;
Thou wert the goodly ally
Of the hardy pilgrim band.

They bore no warlike eagles,
No banners swept the sky;
Nor the clarion, like a tempest,
Swelled its fearful notes on high.
But the ringing wild reëchoed
Thy bold, resistless strokes,
Where, like incense, on the morning
Went up their cabin smokes.

The tall oaks bowed before them,
Like reeds before the blast;
And the earth put forth in gladness,
Where the axe in triumph passed.
Then hail! thou noble conqueror!
That giv'st us to possess,
With the freehold of its fastnesses,
The ancient wilderness.

New-York.

THE "STONE HOUSE."

The "Stone House," as it is called, is perhaps the most curious and interesting relic in Virginia. Two accounts of it appeared some time since, one in the Richmond Whig, the other in the Farmer's Register. From them the following description is gathered. The "Stone House" is situated on Ware Creek, a tributary of York River, in the county of James City. It is distant from the mouth of Ware creek five miles, from Williamsburg fifteen, and from Jamestown twenty-two. The walls and chimney which remain are composed of sandstone. The house is eighteen and a half feet by fifteen in extent. It consists of a basement room under ground and a story above. On the West side is a door-way six feet wide, giving entrance to both apartments. There are loop-holes in the walls, measuring on the inside twenty by ten inches, on the outside twenty by four. The walls are in the basement two feet thick, in the upper story eighteen inches thick. The masonry bears marks of having been executed with great care and nicety. The house stands in an extensive waste of woods, on a high knoll or promontory, around the foot of which winds Ware Creek. The structure fronts on the Creek, being elevated one hundred feet above its level and standing back three hundred feet from its margin. The spot is approached only by a long circuitous defile, the comb of a ridge, in some places so narrow that two carts could not pass abreast. This defile is, besides, involved in such a labyrinth of dark ridges of forest and deep gloomy ravines, mantled with laurel, that it is said to be next to impossible to find the way without the aid of a guide. Nor is the place more accessible by water. The surrounding country is described as the most broken and desert track to be found East of the Blue Ridge.

The singular structure of the old "Stone House" and its wild secluded desolate site have naturally given rise to several traditions and conjectures as to its origin and purpose. It is said, that there is a neighborhood tradition, that the house was erected as early as thirteen years after the landing at Jamestown—and that it was built by the famous pirate Blackbeard, as a depository of his plunder. This hypothesis, however, involves a serious anachronism; since it is well established that Blackbeard did not figure in the waters of Virginia until about the year 1717—more than a century after the landing at Jamestown.

Another fanciful conjecture is, that the "Stone House," like the cave where Dido entertained Æneas, was a sort of rendezvous meeting-place of Captain Smith and Pochahontas! This is rather too romantic.

Another conjecture, much more plausible than either of those above-mentioned, is that the house was built by the adherents of Bacon in his rebellion, who, after their leader's death, still held out so pertinaciously against Governor Berkley. This surmise, however, would seem to be unfounded. Firstly, it is well known that those followers of Bacon, occupied West-Point at the head of York River, strongly fortified it and made it their place of arms. That post in their hands actually proved impregnable against repeated assaults of the Governor's forces under Ludwell. And Sir William Berkley at length, fatigued by their resolute defence, in order to induce their surrender, was obliged to offer the rebels there a general pardon, which nothing less than the last necessity could have extorted from him. The position occupied by Bacon's adherents at West-Point being so strong and every way convenient, there could have been no motive to prompt them to build another fortification on Ware Creek.

In the next place, it is altogether improbable that the vindictive vigilance of Berkley would have suffered Bacon's followers unmolested to erect such a work as the "Stone House," whose elaborate construction would seem rather to indicate that it was built in the leisure of peace, than in the anxious precipitancy of a hard-pressed and hopeless rebellion.

Lastly, of Bacon's rebellion, there are several minute circumstantial accounts and it is improbable that Beverley, T. M. and others would have omitted a fact so interesting as the erection of a fortified work on Ware Creek, when they were detailing so many other particulars of less consequence.

So much for these conjectures. I now beg leave to suggest another, founded on the following passage:—

*"We built also a fort for a retreat neere a convenient river, upon a high commanding hill, very hard to be assailed and easie to be defended, but ere it was finished this defect caused a stay. In searching our casked corne, we found it halfe rotten and the rest so consumed with so many thousands of rats that increased so fast, but their originall was from the ships, as we knew not how to keepe that little we had. This did drive us all to our wits end, for there was nothing in the country but what nature afforded." * * "But this want of corne occasioned the end of all our works, it being worke sufficient to provide victuall."—Smith's Hist. of Va., B. III., p. 227.*

Upon lately meeting with this passage in Smith, I was forcibly struck with the coincidence between the fort thus spoken of by him and the "Stone House." If the conjecture be well founded, it will entitle that structure to the claim of being the oldest house in Virginia, if not in the United States, as the fort mentioned by Smith was erected about the year 1608-9, only two or three years after the landing at Jamestown, which would make it about two hundred and thirty-four years old. Smith says "We built also a fort for a retreat;" that is a retreat from the Indians, in case Jamestown should have been overpowered. "Neere a convenient river." The "Stone House" is about a hundred yards from Ware Creek. "A convenient river,"—by the description given above, it is seen that no situation could have been more eligible. It may be worth while to observe that the name of the river is not given; now, in all probability, Ware Creek at that early day had not been named by the English, being an unimportant stream. "Upon a high commanding hill;" this answers exactly to the site of the "Stone House." "Very hard to be assailed and easy to be defended;" all the descriptions of the "Stone House" fully confirm these particulars. "But ere it was finished, this defect caused a stay," &c. * * "But this want of time occasioned the end of all our works," &c. Now the "Stone House" is apparently incomplete and there is neither roof nor floor; this unfinished appearance seems to have puzzled some of its visitors. Smith's statement, however, that it was left unfinished, may at once solve the enigma.

From all these corroborating circumstances, there seems to be good reason to conclude, that the "Stone House" is the fort mentioned by Smith. Its antiquity, the associations connected with it, the superstitious fancies to which it has given rise and its wild and sequestered situation, all conspire to render the old "Stone House" an attractive object to the tourist and the antiquary, and, perhaps, not uninteresting even to the novelist and poet.

YORKTOWN.

At Yorktown, at the residence of William Nelson, Esq., there are to be seen portraits of William Nelson, President, (who built the house) and Elizabeth Barwell, his wife. It is said that those portraits during the revolution, when the British were making incursions into Virginia, were boxed up and sent to Hanover Court-House for preservation from the enemy. The British, however, found them in Hanover and mutilated them there.

This house was, at the time of the siege of York, the residence of General Thomas Nelson. It was a good deal damaged by the American artillery,—traces of the damage being yet visible. A pannel in the wainscoat is still loose, from the effects of a cannon-ball, or bomb-shell.

The Old Church, at Yorktown, was built 150 years ago. The Hon. Francis Nicholson contributed twenty pounds sterling towards its cost, as appears by the following paper, that appeared some time since in the Richmond Enquirer:—"the following is a literal copy from the records of York County Court:

"York County October ye 26th 1696. I promise to give five pounds sterling towards building the Cott. house at Yorké Towne and twenty pounds sterl'g if within two years they build a brick church att the same townne. As witness my hand ye day and year above written.

"Stiphen ffoward

The above writing p'ented in cott: and according to order is committed to Record.

William Sedgwick cl. cur."

I had the pleasure some years ago of visiting the remains of the Old Church at Yorktown. Nothing was left but the walls. These are composed of stone marl, which it is said, soft when taken out of its native bed, becomes hardened by time and exposure, until it acquires the firmness and durability of solid stone. The roof was open to the eye of day and foxes might peep, by moonlight, out at the dismantled windows. Adjacent lies the old grave-yard, enclosed by an antiquated brick wall. Here are several tomb-stones of the Nelsons and others, some with Latin inscriptions, some with English, and adorned with the insignia of heraldry. The site of the church is superb, immediately on the lofty bank of the sparkling cerulean waters of the majestic York. The spot is consecrated by the ashes of the illustrious dead, the charms of nature, its antique recollections and the classic associations of the siege and surrender.

The patriotism of the North has erected a sublime monument on Bunker Hill, to commemorate the portentous dawn of the revolution; when shall the patriotism of the South raise such an one, on the field of Yorktown, to commemorate the parting glories of the sunset?

ROSEWELL.

Rosewell, formerly the seat of John Page, Esq., sometime Governor of Virginia, is situated on the North bank of York River, in the county of Gloucester, and nearly opposite the mouth of Queen's Creek. The house stands a short distance back from the river, and, as seen from the water, is an imposing and venerable monument of the olden time. It is a cube of ninety feet, with fourteen windows in front. Its appearance is singularly solid and massive. The interior is pannelled and wainscoated in the old style; some of the apartments in black walnut highly polished and which, it is said, were formerly waxed as floors now are. The old hall is a superb room: around the panneling are some antique hooks, on which the tapestry hangings were suspended. The tapestry was still preserved there a few years ago. The mahogany of the hall stair-case is richly carved. The doors are arched over-head. There are four stories; the upper, when I saw it, a good deal decayed, the floor in some of the rooms having "settled." There are twelve rooms. The bricks, it is said, came from England. They are of the species styled oil-bricks, so called from the oil used in moulding them. They are laid, alternately, lengthwise and endwise, the end-bricks being glazed according to the fashion of that day. The walls, where most exposed, are tinged with verd-antique mould and the cornice in some places is decayed. The roof is flat and sheeted with lead. The story that there was once a fishpond up there, is fabulous. Tradition mentions that Mr. Jefferson and Governor Page, there, in the evening, sometimes enjoyed conversation and the moonlight scenery of the York. The view, therefrom, embraces about ten miles both up and down the river. The York is there wide and magnificent, clear, fresh and sparkling as the ocean.

Formerly there was a vineyard in front of Rosewell house and a garden in the rear. There are now few or no trees in front of the house, and this circumstance perhaps enhances the effect. It seems to stand in proud and silent solitude, like some old baronial castle. Rosewell, besides its own interesting associations, is remarkable as standing near Werowocomoco, the spot where Smith was rescued from death by his guardian genius, Pochahontas.

WEROWOCOMOCO.

Next to Jamestown, Werowocomoco is perhaps the spot most celebrated in the early chronicles of Virginia. As Jamestown was the seat of the English settlers, so Werowocomoco was the residence of the great Indian chief, Powhatan. It was the scene of many interviews and rencontres between the settlers and the savages; it was at Werowocomoco that supplies for the colony were frequently obtained; here that Smith once saw suspended on a line between two trees the scalps of twenty four Payanketanks recently slain,—here that Powhatan was crowned by Newport, and here that occurred the most touching scene in the whole colonial drama, the rescue of Smith by Pochahontas. Werowocomoco is on the York river, in the county of Gloucester. It may surprise some readers to hear, that the rescue of Smith took place on the York, since, in the general neglect of our early history, it seems to have been taken for granted by many that it took place on James River. Smith and Stith, in their histories, put the matter beyond dispute. Smith, Book II., p. 117, describes the Pamaunkee [now York] river as follows:

"Fourteen myles northward from the river Powhatan is the river Pamaunkee, which is navigable 60 or 70 myles, but with catches and small barks 30 or 40 myles farther. At the ordinary flowing of the salt water, it divideth itself into two gallant branches. On the South side inhabit the people of Youghtanund, who have about 60 men for warres. On the north branch Mattapanient, who have 30 men. Where this river is divided, the country is called Pamaunkee [now West Point] and nourisheth neare 300 able men. About 25 myles lower, on the North side of this river, is Werowocomoco, where their great king inhabited when I was delivered him prisoner."

Again, Book II., p. 142, Smith says:

"At Werowocomoco, on the North side of the river Pamaunkee [York] was his [Powhatan's] residence, when I was delivered him prisoner, some 14 myles from James Towne where, for the most part, he was resident."

Stith, as quoted by Burk's History of Virginia, Vol. I., p. 111., describes its position as follows:

"Werowocomoco lay on the North side of York river, in Gloucester county, nearly opposite to the mouth of Queen's Creek and about twenty-five miles below the fork of the river."

Upon a short visit made to that part of Gloucester county a year or two ago, I was satisfied that Shelly, the seat of Mrs. Mann Page, is the famous Werowocomoco. Shelly is on the North bank of the York river, in the county of Gloucester, said to be about 25 miles from West Point at the head of the river, and is nearly opposite the mouth of Queen's Creek, lying somewhat above. It is true, the word "nearly" is indefinite, and it might be supposed that Werowocomoco, perhaps, lay a little below the point opposite the mouth of Queen's Creek instead of a little above. But the marshy oozy character of the bank of the York below Shelly, rendering it apparently uninhabitable, seems to forbid the supposition. Werowocomoco then, it may be taken for granted, was either at Shelly, or at some point above Shelly. But as Shelly is nearly opposite the mouth of Queen's Creek, it is obvious that the further you proceed up the river, the less appropriate will become the expression "nearly opposite."

Carter's Creek, emptying into the York at Shelly, forms a safe harbor for canoes. Smith, in a passage already quoted, mentions that Werowocomoco is 14 miles from Jamestown. In Book III., p. 194, he says, that "he went over land to Werowocomoco some twelve miles; there he passed the river of Pamaunkee in a salvage canow." Now, as it was 14 miles from Jamestown to Werowocomoco, and 12 to the point on the South bank of the York, where Smith embarked in a canoe, it follows that Werowocomoco was only 2 miles from that point. And Shelly, I take it is just about 2 miles from where it is probable Smith went into the canoe on that occasion.

Shelly adjoins Rosewell, (formerly the seat of John Page, Esq., sometime Governor of Virginia,) and was originally part of the Rosewell plantation; and I learned from Mrs. Page, of Shelly, that Governor Page always held Shelly to be the ancient Werowocomoco and accordingly he, at first, gave it that name, but afterwards, on account of the inconvenient length of the word, dropped it, and adopted the title of Shelly, on account of the extraordinary accumulation of shells found there. The enormous beds of oyster-shells deposited there, particularly just in front of the Shelly house, indicate it to have been a place of great resort among the natives. The situation is highly picturesque and beautiful and looking, as it does, on the lovely and majestic York, it would seem, of all others, to have been the befitting residence of the lordly Powhatan. According to Captain Smith, the circumstances of his rescue were as follows:

At last they brought Smith to Werowocomoco, the residence of the King Powhatan. Here, while Powhatan and his attendants were adorning themselves in their best attire, more than 200 grim savages stood gazing in amazement at the captive, as if he had been a monster. On Smith's entering the royal wigwam, he found Powhatan before a fire, upon a seat resembling a bedstead. He was covered with an ample robe of raccoon skins. On either hand sate a young female of 16 or 18 years, and along each side of the wigwam two rows of men and behind them as many women, with their heads and shoulders painted red, the heads of many bedecked with the white down of birds; every one with some ornament and all wearing a long necklace of pearls. Upon Smith's appearance before Powhatan, the savages raised a terrific shout. The queen of Apamattuck was appointed to bring Smith water to wash his hands; another female offered him a bunch of feathers instead of a towel to wipe his hands. After feasting the prisoner in their barbarous manner, a long council was held. That concluded, two large stones were brought and laid the one upon the other before Powhatan. Then, as many as could, laid hold of Smith and dragging him to the stones,* thereon laid his head, when brandishing their war-clubs to put him to death, Pochahontas, the King's dearest daughter, finding that no entreaty would avail, flew to Smith, bent over him, clasped his head in her arms and laid her own upon his to shield him from impending death. Pity triumphed! Powhatan relenting, spared the captive's life, that he might make tomahawks for him and bells and beads for Pochahontas. History nowhere affords a scene of more exquisite pathos; the lapse of time will continually enhance its interest and in ages of the distant future the traveler will linger at Werowocomoco, a spot blessed with the lovely charms of natural beauty and consecrated by the tender heroism of Pochahontas.

Petersburg, Oct. 41, 1843.

*These, some suppose, were what the Indians termed pawcorances, i. e. altar stones, which Powhatan was accustomed to use in the execution of criminals.

TO E—, WITH A WITHERED ROSE-BUD.

BY HENRY B. HIRST.

The rose you gave me, love, has lost
The beauty of its blooming hour,
But yet a fairy fragrance clings
Around the ruined flower;
And so the smile you gave me, love,
Shone but an instant on my sight,
And yet its memory remains
To thrill me with delight.

And now I give the rose again,
Content that memory should be
The only thing to call me back
To thought of love and thee.

For lo, our lots are set apart,
And mine is all too sad a way
To shadow with its cypress boughs
The morning of thy May.

GEORGIA SCENES.

I take for granted, Mr. Editor, that the greater number of your subscribers are familiar with the admirable "Georgia Scenes," of Judge Longstreet, which have been issued in one volume from the press of the Harpers. But I suspect few of them have ever seen the characteristic sketches which I send you, entitled "Little Ben" and "Darby Anvil," from the same graphic native writer. They are taken from the columns of an obscure Georgia paper, which is now no longer published. That they may produce in your readers many a hearty cackination, is my reason for sending them to you, and will be your sufficient justification for giving them the wide circulation which they merit. It should be a part of your policy to bind together in your family sheaf, these stray leaves of Southern genius when they fall under your eye; and I am very sure that a department of your journal devoted to the select passages which occasionally find their way—one knows not why—into the columns of the ordinary newspaper,—would be very grateful to many who look into newspapers for very different matters. Let me make a farther suggestion—that for the sake of your readers you seek to secure the original contributions of Judge Longstreet for your Messenger. He—I am told—is not unprepared to unfold a budget full of as good things as ever relieved the cares of Nestor, and led him into hearty worship at the side-rendering shrine of Momus.

ASHLY RIVER.

The readers of the Messenger have already enjoyed "many a hearty cackination" over several of the inimitable "Georgia Scenes," and among them "Little Ben." As but few of them, however, may have read "Darby Anvil," it gives us pleasure to present it.

It is indeed our policy to bind together the "stray leaves of Southern Genius;" but we hope that the gifted author of these graphic sketches will not leave us to collect his "leaves" as they stray; but send them to us in all their birthday freshness.

The Harpers have recently issued another edition of the "Georgia Scenes," but it does not embrace either "Little Ben" or "Darby Anvil."—Ed. Mess.

DARBY ANVIL.

I well remember the first man who, without any qualifications for the place, was elected to the legislature of Georgia. He was a blacksmith by trade, and Darby Anvil was his name. I would not be understood as saying that none had preceded him, but men of profound wisdom or even notable talents—at the time of which I am speaking, such were not to be found in every country in the state—but that none had been deputed to that body who were not vastly superior to Anvil in every moral and intellectual quality.

Darby came hither just at the close of the Revolutionary war; and if his own report of himself is to be believed, "he fit" in that memorable struggle. True, he never distinctly stated on which side "he fit," but as he spoke freely of the incidents of the Revolution, and at a time when tories were very scarce and very mute, it was taken for granted that he fought on the right side.

Darby established himself upon a lot in the then village of —, which cost him nothing; for in his day, town lots, and even large tracts of land were granted to any one, who would occupy them for a given time. Two log huts soon rose upon Darby's lot; into one of which, he stowed his wife and children, and in the other his blacksmith's tools. He now plied his trade assiduously; and as all trades flourished at that time, he grew rich apace. A year had hardly rolled away before a snug framed house rose in front of his log dwelling; and his shop gave place to one of more taste and convenience, from the hands of a carpenter. The brand of horse-shoes upon the shop door, no longer served Darby for a sign; but high over the entrance of the smithery from a piece of iron work, of crooks and convolutions unutterable, hung a flaming sign-board, decorated on either side, with appropriate designs. On one side was Darby in person, shoeing General Washington's horse—I say it was Washington's horse, because Darby said so, and Billy Spikes, who painted it, said so. Certainly it was large enough for Washington's horse: for taking Darby, whose height I knew for a gague, and the horse could not have been less than five-and-twenty feet high. On the other side was a plough, with handles nine feet long, by the same measure; studded with hoes, and axes, staples and horse-shoes. Every thing around Darby bore the aspect of thrift and comfort. In short, his fortune increased, even faster than his children: and this is no small compliment to his industry and economy; for Mrs. Anvil had not, for many years, suffered eighteen months to pass, without reminding him, with a blush through a smirk, that she would "soon want a little sugar and coffee and sweeten'd dram for the little stranger." Darby had just received the tenth notice of this kind, when he resolved to turn politician. Whether they had any influence upon him in forming this rash resolution I am not prepared to say, but certain it is, that he had received these notices for several years preceding, with a rapidly declining interest; insomuch, that when the last came, it gave to his countenance an expression better suited to dyspepsia than to such joyous tidings; and he was proceeding to make a most uncourteous response, when the kindling fire of his lady's eye, brought him to an anticlimax of passive gentility. "Why, Nancy!" said he, "Lord a' massy on my soul! I don't grudge you the rum and sugar and coffee; but—r'aly it does seem to me—that—we're havin' a powerful chance o' children, some how or nother." I am digressing a little, but I cannot resume my subject, without doing Mrs. Anvil the justice to say, that she defended her dignity with becoming spirit, and by a short but pungent syllogism, taught Darby that he had more cause for self-condemnation, than for grudgings or astonishment.

Darby Anvil, though ignorant in the extreme, had some shrewdness, and much low cunning. He knew well the prejudices and weaknesses of the common people of the county, and had no little tact in turning them to his own advantage.

Two attorneys of eminence, who had repeatedly served the state in her deliberative assemblies, during and after the war, were candidates for the popular branch of the legislature, when Darby determined to make a third and supernumerary candidate. He announced his aims in the only way in which he could have announced them without exposing himself to overwhelming ridicule; for the people of those days pretty generally harbored the superstitious notion, that talents were indispensable to wholesome legislation.

There was a great barbecue in the county. It was the wager of a hunting match, and consequently every body was invited, and every body attended. During the festival, when Darby and ten or twelve of his own class were collected round the bottle, "boys," said he, "how 'bout the 'lection this year?"

"Oh," says one, "there's no opposition."

"No opposition!" continued Darby; "by zounds, that'll never do; we'll have no fun. I'll be ding'd if I don't offer myself, if I can't git a smarter man to offer, rather than have no fun at all. What do you say, Bill Rucker; wont you go in for the old blacksmith against the lawyers?" smiling and winking to the bystanders.

"Oh yes," said Bill, carelessly, "I'll go in for you to a red heat."

"Well, that's one vote for the old blacksmith, any how."

"Johnny, you'll stick to uncle Darby, agin the lawyers, I know, won't you, Johnny?"

"Yes," said John Fields, "I'll stick to you like grim death to a dead nigger."

"Jimmy Johns 'll go—oh no, I've no chance of Jimmy's vote; bein' as how he's a mighty takin' to lawyers since his brother Bob's case was tryn. How 'bout that Jimmy?" with a dry, equivocal laugh.

"Blast there infernal souls!" said Jim, "I'd vote for the devil 'fore I'd vote for either of them. They made out my evidence was nothin' 't all but swearin' lies for brother Bob from one eend to tother."

"Well, Jimmy," pursued Darby, "you mustn't mind uncle Darby's laughin', my son. I can't help laughin' every time I think how mad you was when you come to my shop that day; but you know I told you you'd get over it, and vote for the 'squires at last, didn't I?"

"Yes, and you told a lie too, did n't you uncle Darby?"

Here Darby roared immoderately, and then becoming suddenly very grave, he proceeded:

"But boys, puttin' all jokin' away, its wrong, mighty wrong, for any body to be puttin' upon any body's charricter after that sorts, I don't care who they is. And if I was in the legislater, the first thing I'd do would be to stop it."

"Well, uncle Darby, why don't you offer?" said Johns; "I'll go for you, and there's plenty more'll go for you if you'll come out."

"Yes, that there is," said Job Snatch, (another sufferer in court.) "I'll go for you."

"And so will I," said Seth Weed.

"Why boys," interrupted Darby, "if you don't hush, you'll make me come out sure enough. And what would I do in the 'assembly?"

"I'll tell you what you'd do," said Sam Flat, crustily, "you'd set up in one corner of the room, like poor folks at a frolic, and never open your mouth. And I'll tell you another thing—my opinion is you want to offer too, and you're only fishing for an excuse to do it now."

Darby burst into a loud laugh; but there was enough of chagrin mingled with it, to shew plainly that he felt the truth of Sam's remark. It was near a minute before he could reply:

"Oh no, Sammy, I've no notion of offerin', unless it mout be just to have a little fun. And if I was to offer what harm would it do? I couldn't be elected; and if I wasn't, I wouldn't care; for it wouldn't be no disgrace for a poor blacksmith to be beat by great folks, that's beat every body."

"Well," said Jimmy Johns, "may I say you's a cand'date?"

"Jimmy, you is a free man, and has a right to say what you please."

"And I'm a free man, and I'll say what I please too," said Job Snatch.

"And so am I," said Seth Weed.

"Why what's got into these boys!" chuckled out Darby. "I b'lieve they're gwine to make me a cand'date whether I will or no. I didn't know I had so much pop'larity. Let me git away from here or I'll be made a great man in spite of myself. But I must take a drink before I go. Come boys, let's take a drink; and I'll give you a toast:

"Here's wishin' that honest man, who's 'blige to go to court to swear,

May not be 'low'd to be made game of by lawyers of the BARE."

This sentiment, like many electioneering harangues of equal merit in the present day, was received "with unbounded applause;" and amidst laughter and entreaties for a repetition of the toast, Darby hastened away to a small party of marksmen, who had made up a match, and were trying their skill apart from the throng. To these, he made himself obsequious, while his friends spread the news of his candidacy. It soon pervaded the whole assembly, and many went to him to know the truth of the report. His answers to such were regulated by the tone and manner with which they put their questions. If they exhibited no astonishment, he told them, that "he had tried to git off, but his friends kept plagueing him so to offer, that he was 'blige to give up, or make 'em all mad, and, therefore, he told 'em they mout do as they pleased." If the inquirer exhibited signs of wonder and incredulity, Darby gave him an affirmative, with all the tokens of irony. Among the rest came Smith and Jones, the two candidates. They happened to meet him just as he was returning to the crowd from the shooting match, and when no person was with him.

"Darby," enquired Smith, "is it possible that you are a candidate for the legislature?"

"Why not?" returned Anvil with a blush.

"Why you are utterly unqualified—you will disgrace yourself."

"I know," rejoined Anvil, "that I'd make a mighty poor out of speaking agin lawyers, but I reckon as how, I could vote as good as them."

"You are mistaken, Darby," said Jones. "It requires a better head to vote right, than to speak well. The business of law making, is a very delicate business, which should be managed with the nicest care, especially in this country. It is true that it has been much simplified in the several states by our admirable form of government. A vast variety of subjects, and those too which the people at large, are generally best acquainted with, have been withdrawn from the state legislature. But still, the States are sovereign; and possess all power not specially delegated to the general government—

"You should have said," interrupted Smith, "that the state legislation has been diminished, rather, than that it has been simplified. In truth it has been rendered more intricate by our novel form of government. In other countries, the law-giver has only to study the interests of the people, and legislate accordingly: but here, in addition to the ordinary duties of a legislator, he has others of infinite difficulty and infinite importance to discharge. He is one of the guardians of a State, which is both sovereign and subject—sovereign, by constitution—subject, by concession. He must consider well, therefore, the powers which she has ceded, and yield implicit obedience to them; he must study well the powers which she has reserved, and fearlessly maintain them. An error on the one hand is a step towards anarchy—an error on the other is a step towards slavery"—

"Why," interrupted Darby, "I don't understand head nor tail of all this sarment."

"I was not addressing myself to you," said Smith, "though I confess that what I was saying, was meant for your improvement. I was in hopes you would understand enough of it to discover your unfitness for the legislature."

"I think," said Jones, "I can convince Darby of that, in a more intelligible way."

"Darby, what does a man go to the legislature for?"

"Why, to make laws," said Darby.

"True; and to mend such as have been made. Now do you know what laws have been made?"

"No."

"Do you know how those have operated which have been made?"

"Operated!"

"I mean, do you know whether they have proved good or bad?"

"No, I tell you; I don't know notin' 'tall 'bout 'em."

"Well, now suppose a man should come to your shop and offer to work for you a month—at plough-making we will suppose—and when you asked him if he understood making such ploughs as were used in Georgia, he should reply, that he knew nothing at all about ploughs—his whole life had been spent in shoe-making; but that if you would lay two ploughs before him he could tell you which he thought best, and that, whenever you wanted his opinion, or vote, upon shop matters, he could give it as good as any one. What would you think of him?"

"Then 'cordin' to your chat, no body ought to go to 'ssembly but lawyers," said Darby.

"I do not say so; but that no one should go there who has not some little knowledge of the business, which he has to do. If he possess this knowledge, it matters not, whether he be lawyer, farmer, merchant, or mechanic."

By this time quite a crowd, mostly of unlettered persons, had collected round the candidates; and though it was impossible for Darby to hide his chagrin while he and his competitors were alone, it became less and less visible with every accession to the group; so that by the time Mr. Jones concluded his remarks, it was entirely dissipated; and Darby stood before the company, decidedly the most self-confident of the three.

"Well," said he, planting himself astraddle, and placing his arms akimbo, "now I've heard you all through, let me see how the old blacksmith can argify with two lawyers at a time. I know I'm nothin' but a poor ign'ant blacksmith that don't know nothin' no how; and furthermore I don't think no body ought to go to the 'ssembly but lawyers nether, bein' as how they're the smartest people in the world. But howsomedever, that's neither here nor thar. Now Mr. Smith, you say I'd disgrace myself to go to the 'ssembly; and I reckon it's so, for I'm like my neighbors here, hard working people, who ha'n't got no business doin' nothin' but working for great folks and rich folks no how. But howsomedever, that's nither here nor thar, as the fellow said. Now I want to ax you a few questions; and you mustn't git mad with me, for I only want to git a little larnin'. And firstly of the first place, to begin at the beginnin', as the fellow said. A'n't a poor man as free as a rich man?"

winking, with a smerk to the bystanders.

"Certainly," said Smith.

"And didn't they fight for libity, as well as rich ones?"

"Yes."

"Well—hem!—and a'n't they as honest as rich men?"

"No doubt of it."

"Well, if a poor man is as free as a rich man," (now you mustn't git mad with me,) and they fit for libity as well as them, and is as honest; how comes it, that some people that's the smartest in the world, votes for no body havin' votes, but them that's got land!" Here several of the bystanders who had been interchanging winks and smiles, in token that they foresaw the dilemma into which Darby was leading his antagonist, burst into a loud laugh.

"Now a'n't he the devil!" whispered one.

"I tell you what it is," said a second, "the law-years a'n't gwine to git nothin' out o' him."

"Mighty smart man"—said a third, gravely—"powerful smart, for his oppitunities!"

"I advocated free hold suffrage," returned Smith, "in the convention that framed the constitution, not because I thought the rich man entitled to higher privileges than the poor man; but because I thought him less exposed to temptation. Indeed, my proposition made no distinction between the poor and the rich; for there is not a farmer in the state who has not more land than would have entitled him to a vote under it. But I apprehend the time will come, when our state will be inundated with strangers and sojourners among us—mere floating adventurers—who have no common interest, feeling, or sympathy with us, who will prostitute the right of suffrage to private gain, and set up their votes to the highest bidder. I would, therefore, have confined this right to those who have a fixed and permanent interest in the state—who must share the honors, or suffer the penalties of wise, or corrupt legislation."

"If Smith is to be blamed," said Jones, "for his course in the convention, so am I. I differed from him to be sure in measure but agreed with him in principle. I would have had a small property-qualification, without confining it to land; but his answer to this was decisive. If the amount of property required were large, it would disqualify many honest voters who are permanent residents of the State—if it were small, every stranger who brought with him money enough to bear his travelling expenses would be qualified to vote. But we were both overruled."

"Gentlemen," said Darby, "you talk too much dictionary for me. I wasn't raised to much book-larnin', nor dictionary larnin'. But howsomedever; I think squire Smith, you said any body that didn't own land would sell their votes to the highest bidder; and I reckon it's so, for you great folks knows more than me; but 'the proof of the pud-din's in chawin' the bag,' as the fellow said; therefore, let's see how the thing 'll work. Jimmy Johns, you don't own no land, and therefore 'ccordin' to the squire's noration, you'll sell your vote to the highest bidder. What'll you take for it?"

"No body better not tell me," said Jim, "that I'll sell my vote; or I'll be dad seized if I don't fling a handful o' fingers right in his face in short metcher—I don't care who he is."

"I did not say," resumed Smith, "that any man now in the State would sell his vote—nor do I believe any true Georgian by birth, or adoption, ever will; but the time will come when idle, worthless vagabonds, will come amongst us, who will sell their votes, for a pint of rum, if they can get no more."

"Well squire, now it seems to me—but I don't know—but it seems to me, some how or nother, that it'll be time enough to have land votin', when that time comes; and not to begin upon poor folks now, to stop mean folks when we're all dead and gone. Them folks, I reckon, can take care o' themselves."

"Then it will be too late," interposed Jones. "Men who have a marketable article, will never give it away, or allow it to be taken from them. Should they be willing to renounce it, there will be factious demagogues enough to prevent them from so doing. No, Darby, if you would establish a good government, you must do it at its organization. Thenceforward there is a ceaseless war between the governors and the governed. The rulers are ever usurping the rights of the people, or the people are ever resuming the rights of the —"

"Stop a little thar," interrupted Darby. "You say thar's a war 'tween the governor and the government. Now what's the reason I never hearn of that war? I've hearn of the old French war and the Revolution war, and the Indian war; but I never hearn of that war before."

"I don't say," continued Jones, impatiently, "that there is a war—a fight——"

"Oh, well, if you take that back, why we'll start agin. But howsomever, when I'm gwine to a place, I always try to take the right road at first, and then thar's no 'casion for turnin' back."

"Well, Darb," said Jones, "you are certainly a bigger fool than I took you to be, and that's not your worst fault."

"Well, now you see," said Darby, bristling, "that kind o' chat ain't gwine to do for me no how; and you must take it back, quick as you did the war, or I'll make the fur fly to the tother sorts."

"Yes, I'll be dad seized if I didn't," said Jimmy Johns, becoming furious—"talkin' 's talkin,' but callin' a man the fool, 's no sort o' chat."

"Uncle Darby," said John Field, "you gwine to swallow that? If you do you needn't count on John Field's vote."

"No, I'm not," continued Darby, touching his coat. "Gentlemen, I didn't go to squire Jones; he come to me and brought on the fuss, and I don't think I'm to blame. My charricter is as good to me, as his'n to him, and—gentlemen I'm a plain, hard working man, but I'll be burn'd if I can bear every thing."

"Strip yourself, Darby," said Snatch, flinging off his coat, as if it were full of nettles, and pouring forth a volley of oaths without order or connection—"strip yourself—you shan't be imposed upon—I'll see you out."

"Oh, well now," said John Reynolds, (the bully of the county,) coolly, "if there's to be any furling here, I must have a little of the pulling of it. And Darby, you're not going to knock the 'squire till you walk over me to do it. He's holpt my wife and children too often when they've been sick, for me to stand by and see him imposed upon, right or wrong—that's the racket."

"Well, Johnny," said Darby, readjusting his coat, "I always liked the 'Squire myself, and always voted for him—don't you know I did Johnny—but then you know yourself that it's mighty hard for a man to be called a fool to his face—now a'n't it Johnny?"

"Why it's a thing that don't go down easy, I know; but then look at t'other side a little. Now you made out the 'Squire eat his words about the war; and that's mighty hard to swallow too. Now, he told you he didn't mean they fit; and you know any body's liable to make mistakes any how, and you kept makin' out that he had to back out from what he said and——"

"Yes, Darby," said Jimmy Johns, "that's a fact. Johnny's right. You brushed the 'Squire a little too close there, Darby, and I can't blame him for gitten' mad. I'll stick by you when you're on the right side, but I can't go with you there. I couldn't a stood it myself."

"Yes, Darby," said Fields, "you must confess yourself that you began it; and therefore you oughtn't to got mad—That was wrong, Darby; and I can't go with you them lengths."

"How was it?" said Snatch, as if he were at the beginning of the affray. "How was it?"

"Why," said Johns, "Darby made out the 'Squire eat his words; and then the Squire called Darby a fool."

"Oh, chuch!" said Snatch, "was that the way of it! Darby's wrong. If I'd o' know'd that, I wouldn't 'a' open'd my mouth."

"Well," said Darby, "I b'lieve I was wrong there Johnny; and if my friends say so, I know I was; and therefore, I am willing to drop it. But I was only jokin' with the 'Squire and didn't mean to make him mad; and I am willing to drop it—I always looked upon the 'Squire as a mighty good, kind-hearted man."

"Oh yes," said three or four at once, "drop it." "I was just waitin' to see a row," said Sam

Flat, (bully number 2,) "and I'd 'a' kept up all sorts o' rolling and tumbling over this barbecue ground, before I'd 'a' seen the 'Squire hurt."

"Oh, but Sammy," said Johns, Fields and Snatch, in one voice, "its all over now. Drop it—We all see Darby was wrong."

"Oh, yes," said John White, reeling under a pint of rum, "drop it; it's all got in—a wrong—fix—by not knowin'—nothin' 'bout it. I heard it every bit—'Squire didn't say what Darby said—and Darby didn't say what 'Squire said—and none of you didn't say what all of you said and that's—the way—you all got to quarr'lin' and fightin'. We're all friends and—let's go take a drink. Which whipp'd?"

Before White concluded this very luminous and satisfactory explanation, the attorneys and their friends had retired; and Darby proceeded:

"Gentlemen, when I first talked 'bout bein' a cand'date, I had no notion of bein' one—I jest said it in fun, as all the boys here knows; but now you see since they go to puttin' on me after this sorts, I'll be blamed if I don't be a cand'date, even if I git beat. This is a free country, in which every man has a right to do as he pleases, and 'ordin' to their chat, no body ha'n't got no right to be cand'dates but lawyers. If that's the chat, I don't know what our rev'lution was for, and I fit in it too. Gentlemen, you see how I've been persecuted!"

Darby's resolution was applauded by some, and his insulted dignity soothed by others. He now surrendered himself unreservedly to electioneering. His first object was to secure the favor of John Reynolds; for the bully of a county was then (as he still is, though lessened much in importance,) a very desirable auxiliary in a canvass. This was easily effected by a little kindness, and a little hypocrisy, and Darby wanted neither when his interest was at stake. He soon persuaded John, that all he had said to Mr. Jones was a joke, or, (what was the same thing to John) an error in Darby; and as the bully of a county is too much occupied in seeking glory, to attend much to his trade or his farm, and is therefore constantly in need of some little assistance from his more industrious neighbors, Darby had opportunities enough of conciliating John by kind offices. These he improved so handsomely, that John was soon won by gratitude, and came out his open supporter. Marvellous was now the "change" which "came over the spirit of" Darby's "dream." His shop was committed to the entire management of Sambo and Cuffy, and his "little strangers," to Nancy. He rode night and day—attended every gathering in the county—treated liberally—aped dignity here, cracked obscene jokes there—sang vulgar songs in one place, talked gravely in another—told long, dry stories—gave short, mean toasts—jested with the women, and played with the children—grew liberal in suretiships—paid promptly—dunned nobody—and asked every body to vote for him. By these means, his popularity increased wonderfully. Three months lay between the barbecue and the election; and before the expiration of the first, the wise began to fear, and the foolish to boast, that Darby Anvil would be elected. Another month placed the matter beyond dispute; and left to either of the other candidates the alternative of making common cause with Darby, or of staying at home. The temptation was too strong for Smith's integrity. He formed a secret alliance with Darby. It was affected with great care, and much cunning; but it was soon exposed by his conduct, and its results. It was the first instance of such self-abasement that I ever witnessed in Georgia, (would that it had been the last!) and it was received with becoming indignation by the virtuous and intelligent of the county. They took the field almost to a man in behalf of Jones; and but for his magnanimity, they would have succeeded at last in giving Smith the just reward of his treachery. But Jones implored them, by their regard for the future welfare of the State, to level all their forces against Anvil, and not against Smith. "If Smith," said he, "is returned to the legislature, he will serve you with profit, if not with honor; but if Darby be elected, he will be worthless as a member, and ruinous as an example. Encouraged by his success, hundreds of stupid asses like himself, will make their way to the General Assembly; and the consequence will be, our government will become a despotism of fools, and a disgrace to republicanism." By these, and many other more forcible arguments, which I have not room to repeat, Jones prevailed upon his friends to sacrifice their private prejudices to the public good, and to bend all their exertions to the exclusion of Anvil. They did so, and for a time, wonderful were the effects of their efforts. So commanding was their position, that even the common people were attracted by it, and many came over to them from the ranks of the coalition. Smith was cowed by the noble bearing of his old friend towards him, and remorse greatly paralyzed his exertions. Darby, too, grew so much alarmed, that he became serious; and by as much as he grew serious, by so much did he lose his influence. In short, there was every reason to believe, that after all, Darby would have been beaten, had not a little incident occurred, which secured his election, in spite of opposition. It was a strange incident to be followed by such an effect.

There is an old Scotch song which says:

Be a lassie e'er sae black
An' she hae the name o' siller,
Set her upo' Tintock tap,
The wind will blaw a man till her.

The winds are not more propitious to the "siller'd lassie, than unpropitious to the candidate. If ever he has committed a fault, no matter when or where, the wind will blow a babbler to him. It was so with Darby—though unfortunate, only in a moral, not a political sense.

About three weeks before the election, a traveller stopped at a public house in the county where several persons had collected, and among the rest was Your Uncle Nicky Bugg. This was a title which he assumed himself, and which was accorded to him by universal consent. The company were all supporters of Jones, and their conversation turning upon the approaching election, they denounced Darby Anvil in unmeasured terms. The stranger, probably emboldened by their sentiments, after putting a few questions as to Darby's personal identity, stated, that Darby had left Virginia between two days, in order to avoid a prosecution for perjury. The stranger said, he was not himself personally acquainted with the facts, but referred to a number of persons in Virginia, who would confirm his statement by certificates. The certificates were immediately written for; and to make their effect the more decisive, it was resolved by the company, that they would not whisper the important discovery, until the certificates arrived. Fortunately for Darby, they did not arrive until the evening before the election. At an early hour of the succeeding day Darby made his appearance at the court-house, at the head of about thirty men—some in wagons, some on horseback (single and double) and some on foot. They all had their tickets in their hats, with the names of Smith and Anvil, written on them, in large characters. As they proceeded to the polls, they made the village ring with shouts of "Hurra for Smith!" "Hurra for Anvil!" "Hurra for the Blacksmith, and the people's candidate!" Darby had provided a table and a dozen bottles of rum, to which he led his friends, and told them to drink freely and vote boldly. He was reminded, that if he should be elected, he would have to swear that he had not gained his election by treating, canvassing, &c., &c., to which he replied, that he "could swallow that oath mighty easy, for he reckoned nobody wa'n't so mean as to vote for him just because he treated 'em."

Owing to some misunderstanding of the magistrates who were to preside at the election, or from some other cause unknown, the polls were not opened until an hour or two after the usual time. The delay was extremely annoying to Darby; for in the interim his friends paid such profound respect to his first injunction above mentioned, that several of them were fast becoming hors de souffrage, if I may be allowed the expression. At length came the magistrates however, and no sooner had they entered the court-yard, where was collected an immense throng, than your uncle Nicky took the topmost step at the door of the court-house, and demanded the attention of every gentleman present. The demand had to be repeated several times before it was heeded by all; but it finally succeeded in gathering round him every voter on the campus. They were soon reduced to silence, and Bugg commenced reading, in a slow and audible voice, the cruel certificates. In the meantime Darby, as one very truly observed, "look'd powerful bad." He stared like an owl at noonday, and trembled like the shoe of a grist-mill. He changed feet as rapidly as if he had been upon hot embers; and as for his hands, suffered them to do as they pleased; and they pleased to go through evolutions that no pen can describe. I can only say of them, that they seemed to be in frantic search for the mind that had deserted them; for they wandered all over his body and all through his apparel—giving occasional hints to the materialists, that the mind may at last be seated, where none of them have ever yet placed it. To add, if possible, to Darby's embarrassment, your uncle Nicky was one of those men to whom a fight was an accommodation; Darby could not therefore with safety resort to the usual expedient in such cases—a quarrel with the author of his mortification. He received a consolation, however, the most grateful that could have been offered to his tortured feelings, even before Bugg had disposed of the certificates—it was from the cry of "persecution!" which issued from a number of voices, accompanied by other consolatory expressions, which increased as soon as Bugg had concluded.

"It's too bad," exclaimed one, "to attack a man so, right on the 'lection day, to his face, when he ha'n't got no chance o' defending himself!"

"Ah, well now," said a second, "if they go to takin' these in-turns upon a fellow, they a'nt gwine to get no good of it; and you 'll see it. The clean thing's the clean thing; but this whapping a fellow up all at once, when he's no chance, is no sort o' doin's."

"Walk ticket!" exclaimed a third, (tearing up a ticket on which was Jones' name) and come over the old blacksmith! Into my hand flicker: fair play's a jewel; and that's what I goes for in 'lectioneering as well as every thing else." "Never mind, Darby," added a fourth, "you a'n't dead yet, if you are down and kicking. There's enough here'll stand by you yet, keep a stiff upper lip and you'll come through yet."

"I swear," added a fifth, "it's too bad! It's enough to hurt any man's feelings to be so put upon unbeknownens."

These and many other expressions of the like kind so far restored Darby's equanimity, that he was able to take the step in his defence, as soon as Bugg descended from it. When he mounted the rostrum, his appearance was quite unparliamentary. He was dressed in a full suit of mud-colored homespun; the workmanship of Nancy's own hands, from the carding to the weaving. His pantaloons were supported only by his hips, for suspenders were not then worn; and even with this advantage at the one extremity, they were full five inches too short at the other. They reached his socks only, when he stood firm on both legs—that is, when they were suffered to hang in a right line: but as Darby rarely used both limbs at the same time, there was an alternate flashing of naked skin from either limb, of the most agreeable and bewitching novelty. His vest was more uncourteous to his pantaloons, than were his socks; for no position of Darby's body, could induce it to come within an inch of them. His under-garment, however, acted as a mediator between them, and gracefully rolled out into the vacant space, seemingly to encircle the orator, with a sash of coarse, but clean, white sausage. Darby wore no cravat, and from accident or design, (the former, I suppose,) his shirt collar was thrown entirely open; leaving exposed, an most unsightly Adam's-apple, that gave to his neck the appearance of a little dromedary. Upon his coat, Nancy had obviously "spread herself," as we say in Georgia. She seemed to have taken the pattern of it from the wings of a horse-fly. From a point about seven inches above the os coxygis, it debouched to the right and left, with daring encroachments upon his calves. Two large, plano-convex, covered buttons, marked the salient points of the skirts; and as many (on either, skirt one,) their nether limits. The moulds of these gorgeous ornaments were cut by the measure of a half dollar, from a dried gourd: of course, therefore, it was in the covering that they took the shape, which I have given to them. Five buttons more, ejusdem generis, stood in open order upon each lapel; and from every button, advanced in marvellous length a button-hole, worked with "indigo-blue," so that they looked like two little detachments of artillery, drawn up in battle-array against each other. Coarse sharp-pointed shoes, and a low crowned, broad-brimmed white hat, completed the costume of the first orator that I ever had the pleasure of hearing address the electors of a county in Georgia. Indeed, he was the last also; for though it is not now an unusual thing, for candidates "to respond in strains of glowing eloquence" (see gazettes passim) at dinner parties and barbecues, it is a very rare thing for them to address "the sovereignty" when assembled to exercise the elective franchise. But Darby had no alternative. The greetings which he met with from the crowd, when he ascended the tribune, were such as would have confounded any one, who did not understand the spirit with which they were uttered. Strange as it may seem to the reader, they were meant for encouragement, and were so understood by Darby.

"Hey Darb!" vociferated one, "you're too strong in your runners; you've pushed your legs too far through your breeches!"

"Never mind that, Darby!" cried another.

"Tuck in your shirt tail, and norate away the best you can; we'll see you out!"

"Why Darby," cried the third, "what makes you swaller so? Stand up to your fodder like a man! You've got a plenty o' friends here yet."

"Why, gentlemen," proceeded Darby, "it's enough to make any body swaller, and feel bad too, to be put upon after this sorts, all unbeknownens, when he ha'n't got no chance o' defendin' himself—no manner o' chance. Gentlemen, I fit in the revolution, and if I'm now to lose my character, because I'm took all unawars, I shall think it the hardest case I ever hearn of in all my born days. Gentlemen, my charricter's as much to me, and any hard workin' man, as any man's charricter is to him; if he's lawyer, or a doctor, or a store-keeper, or I don't care what he is. For what's a man worth that a'n't got no charricter? He's like a pair o' bellowses that ha'n't got no nose, or a saw that ha'n't got no handle—they a'n't no manner o' count—you can't use 'em at all. ('That's the truth, Darby,' interposed a voice, gravely.) Gentlemen, I've lived a long time with you; did any of you ever hear of my usin' per'j'ry? I reckon if I had time I could get ce'tificates too; but you all see I a'n't got no time at all. Gentlemen, I don't think I ever seed any one that was so persecuted, in all my born days; and if I'm beat now, I shall think I'm beat by persecution, and there's my wife and ten children, and they must all lose their charricters too, just by bein' taken unawars. I never knowed nobody to git nothin' by persecutin', but if me and my wife and children's all to lose our charricters by it, why I s'pose it must be so; but I shall think it mighty hard. Gentlemen, you can do as you please with me; and whatever you do I can't help it."

The cry of "hurra for Anvil!" from many voices, as Darby descended from the steps, plainly testified that he had the sympathies and support of the majority. In vain did Jones and his friends reason with them, upon the difference between exposing vices, and persecuting innocence. It was in vain that they argued against the injustice of visiting Bugg's fault, (if fault it was,) upon the head of his friend Jones. The time, and the severity of the attack, were sufficient to transfer Darby to an object of persecution, in their eyes. To make matters worse, if possible, for Jones, your uncle Nicky undertook to reason with the malcontents. This was a very unfortunate step: for though he was fully competent to reason, and reason well, with reasonable beings, he was the last man on earth who, in this way, should have undertaken to reclaim those, who were won to Darby's support, by what we have seen. He was easily excited, and utterly intolerant of folly. Irritable as he was, however, he rarely gave signs of anger, either in voice or countenance: so far from it, his composure was always greatest just at the fighting point.

The first that your uncle Nicky undertook to correct, was Jimmy Johns, who had pretended to have a great friendship for him, for reasons to be found in Jimmy's deportment to John Reynolds.

"Jimmy," said Bugg, "you surely are not going to vote for that fool, Darby Anvil!"

"Yes I is," said Jimmy; "and the more and the better of it is, I mean to give him a plumper too."

"What, to such a despicable character!"

"Yes; despicable or no despicable character, I can't go agin a persecuted man, with a wife and ten children—Miss Anvil is——"

"But it's no persecution to tell the truth on a man; especially when the truth goes to show that he is unfit for an office to which he is aspiring. Your way of reasoning will make rascality a passport to office."

"Oh, I don't blame you, uncle Nicky—I know what you did was for the best: but now you'll confess yourself—now won't you, uncle Nicky?—that if he was 'spirin,' and 'passport,' you aughtn't to come down on him as you did, right at the 'lection. That was rubbin him too hard—now wa'n't it, uncle Nicky! 'Twas enough to make any body feel sorry for him, and Miss Anvil——"

"What difference does it make, when or where you expose a villain? And what has Miss Anvil to do with it? Is she a candidate?"

"No, but she's a mighty good woman, and you know yourself, uncle Nicky, she a'n't to blame. And wouldn't it be wrong to hurt her charracter? now, I leave it to yourself, uncle Nicky. Jist take it to yourself—s'pose you'd been guilty o' parj'ry and Miss Bugg——"

"Stop a little Jimmy," said Bugg, very calmly, "until your uncle Nicky tries another argument better suited to your capacity, and which I think will brighten your ideas." So saying, he "fetched Jimmy a sentimental jolt," (as one afterwards described it.) in the burr of the ear, that laid him out in short order.

Jimmy "hollo'd" in time to arrest uncle Nicky's experimental philosophy at the first blow and the second kick. Jimmy would have fought longer with another man; but with uncle Nicky, he knew that the longer he fought, the worse he would be flogged; so he acted wise for once at least.

In this way did your uncle Nicky proceed to dispense light among the plebs, until he raised a battle-royal in the court-yard. At one time I observed not less than eight couple, who were engaged in interchanging uncle Nicky's ethics.

The day rolled away, and at 10 o'clock at night the state of the polls was announced. Darby and Smith were elected. They were both hoisted, and borne about on the shoulders of their friends, with huzzas of triumph. They then invited all who lingered about the court-yard at that late hour to a supper at one of the public houses of the village.

Here they ate, drank, sang vulgar songs, and told more vulgar stories, until about one o'clock; when they, or some of them, sallied forth, and with drom and fife and yells, drove sleep from the village, until the dawn. An inveterate hostility between Smith and Jones followed this election, the traces of which may be seen in their descendants to this day. Darby was elected again and again; and though he did nothing in the legislature but vote as Smith voted, and drink grog in the recess of the session, he always returned to his constituents with wonderful stores of what "we did," and "we tried to do." In the mean time, things about home began to run rapidly to decay. Sambo and Cuffy worked up immense quantities of iron, for they both worked a great deal harder, as they said themselves, when massa was away than when he was there; "jist dat white folks might see dat nigger didn't want no watching; and that massa might know how to trust 'em," but then they had little or nothing to show for it. A number of good customers deserted the shop; some from political hostility to the owner, and others because Sambo and Cuffy were always too busy to attend to them. Mrs. Anvil grew dissatisfied with politics, as soon as Darby returned the first time from the legislature with no money in his pockets; for she had taken up the idea that all who stepped into the assembly, stepped into a fortune; she therefore advised Darby "to quit it, as not bein' the thing it was cracked up to be; and to come home and mind his own business." But Darby had become too much enamored of the public service to take her counsel. He told her it would never do in the world for him to take his name down—his party would never forgive him. This logic was unsatisfactory to Nancy, at first, and it became still more so as troubles thickened about the house; she therefore became crusty, petulant and boisterous by turns; greatly to the disturbance of Darby's domestic peace and tranquillity. He had anticipated this emergency, and took to drink privately, before hand; but he now began to come home drunk, out of spite; and Nancy gave him spite for spite. Still, however, wife-like, she struggled hard to keep things together, and save her family from ruin; and her increased industry and economy would probably have balanced Darby's waste from drink, and kept a support in hand till he burnt out; but alas! tickets began to pour in upon them by the deck, from the courts of conscience, and other more unconscionable courts, inviting Darby to appear here and appear there, to answer for countless debts of his constituents. Then came the officers of justice and reduced them to beggary. A little before matters reached this crisis, Darby was beaten for the legislature; and it distressed him beyond measure. The friends for whom he had done the most, were the first to desert him; alleging as a reason, his want of qualification, and their thorough conviction, after three years' reflection, that the Virginia certificates were true. Thus ended Darby's no-mothetic career; but here ended not the consequences of it. Encouraged by his success, worthless candidates sprung up in every county. If their presumption was rebuked, they silenced the reprover and repressed their own shame, with "I know that I am better qualified than Darby Anvil." Under this plea, and by such artifices as Anvil had used, they made their way to the councils of the State, where they became the worthy progenitors of a series of acts extending through many years, which, for extravagance and folly, have no parallel in the codes of enlightened nations. The penalties of these acts are now upon our heads; and upon our children's children will they descend with unmitigated vigor. I forbear to follow the consequences farther—in charity to my native land I forbear. And yet I am not so sure but that such charity is treason to the State, and allegiance to her most deadly foes. Presumptuous ignorance should be reprimanded with a fearless tongue; its sins should be proclaimed abroad, in warning to the people; and all good men should unite their efforts to redeem the state entirely from its dominion. But I leave these offices to be performed by persons of more skill and influence than

WIDOWED GRIEF; A PAIR OF PORTRAITS.

"LOOK ON THIS PICTURE."

There is a look of uncomplaining sadness

Which, to the unpractised eye, might seem a smile;
There is a tone, most like the voice of gladness;
And yet the heart is withering all the while.

List to that song! How cheerful is the strain!

Her lip is smiling, tearless is her eye;
Yet none who hear can sympathy refrain
For one who strives with grief so gracefully.

That smile deceives not. In that faithful heart
Hope soothes the grief that preys upon its core;
The blessed Hope that they may meet who part,
And dwell in bliss celestial evermore.

"AND ON THIS."

The Lady sat by a new-made grave,
And her tears are swelling the sparkling wave
Of the limpid brook, that, rippling by,
Murmurs a voice of sympathy.

That stream had witnessed the plighted vow
Of the gentle youth that sleeps below;
And she swears by its waters, never to leave
That spot, while it flows by her Lover's grave.

"O, Lady! Permit me your grief to share,
For my cherished friend was your Lover dear.
But alas! he is gone. He will never awake.
Suppose now you try to love me for his sake."

The Lady looked, with a tearful smile,
On the youth who would thus her woes beguile;

On his lips and cheeks, his eyes and brow;
Then murmured softly "My vow! My vow!"

"Nay, Lady, I ask no place but this
To be the scene of our wedded bliss."

"Lord! His Ghost would haunt us and I should scream; Don't you think 'twere better to turn the stream?"

DE MORTIER; A TALE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Old times were changed—old manners gone,
A stranger filled the Stuarts throne.—Scott.

—Louis totters on his throne. I have scented the coming storm, and believe me, La Frere, winter comes not in peace to France.

You may be a true prophet, Duc, but I doubt it. Whence think you the storm menaces, and whom?

Ere long, and Louis ceases to tenant the throne of his fathers. He has trampled upon a people—that people will turn and sting him. Oppression has nerved them to despair—they have nothing to lose, every thing to gain; muttered discontent, and sullen endurance will give place to mad defiance and unbridled license. A people will burst from their thralldom, and the excesses of the emente will blow the spark of rebellion into the flame of revolution.

And why—Think you the Canaille of Paris can subvert a throne strengthened by an existence of centuries! The mob may be spurred by oppression and misery to madness: they may turn with their unarmed hands upon their tyrants, and drench a street with gore, or wrap a Faubourg in flames; but, as their madness knows no bounds when the passion is upon them, so will the fever heat of destruction soon cool in their veins, or the bayonets of the National Guard quench it in their blood. Rebellion there may be, but revolution never.

Aye, revolution, and at no distant day. The torrent of their sufferance has been too long pent up, and when graded into desperation they burst its barriers, it will gush forth strong and powerful, bearing upon it the corse of Louis and the fragmentary wrecks of royalty. They have before their eyes the shining example of America, and already dream of republicanism and liberty. France never can be free, but she will struggle manfully with her oppressors. We shall soon see the day when the country will be deluged with blood, and Paris be but one great shamble for the best and bravest.

De Mortier, you are mad! exclaimed his friend. The cause of the king will succeed, and the Canaille are as contemptible as rebellious. But beware how you speak thus. Those who know you not so well might think you too would stir the people to the commission of the folly you predict.

The name of De Mortier alone would refute the suspicion. Hated as I am by Barentin, he dare not breathes against me the slander. I favor not rebellion, but noble as I am, would give to the people that representative weight which is justly their right. I would stand between the oppressor and his victim, not urge the oppressed to imbrue their hands in the blood of their tyrants.

Will not the attempt prove futile and dangerous? True, they would stretch their regal power too far; but will not they who seek to place the crown, the noblesse and the Teirs Etats upon their proper respective footing, only bury themselves in the ruins of the temple they seek to rear?

It may be, gloomily responded De Mortier. It may be—it may fall and crush us; but man can not die in a nobler cause, or one more worthy the noble, the patriot, or the philanthropist. For me, it would be better far than to find a living grave in the dungeons of the Bastile, or fall in the indiscriminate slaughter of a Jacquerie. And though my imagination may conjure into being scenes which may never exist, there sits brooding upon my very soul a dark and fearful presentiment that, unless we can place the government upon the proposed basis, the one or the other will be my fate, and if mine, that of many of my peers.

How, think you that Louis or his ministers dare lay hands upon men who would give to the crown its legitimate power?

Not if they would measure that legitimacy by the standard of kingly will, but when they dare say to royalty that it shall not grasp the sceptre of a despot, and bend alike the necks of a people and the laws of a nation for its foot to trample on. Are not nobles nightly snatched from their homes, and immured in dungeons because they would set a limit to the prerogative of their king—a king weak and passionate, the tool of designing women and intriguing ministers, battling with his parliament for that he should not dare to ask, and seeking to rear a standard under which no honorable man can enlist; resorting to the infamous means of Lettres du Cachet to place at his power a body, which has shown, that although willing to support a throne, that throne must be held by one who can learn a lesson of wisdom and moderation. Look at the Royal Sitting of this morning, how, with a despot's voice, he quashed the resolutions of the assembly, denied the recognition of the Tiers Etat and demanded submission to the mad dictates of his imperious will, seeking, with threats and menaces, to awe men whose souls, fired with the love of liberty, are led on by such a man as Mirabeau. The royal madman acts as such men as Barentin, Condé, Artois and Conti direct, for Necker has shown his hand and plays now for the people. He goes to the Bastile, or is an exile before he grows many days older.

I dread not the Canaille, but more that the despotism of the fourteenth Louis may be erected upon the ruins of the awed and conquered assembly.

They may dictate, but I much fear they will yield.

Yield! never. There are too many who have staked their hopes upon the throw now to be made. Few waver, and the burning appeals of the eloquent Mirabeau will confirm them in their determination. What is the next scene in the play is more than I can tell; but, be it what it may, 'tis fraught with mighty interest to France.

* * * * *

On the second floor of La Bassiemiére, the eastern of the huge towers of the Bastile, was a long, low passage, floored and arched with rough dark granite. On either side massy doors, secured with bar, and bolt, and chain, afforded entrance into narrow cells intended for the confinement of state prisoners.

At the farther end of this vaulted corridor was a small cell whose only furniture was a low camp bed, a rickety table, and an old worm eaten chair. By a small window, which, though closely grated and strengthened with heavy stanchions, commanded a view of a portion of Rue St. Antoine, leaned a young man scarce three-and-twenty, though the sternly compressed mouth and lofty brow, marked with deep lines of careful thought, would, in the eyes of the casual observer, have given him ten years more. He was tall, and while his proportions were symmetrical and graceful, his whole appearance bespoke a physical power second only to his intellectual strength.

He had been no false prophet. With his compeers in the struggle, he had sought to curb too closely the sovereign will, and like them had been borne by a lettre de cachet to that prison house, which sad presentiment had whispered as his home. Ere he had been incarcerated, he had seen more than one step of his prophecy fulfilled. Noble after noble, and common after common had been made away with by the same means, and the crown had seen, as its reward, the clamorous threatening and angry denunciations of the mob stepping into the ranks, where, hitherto, delegated authority alone had hoisted the standard of opposition.

It was the fourteenth of July, and he saw the human mass eddying to and fro in the narrow street which lay open to his view. He knew that the wild spirit of the people was uncaged—a people goaded to madness by suffering, and borne on by the whirlwind of passion and revenge. As yet, nothing was to be heard but the sullen tramp of thousands, save when the breeze bore fitfully to his ear an execration or a yell. He knew that there was some dark work to be done—that those who guided that mighty mass, had not called their latent ferocity into action for naught. Some great scene of violence was to be enacted—there was to be open rupture between the rulers and the ruled. He read it in all around him; what it was, he could not, dare not, surmise.

Sick at heart, he turned from the window, and cast himself upon his low, mean couch. Hiding his face in his hands, he fell into deep and melancholy reverie.

He thought not of himself, though painfully aware that the power in whose hands he was was stranger alike to justice and clemency. A dungeon beneath the mote; imprisonment for life, torture, starvation, or the block might be his fate; yet, with this fearful uncertainty hanging over him, and danger menacing in a thousand forms, he thought not of himself, nor of that France, which, loving even better than life, he saw, when he essayed to look into the future, either prostrate beneath the feet of an incensed tyrant, or torn and dismembered by lawless irresponsible factions and unbridled mobs.

When first he had entered that gloomy abode, his attention was diverted from his own situation by a cortège which at that moment arrived from an opposite direction. Closely guarded, came the old Count Reilley, whose tottering gait and snowy head might well have secured the short remnant of his days from the cruel imprisonment he was compelled to undergo. But the object of De Mortier's attention was the youthful Countess Anne, who had been included in the punishment of her father. Scarcely seventeen, her figure was already fully developed, and the most perfect beauty pervaded her slight but striking shape. To a mind which had already won for her distinction in the fashionable and literary circles in which she sometimes mingled, she united that pure feminine beauty which was so well adorned by her queenlike carriage and grace of manner. She was beautiful, supremely beautiful, and to yield the palm to the youthful Countess Anne was no detraction from the claims of the loveliest lady who adorned that brilliant court.

Thus, for the first time, they met—each preëminent in those qualities which adorn their sex, each indeed unfortunate. The eye of De Mortier was rivetted upon her, and his brow grew darker when he saw that tyranny could stoop to wreak its vengeance upon so fair a victim; and, if his heart ever grew bitter against a throne, stained by a thousand acts of oppression, it was when he contemplated this its work. She did not pass him by unobserved, and though maidenly modesty denied her the same means of evidencing her interest, he felt his heart throb more quickly as, when he stood aside to give precedence to her cortège, she returned his involuntary bow with a melancholy, yet pitying smile. Following close upon their footsteps, he saw Delaury close upon her the door of the cell next to the one destined for his own reception, and he entered his narrow home with a lighter heart, for she was near him.

How strangely are we influenced! When we believe the dark cloud of adversity to have settled down upon us, how often there breaks through the gloom some soul cheering ray, and though it may produce a pang, by showing us how deep is the desolation in which we are shrouded, it oftentimes lights us along our path, cheering us onward, when, were it left away, even hope would settle down into despair. And how often do the events of a moment change the current of existence, rendering tenants of our hearts feelings and emotions hitherto strangers, and expelling those heretofore most firmly and deeply rooted.

Weeks had rolled by, and that face was before the mind's eye of De Mortier. Oft had it presented itself, and he thought it but the natural result of circumstances. But again and again it came. It flitted before him in the long lonely hours of the day, in the dark watches of the night. 'Twas present in his dreams, and whether sleeping fancies placed him in the gay salon, the royal banquet hall, the noisy assembly, or the quiet retreat of his own dear home, it was there. He met her in the romantic valleys of his own domain—gracing the courts of foreign climes—in exile in distant lands—the mob was deluging Paris with noble gore, his hand alone could wrest her from their grasp—he stood upon the scaffold waiting to bare his neck to the glaive, and she too was there, with the same sad smile of resignation as when he had met her for the first, last and only time.

He looked anxiously into his own heart, for surely it could not be mere passing fancy which brought her image so constantly to his thoughts, associating her as it were with his very being. He felt that it was a deep enduring love, his first, he believed it would be his last. He loved and yet must nurse his passion unwhispered to its object. He could not even look upon her, and willingly would he have added another year to an imprisonment which was to last he knew not how long, for one short hour's converse with her.

Deep, deep was his reverie. He thought of her and her future lot—what might it not be! Callous regarding his own, he was fearfully sensitive respecting hers. How was she even now? Imprisonment and sickness might have wasted her fair frame, and death, even now, stand waiting for its victim. If not, might not a more fearful fate await her? She might be doomed to die by inches upon the rack—they might hurry her to the block, or freeing her from the prison walls, yield her up to the tender mercies of the mob. He saw her in their hands, her name hooted in derision, insults heaped upon her head, her person violated by the licentious passions of the Canaille, and in momentary delirium the Duc leaped to his feet, and rushed toward the door.

Scarcely had he advanced a step, when there broke upon his ears a fearful and unusual din. Ten thousand voices hoarsely echoed, "The Bastille! The Bastille!" while, sharp above the human tempest, rang the blows of huge hammers upon the gates. The Emeute was gathering without, and every moment came the shouts wilder and fiercer. Now there was a pause more fearful to the astonished prisoner than the din which had preceded it. In that ominous silence, nothing was heard but the heavy tread of men without and his own hurried breathing. Then louder and more wrathful came the cry, "down with the Bastile!" eddying up from fifty thousand human throats, and piercing through those massy walls, rang echoing through corridor and cell. Scarcely had the sound broken fairly upon the ear, when it was drowned in the sharp rattling of musquetry. Thus was the enigma solved—the pealing musquetry and vengeful yells told that the Bastile was the aim of the infuriated multitude—that garrison and mob battled for the mastery. How fearfully broke the conviction in upon him. Would it give freedom or death to her? Should the garrison hold out, her fate would be no better—nay, fear of their liberation might hurry them the more quickly to the block. If the mob triumphed, might they not escape, or would the mass, frenzied by resistance, in the mad exultation of victory, give them to a speedy death? Well, well, better die with her, than live imprisoned and alone.

Bang! bang! crash! and some mighty weight came thundering to the earth. De Mortier rushed to the window, but nothing was visible except that unbounded sea of human heads. Had the draw-bridge fallen? It must be so, for nearer came those shouts and yells and execrations. Again rattled the musquetry, and louder and louder roared the multitude, while every weapon seemed to play a part in the wild clashing. On they came—louder and louder—and then the old walls shook 'neath the rumbling peal of cannon. Mixed with the shouts of the assailants, were the shrieks of the wounded, and the ear scarce could compass the deafening clamor. Silence reigned once more, and then the heavy tread of feet echoed through the gallery.

"Now shall I know my fate," muttered De Mortier. "I can but die, and will meet death as a brave man should. And she!—but I will not think of her, 'twill but bring bitterness to death," and with folded arms and stern compressed lip, the brave young noble calmly waited whatever destiny might befall him.

"The gray haired scoundrel said he had caged him in the last hole," exclaimed a strong, manly voice, "he might have lied, but I'll set him free, or make every scamp in this cursed slaughter-house pay for it," as some one strode to the door and struck it with his heavy weapon. Quick and lustily fell the blows upon the heavy bolt and hinges, but they defied his greatest exertions.

"Mort de ma vie," shouted the enraged man, "they were determined to mow him up safely enough. Here, Jacques, your hammer, 'tis twice as heavy as this plaything of mine. Hah! you wont, but you shall," and snatching the ponderous sledge from his companion's hand he dealt a blow upon the door with all his strength—another, it yielded—a third, and he fairly hurled it into the room. Springing into the cell, he threw his weapon upon the floor, and catching up the Duc in his arms, could only mutter, as the tears ran down his swarthy cheek, "Mon Cher Maitre."

"Mon Père Nourricier," exclaimed De Mortier, "again you have saved my poor life."

"Aye, and will do it again if you'll only give me half a chance," answered the happy smith; "but mon Charle, are you safe—if the scoundrels have hurt a hair I'll make"—

"Safe, all well, Francois; but what has become of her," he interrupted, as springing from the artisan's embrace, he caught up the sledge and rushed from the apartment.

"Whew! hot as ever, and a sweetheart here in the bargain," laughed the smith, but his foster-son was away before the words were half uttered.

Rushing to the door he found several mechanics endeavoring to force it—he motioned them away, but they paid him little heed.

"Clear the track there, boys," shouted Francois, "I am something of a man myself, but I'm a baby to him, young as he is. Back I tell ye."

"Cut loose then, Citizen," laughed a huge mason, "but if you knock that door open, you are a stronger boy than I take you to be. Bon Dieu but you are," he continued, as, whirling the sledge with a single arm around his head, De Mortier brought it against the lock, shivering it into atoms.

Entering the cell, he beheld the object of his solicitude, kneeling in the attitude of prayer. Impelled by her example, he too bent his head in humble adoration to his God, while the rude men without, watching the contagion and casting aside the ferocity of their mirth, bowed their heads in respectful silence.

A few moments and he raised his head. She still kneeled—no motion gave evidence of life, nor was any change of position visible. Springing forward, he clasped her in his arms; she was as inanimate and inert as death. Placing his hands to her mouth he found that she had ceased to breathe, but her heart still beat, and there was hope.

"Water, Francois, water!" he exclaimed, "she has fainted."

Placing her upon her narrow couch, he bathed her brow with water, at the same time chafing her wrists and temples. Presently she moved, and her large full eyes opened, but they were dim and glazed.

"Mortier," she murmured, and was again as powerless as before.

"Here, Anne, here, safe and at your side, all!"—

"Give her a little of this brandy, Citizen," interrupted the mason, handing him a flask; "'Twill soon open the pretty bird's bright eyes."

As the mason predicted, it soon restored her to consciousness. For a moment, she gazed shrinkingly around her, and extending her hand to De Mortier, murmured, "my father"—

"Is here, my dear child, to bless thee," exclaimed the feeble old man, as tottering into the cell he cast himself upon the couch beside her.

Motioning to those around to withdraw, De Mortier and Francois left the father and daughter for a few moments together, though but a short time could be allowed them for tears and gratulations. The men grew impatient of delay and soon wished to be moving.

"Time presses, Duc," exclaimed Francois, "we must move. These brave fellows and a few more I can trust will attend you beyond the barriers, and then I alone am enough to take care of you. 'Tis better now to go as prisoners."

Picking their way, under the guidance of Francois, among the corpses which strewed the gateway, they emerged from their hated prison with an escort of about twenty well-armed stalwart men.

Slowly they wound their way through the crowds which thronged the Rue du Faubourg, St. Antoine, almost unnoticed among the human stream that flowed around them. Now and then, some huge mechanic, whose blood-bespattered hands and clothes bespoke his part in the deeds of violence which had been committed, would bend a searching glance upon the cortège as it passed along, but none interrupted their journey, until passing the present Place du Trône they encountered a large body of the rabble somewhat intoxicated, and singing by turns snatches of the Marseilles hymn and obscene ballads. Crossing their path, so as to obstruct their progress, a huge butted-browed operative demanded whence they came and whither they went.

"Bah! Jean," shouted Francois, "just a bird or two we have taken from their cages in the Bastille. You are wanted at the Hotel de Ville."

"Aye, Francois, you would gain the gold alone, would you, but you must share it with my brave citizens here—our pockets are empty, and our throats dry."

"Gold, indeed," was the reply; "think you our needy King would leave the people's champions gold, when he takes their liberties. 'Twas our cause placed him in the Bastille, and our hands must keep him from their clutches. The day he falls into our oppressors hands he dies."

"Then we will help you to defend him," exclaimed the grim leader in changed mood, "though we have to cut our way through ten thousand of our Swiss butchers."

"I told you that other work called you," was the answer; "I and mine are all that he will need. Get to the Hotel de Ville as soon as you can."

Falling back, they made room for the cortège to pass on, Vive la Nation ringing fearfully their parting salutation.

Beyond the barriers, they took their way among straggling buildings, and soon entered the yard of a dilapidated house. Here Francois whispered a few words to the mason, who advanced to De Mortier, extending his hand.

"We must trust you now to Francois, Citizen—with his aid and that of this good sabre, you must defend yourself. The maiden's cheek is too fair to be dabbled with blood, and that old man has lived too long to die by the headsman. One word of advice from a plain man, drop the 'Duc,' for times are coming, when the man with the shortest name will keep his head longest on his shoulders. If you ever happen to need a strong arm and a willing heart, call upon Jacques Briete—and now, farewell."

Grasping successively the hard hands extended to him, he would have divided among them his purse, but the movement was restrained by the remonstrance of Jacques.

"Keep it, Duc, we would not be worse than the King, and rob you of the little he has left you. We shall all soon revel in the gold to which we have been so long strangers. Once more, farewell."

Placing his fingers to his mouth, Francois gave a short deep whistle, in answer to which a boy brought out four horses ready caparisoned for a journey. Mounting these, the party followed for a short distance the road to Versailles, and then galloped off at full speed across the country.

In a small room, in one of the hôtels upon Quai du Megessiere, lay upon an ottoman a richly attired stranger. His swarthy skin had been dyed by the suns of distant lands, and the stars and orders, scattered about his dress, betokened him an officer high in rank. The uniform was not, however, that of the French army, but savored more of the heavier style of the Austrian.

"Again in Paris," muttered De Mortier, "and why? what fatality drags me along? I, I, who had almost sworn never to enter this scene of carnage, far more revolting than the slaughter of a battle-field, am again drawn hither by an impulse I feel myself unable to resist. Europe has offered me a refuge, and the sovereigns of other lands welcome me to their courts, and load me with favors. Men call me brave and skilful in the battle-field, and royalty has lavished upon me its blandest smiles. But their greetings fall coldly upon my heart, and nowhere has it known a home. The tented field, with its wild revelry and stern discipline,—the rush of battle—the mad pleasure of the resistless charge—the cannon peal—the fierce onset, and the whelmed foeman—the clarion note of victory—all, all have a charm, but an hour, 'tis gone, and the heart longs for the calmer and holier pleasures of a quiet home. Home!—France is no longer a home; and yet, torn, dismembered, mad as she is, I cannot but love her.

"Now, what is she?—Even as dark presentiment, foreshadowing things to come, taught me to prophesy, is she now. The stone has been cast too far, and the flame that was to be lighted upon the altar of liberty, has been kindled into the funeral pyre of law, religion, order and reason; and now, the mob steps forward to grasp a power which they can wield but for their own ruin and that of their country. I have seen much that was dreadful, but never till now imaged out, in my own mind, the mad license of a people whose calmest acts are the unbridled excesses of a Jacquerie. All, all that holds man to man, knitting them into a nation, is broken asunder—every tie riven—every sense of right, order, or propriety blunted, till 'tis extinct—every social, legal, and moral principle subverted; in the overthrow of rights, human and divine, they base the gory monument which shall stand the shuddering wonder of unborn nations upon the headless corpse of a sovereign. France, France, France! how blindly you hurl yourself over the precipice of destruction—how, like the suicide, you whet the knife, which your own hand will apply to your throat—how heedlessly you mix what might have been order into jarring and discordant chaos—a chaos, which, unless the grasping hand of foreign power dismembers and snatches as its own, can never be resolved into primeval order, till one, mightier than the spirits which guide you now, grasp the helm of state, and upon the fragmentary wrecks of government erect the throne of a despot.

"Ye have looked upon the stars and stripes, which so lately reared them beyond the seas, and vainly dreamed that you too could be free—free! no—you never can be free. Either you must groan beneath the yoke of a tyrant, or you place upon yourselves the ten thousand times more galling slavery—the despotism of a mob. Bravely would many have guided you aright, but you shook off their guardian hand; and, led by the unhallowed promptings of your own passions, have destroyed your country and yourselves. But even now, 'tis recoiling upon your heads. To-day your king perishes upon the scaffold, and ere the gore has clotted upon his ensanguined body, those whom you have raised to trample upon you will drench your streets in the blood of your best and bravest.

"And Anne! where—where is she now?—long, long have I dwelt upon her image and often sought her. She may be the tenant of a dungeon—perhaps a grave. God grant, that with her gray haired sire, she may have sought in some other land that peace which she would vainly search for in France. And yet, the sea which separated her from the ill-starred land of her birth, might place a barrier between us, that might exist forever." And bowing his head, the sad young noble remained long wrapped in his own sad thoughts.

The boom of a gun broke upon the ear, echoing and rumbling through the lanes and streets, and then the sullen roll of the muffled drum announced to the affrighted people, that the dark tragedy of the day was about to be enacted.

"Now, for their murderous work," he muttered. "The bloodhounds begin the banquet in which to glut their brutal appetites to satiety. I will look upon this, the dark beginning of a reign of terror, and then, farewell to Paris—perhaps for ever. But I must dash aside these emblems, wherewith foreign favor has decked me, and mingle with the herd, undistinguished from the lowest and vilest." Donning a plain citizen's dress, he concealed about his person some trusty weapons and left the hotel.

Strange was the appearance of Paris on that eventful day. Every precaution had been taken, lest the fitful mood of Parisian caprice should change, and the king be snatched from the clutches of his butchers, even while on the way to execution. Along the almost deserted streets, scoured patrols of horse, clattering over the pavements, and driving from the path, along which the cortège was to pass, the pallid and alarmed citizens. Few were to be seen. Here and there a face was visible, peering from an half open window, but most of these, as well as the doors, were closed. Upon every bridge—at the barriers and crossings were pieces of artillery and their grim gunners standing with lighted matches. More than once was the dark scowling eye of some patrol leader bent upon De Mortier, but it was met by a glance, so calm and yet so unquailing, that hardy indeed had been the man who had dared to drive him from the path as he had seen done to some who, like himself, had disobeyed the order to leave the street clear. Such were the precautions taken to execute a sentence trumpeted forth as the darling desire of the public will.

On came the gloomy procession. First, were the massy cannon, followed by a portion of that legion of Sans Culottes who, at the instance of that arch fiend, Robespierre, had been enlisted from the vilest and lowest dregs of a Parisian populace to act as body guard to the royal victim. Then, amid the stateliest and most reckless troops of Black Henriot's horsemen, was the chariot containing the ill-fated sovereign. Before him sat two ruffians in the garb of gens d'armes, whose plenitude of arms and sinister looks gave good evidence of their obedience to the command not to let the prisoner escape alive. Louis was pale and his lip slightly quivered, though he sought to conceal his agitation by a broken and hurried conversation with the good Abbé Edgeworth, who sat by his side. Behind the troop, was the other moiety of the legion, who were, in their turn, followed by a pack of heavy guns, bringing up the rear. This main column was flanked by alternate horse patrols and light artillery.

Slowly they moved on to the Place de Revolution, in the centre of which stood a large scaffold, draped with black serge, from the midst of which the guillotine darkly reared itself. As they reached the place of execution, the huge mass of soldiery, which the policy of his murderers had placed around the guillotine, opened itself for, and closed upon the carriage, while the legion ranged itself around the infantry already assembled. Without the line of these, the horsemen and artillery were stationed, the muzzles of the guns pointing outward, in order to keep at a greater distance the populace which had now begun to assemble.

At the foot of the scaffold, Louis conversed, for a few moments, with the Abbé, and then mounting the scaffold proceeded, with great composure, to divest himself of his coat and neck-cloth. Walking, with a nervous, rapid stride, to the left extremity of the platform, he looked, for a moment, upon the armed multitude around him and exclaimed, "Francois, Je meurs innocent; Je pardonne a mes ennemis; Je desire que ma mort soit"—

"This must not be," muttered Robespierre, "they may yet relent."

Santerre waved his arm—Louis' last words were drowned in the roll of drums, and in a moment he was laid upon the platform—his neck was upon the mark—a gun—the string was touched—the glaive fell, and a headless trunk and trunkless head were all that remained of Louis.

Sick at heart, De Mortier turned from the revolting spectacle, and wound his way among the less frequented streets. Passing the Barriere de la Madeleine, he turned into Rue de Caumartin, when a female shriek attracted his attention to a carriage, around which were gathered a dozen desperate looking ruffians. The driver lay mangled and bleeding upon the ground, and one, more brutal than the rest, had dragged a young and lovely girl from the carriage.

Instinctively he rushed to her rescue, and snatching her from his grasp, with his clenched fist felled the ruffian to the earth.

"My father—Oh, Charles, save my father, they will murder him," but before the words had died upon his lips, her person was smothered with her father's brains.

Drawing the short Austrian sabre, he had concealed beneath his coat, De Mortier prepared to attempt their retreat. Hard was he pressed, and more than one fell beneath his sabre. One and another had attacked him, and received either death or wounds, and he had, in the end, made good his retreat, had he not been incumbered with the now inanimate body of Anne.

"Sacre," shouted a huge black muzzled fellow, "shall we let this one fool a dozen of us," aiming, as he spoke, a blow at the noble heart which, had it taken effect, would soon have settled the contest. Parrying the weapon, he plunged his sabre into the side of his antagonist, but at the same moment received a blow from behind, which felled him senseless to the earth.

"Thy list is no small one, Payan. Thou art no wavering friend of Revolution, and goest to thy work right merrily—well, well—every head of the suspect lopped from the shoulders of the owner strengthens the republic; and the cause of the dear innocent people is all that I have at heart."

"My list is long, Maximilian, but each one is an enemy of the republic, or of thine."

"Mind, Payan, mind—I have no enemies; I would harm none; 'tis stern necessity that sends the victim to the glaive, and my heart bleeds that it must be my hand which seals their fate. Ah, 'tis a sad and painful task to preserve the liberties of a people."

"Sad, indeed," interrupted the silvery tones of Cauthorn, "and no wonder it brings a pang to the feeling heart of one so tuned to nature's softest sympathies. But it must be done, and though we weep over our fate, must bow to the mandate of necessity."

"Sad," growled Payan, "the cursed hypocrites. They call me bloodthirsty, while they cloak their own passion for destruction under the flimsy garb of national philanthropy and the plea of necessity."

"And you too, Cauthorn, and the brave St. Just would leave no one as stumbling blocks in the nation's way toward freedom and happiness. But beware that you destroy not the innocent with the guilty, better that the criminal should escape than that one innocent hair be touched."

"Diable," exclaimed St. Just, "better ten innocent be put out of the way, than one guilty, aye, even one suspect escape."

"Swear not, Citizen," responded Robespierre. "I regret that thy morality is so corrupt. Let not the innocent be harmed, but the guilty and the suspect, the same by the way, must die. France requires the sacrifice."

"Have you no names to add, Citizen, before you sign the lists. I suppose your love of your kind will make you chary, lest you sacrifice some witless innocent."

"A few, only a few," answered this wholesale butcher, "and I would that I might spare them; but the good of the republic does not permit, and hastily writing some half a dozen names upon the list, he threw the papers back to Payan, and with a wave of his hand broke up the council."

Waiting till the door had closed and the last footstep died upon the ear, he threw himself back in his cushioned chair and gave utterance to a long sardonic laugh. "Hah!" he chuckled, while his countenance lighted up with ferocious joy, "she will find death worse than the favors she has despised. Curses on the villain, Henriot, could I spare him I would soon give him to the glaive, but he is useful, and I must let him live until I can find a better. Had he been sober, he had sent stauncher hands to snatch her from her father and bear her hither. A single one, placed upon the box, had put the fair one in my arms, before she knew mischief was brewing. But the beast must attempt, by force, what had been better done by stratagem, and his ruffians were hardly a match for that young sprig of nobility, De Mortier. Nobility, faugh! how I hate the name. We must make short work of him. True, his father saved me from starvation—but—but—but—the republic demands his death. Our agents will soon have him in their toils, and then 'tis easy to trump up some charge against him. He shall die. And she! now, that resistance has put her out of my grasp, to cheat the dear people I must convict her of treason, and send her to feed the guillotine. Well, this time to-morrow, she will be among the dead, and I shall soon find some one to console me for her loss. I do not want you, Jean, you can retire," he continued, as a row of book-shelves behind him revolved on a pivot, and a light step was heard in the apartment.

"Tis not Jean, Citizen," responded a full, manly voice, "but one whose presence you may relish still less."

Turning his head, Robespierre beheld the long light barrel of a pistol within two inches of his face. He made a motion as if about to rise, but checked himself as the stranger continued—

"Move not, Robespierre, you are in my power; a motion, a breath drawn too loud and you are a dead man—nay, glance not from that bell to the door. The sound of that bell, could easily be drowned in the pistol shot which would hurl you into eternity, and he who mounts guard at your door is not your jacobin sentry. His cup has been drugged, and he lies snoring in one corner of the hall, while a better man holds post over the closet of the butcher of France. Rouse yourself and do my bidding; and recollect, that one step too far, or one word uttered in too loud a key, and Maximilian Robespierre has signed his last death-warrant."

"Would you murder me?" he exclaimed. "Who are you, and what is your purpose?"

"I am that De Mortier, whose death you so coolly determined on but just now. I shall do you no harm if you do my bidding, if not, I shall do the world the service of sending you out of it."

"What will you," he stammered; "any thing, every thing that you require I will do, but oh spare me! I am not fit to die."

"Coward!" answered his companion. "I will spare your dog's life; but here, take this pen and write," and De Mortier pushed a rolling table to him.

"Write—write—write what?"

"As I dictate. The keeper of the Prison du Châtelet will please deliver to the bearer Anne De Reilley—write on sir, why do you stop!—now, under sentence of death, and afford him whatever conveyance and escort he may desire. And now you will please give me your passport for myself and suite, and a general order to all persons in the country, to extend to me all aid or assistance I may require, under pain of death."

"Very well," continued De Mortier, "and now, if there is any thing which a fiend like yourself holds sacred, may I beg to know what it is?"

Robespierre looked for some moments doubtfully at his querist and then slowly uttered, "The Republic."

"The Republic!" retorted his tormentor—"there thou liest, yet here, swear by thy God, the republic and thy life, that what has, and will pass between us, be never mentioned nor recalled to memory."

Robespierre took the oath, but the savage lighting of his eye warned De Mortier that little dependence was to be placed upon his promise, when the power of breaking it was placed in his hands.

"And now, most worthy Citizen, as your memory is not always the best imaginable, I have brought with me a security for your silence. You will do me the favor to open your mouth—don't be afraid, I shall not cut your tongue out."

Drawing some strong leather straps from his pocket, he passed one across the open mouth of the prisoner, buckling it tightly behind his head and fastening it to the high back of his chair. Securing his hands and feet with the others, he drew from underneath his coat a large package, having a long cord pendant from one end; this package he fastened to the feet of Robespierre, connecting the cord with the thongs which confined the hands and head, in such manner that the slightest motion would tighten it considerably.

"And now, my good friend, I must bid you good morning, but before I do so, permit me to inform you, that you have for your footstool a canister of the best English gun-powder, which a very slight strain of that cord will render so lively as to send you dancing through the roof of the house—a very indecorous caper indeed to be cut by so grave a state dignitary as yourself."

The prisoner turned a look of impotent agony upon his tormentor, who, after carefully bolting all the doors of the apartment, struck a single tap upon the bell and departed by the same avenue through which he entered.

"Well done, Francois," exclaimed De Mortier, as he rejoined his accomplice in the street. "You played your part well, and I have been no less successful. I left the scoundrel in no pleasant position, and, in the next four hours, he will live a whole life of agony. Did you ticket his doors, 'not to be disturbed?'"

"Trust me for that, but did you get the order for her liberation?"

"Yes, and a passport and order that will not only secure us from molestation, but give us relays of horses, or guards, wherever and whenever we need them."

"Then four hours start, and I defy even Black Henriot to catch us; but, even then, they must be old hands at the bellows to match the sharp fellows I have waiting for us."

"How many have you provided?"

"Jacques and seven others; all good men and true, staunch and well armed; had rather fight than frolic, and would not back out from Old Nick himself."

Arrived at the Chatelet, the order was closely scrutinized by the keeper, who, finding all correct, simply replied, "'Tis the signature of Robespierre; she will be ready in five minutes; what else do you require at my hands?"

"A close chariot and four swift horses. My orders are to convey the prisoner from Paris, with all secrecy and despatch. We must be gone in the time you mention, or the heads of both will be the penalty of our delay."

"You have hurried him most gloriously, Duc," exclaimed Francois, as the keeper hastened to obey the supposed mandate of the dreaded despot.

"Pretty well, but we have need of every minute; an hour's delay might cost us our heads, a price I am in no humor for paying just now. But here comes the chariot, you must go without and see that our speed flags not, while I will share the interior with the Countess."

"You will find the prisoner within and well," exclaimed the Lieutenant, springing from the coach, "she has been kindly treated, and has not suffered from her confinement."

"I trust that it may be so," responded De Mortier, "I should regret that Robespierre's vengeance should fall upon your head," and thus speaking, he leaped into the coach, while Francois, taking his station upon the box, dashed rapidly into and along Rue St. Denis until they reached the barriere. Here they were joined by Jacques and his troop, and at their utmost speed whirled from Paris.

"What a splendid couple," exclaimed Josephine to the first consul, pointing to a noble looking man who, with a fair, lovely woman leaning upon his arm, advanced slowly along the centre of the brilliant salon, while a buzz of admiration betokened the sensation they created. "How truly noble he is, with his fine, commanding figure and firm, manly step—and she seems all that a queen would wish to be. Who can they be?"

"The bravest soldier and the sweetest woman in the realm," answered Napoleon. "'Tis the Duc De Mortier and his Dutchess, the last scion of De Reilley's ancient house. He is the brave man who tricked Robespierre out of an order for his bride's reprieve when under sentence of death, and left the cut-throat sitting, for six long hours, over a canister of gun-powder, which a motion would have ignited. He is worthy of her."

"And, unless her countenance belies her, she deserved no meaner lord," answered Josephine, "he who would wear should win."

"Permit me to welcome you to Paris, Duc," was the greeting of Napoleon, "and may you never leave it, except to drive the invader from your native soil."

"I am once more in Paris, Sire, and under happier auspices than when I last visited it. May I present to you my bride?"

"A bride well worthy such a lord," responded the future emperor, planting a kiss upon the brow of the blushing fair one—"Nay, Josephine, be not jealous, I must give you the pleasure of saying to the Dutchess, that her family estates released from confiscation again call her mistress—while I assure De Mortier that he is again lord of his own fair domain, and may all this world's happiness be theirs. The favor of Napoleon they shall never want while 'tis worth the having."

"And I can but follow so good an example," continued Josephine, clasping around the arm of the Dutchess, the rich diamond bracelet taken from her own fair arm. "The court will ever warmly welcome, and boast its fairest ornament, the Dutchess De Mortier."

SONNET-WRITING.

I love a regular Italian sonnet,
Full of a rattling rolling sort of rhyme
And sparkling as the skies of that glad clime
Where Petrarch loved and Laura frowned upon it:
And when a master's hand hath labored on it,
The regular recurrence hath a chime
Like the rich ringing music of a dime
Within the purse of one who late hath won it!
'Tis Love's own proper and imperial dress
And if you wish to robe him rightly, then
Breathe forth in sonnets all your tenderness!
And it is Wisdom's home too, as ye ken
Who read,—and there'll be readers, more or less,
Of this, mine own immortal specimen!

HEROS IN AMERICA.

Awake genius of Carlyle and resume thy theme! Another Hero demands thy pen! The Hero in America. A Dickens, a Bertrand, an Olé Bull, an Essler, a Vieuxtemps claim thy homage. Awake and join with Willis to deify a fiddle. We mean no disrespect to the celebrated Marshall Bertrand by thus naming him; but holding, as we do, an honest and dignified American to be as high as any man, we would have our Citizens meet foreign distinguished more as their equals only. "Nil Admirari" is our motto and we would apply it to the Companion of Napoleon, as well as to all others. We propose the subject then to the Carlyles of the day and if no other pen takes it up, may attempt it ourselves.—Ed. Mass.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO, with a preliminary view of the Ancient Mexican Civilization, and the life of the Conqueror, Hernando Cortés. By William H. Prescott, Author of the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella." "Victrices aquilas alium latrus in orbem." Lucan, Pharsalia. Lib. V., v. 238. In three volumes. New-York, Harper and Brothers; Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Va.

Only the first volume of this splendid History has reached us; but the whole Work has been issued from the Press. Under the influence of its classic and romantic interest and of our delight to herald such a production from a Native pen, we could say much and with enthusiasm upon the subject; but our limits will necessarily restrict our notice. Before the appearance of the Work, every one was well prepared to receive a masterly History; and the universal testimony of the press declares that none will be disappointed. The author of the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella" could not fail to captivate every reader, with the story of Mexico and her renowned conqueror. Mr. Prescott's first Work not only gave assurance that the one before us would attain the highest rank; but the reputation which it gave him made him friends of value and influence, and gained him easy access to the Libraries of States, Princes, Nobles and Scholars from which alone the splendid array of authority and material, with which the work before us is peculiarly enriched, could be derived. The American historian entered Spain with the highest passport he could have borne and was loaded with treasures for his contemplated History. With the advantages which he enjoyed, it would have been morally impossible for such a writer not to have brought forth an immortal Work. As yet, our Historians labor under serious disadvantages, which can not well be overcome until success gives them fame and throws open to them the stores of other lands and of magnates otherwise inaccessible. Yet our native writers, like the unrivalled Franklin, with his kite and simple apparatus, often open new fields of investigation and put forth efforts truly astonishing. There is a dignity and an eminence in the fame of the Historian most stimulating to a noble ambition and most elevating to its conscious possessor. His range of important, useful knowledge is so enlarged, his thought is so strengthened, his judgment so purified and balanced and his influence upon the leaders in human affairs so firmly fixed. Mr. Prescott's former history has been translated into German, owing partly to F. Von Raumer, who also recommends to the translator to take the present one in hand. Von Raumer seems to rejoice, with a truly American pride, at the rebuke which Mr. Prescott's Works give to the puerile and malicious sneers at American genius and Literary ambition. He very justly remarks, "certainly this second Work of Mr. Prescott will possess all the advantages of the first, and perhaps surpass it in poetic and romantic interest." Nothing can exceed in "poetic and romantic interest" the History of Mexico and the life of Cortés. In every point of view, civil, military, religious, literary, scientific it is full of wonder and power, from the very foundation of the city. Its very foundation is fraught with Romance. A land of migratory wanderers from the North are seeking a home about the Lake of Texcoco. "They there beheld perched on the stem of a prickly pear, which shot out of the crevice of a rock that was washed by the waves, a royal eagle of extraordinary size and beauty, with a serpent in his talons and his broad wings opened to the rising sun." This was taken as an auspicious omen and the foundations of Mexico, the Venice of the West, were forthwith laid by driving piles into the lake. In the course of time, splendid palaces succeeded their slight fabrics of reeds and rushes. The preliminary view of the Aztec Civilization is philosophic, instructive and in parts deeply thrilling. The mixture of civilization, superstition and cruelty is almost unparalleled. The Aztecs were the ancient Mexicans; and though they had undoubtedly made considerable progress in civilization, their temples and streets were gorged with the blood of human sacrifices. The Toltecs, a still more ancient people of Anahuac, did not sacrifice human beings.

At the end of each chapter, the author gives an account of the writers upon whom he has chiefly relied. Thus, without interrupting his narrative, he has presented many beautiful and interesting passages of Literary History, that instruct the reader whilst they give evidence of the diligence and caution of the Historian. Indeed, candor and care are stamped upon every page. The author debated in his own mind whether he should conclude his History with the fall of Mexico, or continue the Life of Cortés. He foresaw that the life of the individual might lose in interest when contrasted with the stirring events just related; but he determined to continue it. With this apprehension in view, that the work would decline in interest, the author had a strong incentive to exert his powers to preserve it and it is said that he has been entirely successful. Indeed, the halo around the renowned conqueror would not so quickly disappear; and, if any individual could prolong the intense interest, it would be Cortés. Away from Spain, in a hostile land, with a handful of men, not seven hundred, battling with hundreds of thousands, often opposing and conquering hundreds to one, marching into the heart of unknown nations, subduing and subjecting them, and lastly conquering the magnificent city of Mexico, though all the while violently opposed by enemies at home, what romance can equal it? At one time, the Indians resolved upon his destruction and it was estimated that they could afford to lose 25,000 men to cause the death of one Spaniard.

We do not observe that the press has noticed Mr. Prescott's handsome tribute to Mr. Irving and the generous courtesy between them. They were both engaged upon the History of Mexico; and Mr. Prescott modestly fearing to enter into competition with Mr. Irving, proposed to relinquish his purpose; but Mr. Irving insisted upon yielding the field and gallantly has it been occupied. Mr. Prescott's style is not very forcible,—but it is clear and classic. It is less ambitious than that of Bancroft; and far superior to the stately stiffness and turgid monotony of Alison. The style of the publication is highly creditable to the publishers and quite delighted us, in these days of double columns, eye-sore type, and paper backs. The volumes are ornamented with portraits of Cortés and Montezuma, and contain maps, which are indispensable to a reader of History.

THE EDUCATION OF MOTHERS; OR, THE CIVILIZATION OF MANKIND BY WOMEN. By L. Aimé Martin. Being the work to which the prize of the French Academy was awarded. Translated from the French by Edwin Lee, Esq.—Author of "The Baths of Germany," &c. First American from the first London Edition, revised from the fourth French Edition, &c. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1843. Drinker & Morris, Richmond, Va. pp. 303—8vo.

This excellent book develops and enforces the truth and wisdom of Madam Campan's celebrated reply to Napoleon. "The old systems of Education," said the Emperor, are good for nothing; what is wanting to train up young people properly in France?" "Mothers," said Madam Campan. "Right," said he, "therein lies a complete system of Education, and it must be your endeavor, Madame, to form mothers who know how to educate their children." We do not, in this country, suffer under such gross defects in Education and in the habits of society as the eloquent author complains of; but to a great extent his remarks on these subjects apply with equal force to us. The remedy, however, for such evils as do exist is clearly and beautifully pointed out in this work. Educate the boy and you control and direct the man, and thus the nation; but who shall properly educate them, except their mothers. Now, for the good order of society,—the peace and happiness of communities, virtue and duty are far more important than genius and learning—the arts and the sciences. The heart is chiefly to be educated, and it is susceptible of deep and lasting impressions long ere the child leaves its mother's caress. The mother, then, may, must give the heart its first impulses and directions. Unless her own soul be pure and lofty, what surety is there that her children will be virtuous and honorable? Hence, educate the mothers. And yet this means, educate every child; for the boy, when the husband, will influence the wife, and the girl will become the mother. Most truthfully does Aimé Martin speak of the noble husband forming his devoted companion to be the mother of his children. Education must be divided into three branches, physical, intellectual and moral, applying respectively to the development and shaping of the powers and principles of body, mind and soul. The physical might, with advantage, be entrusted to the bandit, or the savage; the intellectual might advance rapidly under an atheist, a debauchee, or a well-studied demon; but there must be something of a divinity to preside over the training of the immortal soul. There is no disparagement of the first two branches of education;—they are insisted upon as vastly important; but the last is indispensable: it alone prepares mankind for their destiny even on earth. Maternal love and Religion, the vivifying power which Rousseau needed, will infuse the wholesome principles into the youthful soul,—then, the more vigorous the body and the more expanded the intellect, the higher career of great and good and bright will their possessor run.

The didactic character of the work is much relieved by its apt illustrations, its enthusiasm and its originality. It is a work that should be read, pondered and practised. It abounds with choice aphorisms and gems of true philosophy, which should be treasured in the heart. In the rage which many have at this day for social regeneration, they make a grand mistake by working with and upon masses, phalanxes and the like. They can not succeed. The world is made of atoms; Temples are built of bricks, one by one, and of plastic mortar, which must be used before it hardens. Nations are formed of individuals; and to operate upon the individual, you must take the twig whilst it is tender. The worldly wisdom of associated man can do little, or nothing: but the influence of true religion, which alone is virtue, ministered by maternal love in the temple of the youthful heart, can and will regenerate the world. Herein, too, is the foundation of the nation's Liberty. "The mother's milk shall be the milk of Liberty." In that cradle may lie the embryo hero of centuries; then train him for such. Whilst this thought should stimulate the education of mothers, it should incite mothers to the education of their sons. As Mrs. Sigourney has very beautifully said, "when the mother is rocking the cradle she may have her hand upon the ark of a nation's safety." The biography of every great and good man abounds in exalted praises of his mother, to whom his excellence is invariably ascribed. This sentiment a few years since sought a suitable manifestation in the erection of a monument, in the town of Fredericksburg, to "Mary, the MOTHER of Washington." Simple, but volumes speaking inscription! That half-risen structure stands in expressive reproach; but yet, there are many far more enduring monuments in honor of the "Mother of Washington." The author's parting words shall be ours. "Young girls, young wives, young mothers, you hold the sceptre; in your souls, much more than in the laws of legislators, now repose the futurity of Europe, (America) the world and the destinies of the human race."

THE WORKS OF MRS. HEMANS, with a Memoir by her sister, and an Essay on her genius, by Mrs. Sigourney. In seven volumes. Vol. I. Philadelphia. Lea and Blanchard, 1844. Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Va.

This is another of the Ladies Cabinet Series of which we have already spoken. The value of the works embraced in this Series and the neat style, in which they are published, must commend them especially to those for whom they are intended. Oh! that they had other backs—in short, were bound. It grieves us much to see their yellow brightness vanishing beneath our fingers. Even the fair hands of the Ladies can scarcely preserve it. In their virgin dress they appear as inviting as a newly coined guinea. The mechanique of a book is no trite affair, and, (always saving the paper backs,) the style, form and type of Mrs. Hemans' works are nicely adapted to the rare treasures which they contain. The Essay of Mrs. Sigourney is just and enthusiastic; but appears labored; and lacks that energy and force of analysis, which the genius of the Poetess might well call forth. The Monody, by the same authoress, loses some of its interest after reading the essay, because of the close resemblance between the two, in many of the leading ideas. Yet, these two productions of the gifted American, will justly be regarded as valuable additions to the work. The Memoir, by the sister of the Poetess, does not lay claim to any high literary merit; and was written to give a juster idea of the character of its subject, than the meagre materials that had been presented to the public were calculated to afford. Mrs. Hemans strongly deprecated the publication of her letters. She might have known that it was impossible to deny this to the "generous public," or at least to rescue them from the qui vive Literary speculators and Magazine caterers. The Dublin University Magazine soon published some of them, which in part called forth the present Memoir. Indeed, the Poetess seems not to have been ambitious of Fame from her writings. "Fame," said she, "can afford only reflected delight to a woman." Her maiden name was Felicia Dorothea Bouone. Her father was an eminent merchant of Liverpool, where she was born on the 25 Sept., 1793. Failing in business, he moved into Wales to Gwrych, "a large old mansion, close to the sea and shut in by a picturesque range of mountains." "Here she imbibed that intense love of Nature, which ever afterwards 'haunted her like a passion.'" The misfortunes and domestic sorrows to which she was subjected saddened her song; but gave to it deeper fervor and that tone of pious resignation, which is so elevating to the soul. Her heart was the home of Love; though she was separated from her husband. Her devotion to her mother was so pure and strong, that her Fame gave her most delight because it illumined a mother's smiles. The Memoir could not but be highly interesting—of such a child of song, inspired and inspiring, so proudly eminent and necessarily introduced into such refined Literary associations. The lively spirit of her letters and several Literary Jeux d'esprit is in striking contrast with the prevailing tone of her Muse. And in L. E. L., whose young heart seems to have been blighted by some hidden and unblessed Love, the same contrast is remarkable. In later years, Mrs. Hemans entirely discarded, even in her letters, the sprightly style, in which she once excelled. Of her Poems the volume before us contains only "England and Spain;" and "Wallace's invocation to Bruce."

LIFE OF ANDREW JACKSON, Private, Military and Civil. With illustrations, by Amos Kendall. New-York, Harper and Brothers. 1843. Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Va. To be completed in fifteen numbers.

This, the second number, contains many interesting details. Andrew Jackson and his brother Robert are taken prisoners; and being ordered to clean the boots of their Russian captor, they refuse. Robert received from the sword of the incensed coward a blow on the head from which he never recovered: Andrew warded off the blow aimed at him with his arm; but received a severe wound. The battle of Camden is related; with the causes of Greene's defeat,—want of precaution and too great security in the presence of the enemy; the Jacksons are released; Mrs. Jackson visits Charleston to succor her friends who were confined there in the prison ship, scarcely less loathsome and miserable than the tombs of the dead, in which some of the Americans were confined during the war; she never returns from her benevolent errand; other revolutionary scenes are described; Andrew Jackson's military education in the actual field; the patriotism of Mrs. Motte, who cheerfully saw her house in flames and furnished a handsome bow with which to cast the flaming arrows to set it on fire, by which means a garrison of the enemy was forced to surrender: Andrew Jackson becomes dissipated and in danger of ruin; but reforms, studies Law, and is made Judge of the Western district of North Carolina, now the State of Tennessee; the early settlements in the West; several paragraphs are given to the Log Cabin; but nothing is said of the hard cider. The hero emigrates to Tennessee and exhibits great boldness and energy in that new and unsettled State. The embellishments of this number are the presence of mind of young Jackson in saving his party from surprise and capture—and an attack of the Indians upon a "station" of Cabins in the West.

NARRATIVE OF THE TRAVELS AND ADVENTURES OF MONS. VIOLET, in California, Sonora, and Western Texas. Written by Captain Marryat, C. B. New-York, Harper and Brothers, 1843. Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Virginia. pp. 133, 8vo.

"Who reads an American book?" asks the contemptuous Briton. Turn to the able letter on the International Copyright and you will find an answer,—an answer which the book before us illustrates. Many have read American books without knowing it; and those read American books who wish to write English ones. For instance, when Captain Marryat, or Mons. Violet, if there be such a genius, wishes to set forth travels and adventures in America, he pilfers largely from Kendall's sketches, and gleans closer than Ruth, after the reapers of exaggerated stories of life in the wild woods, panther fights, alligators and cawanas, savage men and "republics of squirrels," with their outcast "parias." Our learning is not extensive enough to assure us whether, or not Mons. Violet ever existed; but our suspicions are somewhat excited as to the fact; and Captain Marryat, C. B. may have very judiciously omitted "to inform the reader how he became acquainted with the party from whose notes and memoranda he has compiled this volume."

Mr. Kendall, of New Orleans, one of the unfortunate Mexican Captives, not only charges the author of this book with gross plagiarism; but points out errors and misstatements, which destroy its value and its honesty. Mr. Kendall's sketches, containing much on the same subjects, will soon be issued, and the public should give his instructive and thrilling narrative the encouragement which Mons. Violet's is now soliciting. The Messenger is set for the defence and maintenance of American Literature; and will never, whilst under our charge, breathe any other spirit than the strongest American. Hence it will ever be our aim, for we deem it a duty, to do all in our power to brand every thing from abroad that does not come with a proper tone and with pure, clean hands.

Mons. Violet claims to be the son of a French Noble attached to the fortunes of the dethroned Charles X. Charles being invited to Holyrood, in Edinburg, his faithful servant was allowed to accompany him; but when the exiled King removed to Prague, the Noble took to travel to assuage his griefs. At length he joined the Prince Seravalle of Italy, who, because he couldn't do as he pleased at home, became disgusted with the vices and heartlessness of civilization and smit with a passion for savage life, and came over to dwell with the American Indians in the far South West. The Frenchman employed priests to educate his son. From a very early age he had been the companion of his father's travels. The book before us contains the adventures of this renowned son, of which we trust you now have enough. When will the world cease to be overrun by exiled nobles and heartsick dependents? A work by Mr. Farnham, author of "Travels in Oregon, Prairies," &c., upon "unexplored California, the Italy of America," is announced in the North. His former work elicited high praise from the English Reviews.

THE HISTORY OF THE PURITANS, OR PROTESTANT NON-CONFORMISTS; from the reformation in 1517, to the revolution in 1668; comprising an account of their principles; their attempts for a farther reformation in the Church; their sufferings; and the lives and characters of their most considerable divines. By Daniel Neal, M. A. Reprinted from the text of Dr. Toulmin's Edition: with his life of the author and account of his writings. Revised, corrected and enlarged, with additional notes, by John O. Choules, M. A., with nine portraits on steel, in two volumes. New-York, Harper and Brothers, 1843. Richmond, Drinker and Morris.

This is a standard history of some of the most important and even romantic events of any age, and though ex parte is exceedingly valuable. Even Hume, whose leanings are all the other way, acknowledges that the Puritans preserved the sparks of English Liberty.

The present edition is heartily approved by many eminent persons, divines and others, who think its publication useful at this time from the bearing it may have upon the existing Puseyite controversy. The Editor, Mr. Choules, says he anticipates the happiest results from its wide circulation. We cannot view it in this light; but simply as a record of the deeds it commemorates. The work will be completed in eight parts of 144 pages each, at 25 cents. The first part is embellished with the portraits of the great reformer Wiclif and of Richard Baxter. The Novelist has found rich materials for romance in the History of the Puritans and has had little need to depart from sober truth in order to impart the deepest interest to his representations. Mr. Neal also wrote a history of the New England States, for which their university conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts.

THE BIRTHRIGHT. A Novel, by Mrs. Gore; authoress of "Mothers and Daughters," "Mrs. Armytage," &c. New York, Harper and Brothers, 1843. Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Va. pp. 59.

Birbrights were quite cheap in the days of the patriarchs, when Esau sold his for a mess of pottage. But it would be difficult to get such a savory mess as Isaac's kitchen afforded for the shilling, with which you can buy Mrs. Gore's novel. So that in those days of primogeniture, birbrights were dearer than now. Though our profession requires a sacrifice of the sensual to the intellectual, yet we are afraid that Jacob, by offering us his bribe, could cheat Mrs. Gore, as he did his brother. John Bull often gorges us; but sometimes he is harmless, for "fanum (trash) habet in cornu."

The Birthright's plot is good enough; but the filling up, the accessories are deficient:—the skeleton wants a heart, flesh and muscles. Certainly, it has not substance enough, to entitle it to be brought across the Atlantic and circulated over this country. It has been a very short time since we noticed "The Banker's Wife," by the same authoress.

GEROLSTEIN. A sequel to the Mysteries of Paris. Translated from the French of Eugene Sue. New York, Harper and Brothers, 1843. Drinker and Morris, Richmond. pp. 32.

We announced this work in our last number, before it came to hand. The success of the Mysteries of Paris has called forth other works of Sue—Matilda, translated by Wm. H. Herbert, Zuleika, translated by J. P. Brewster, and others are going the rounds; but they do not produce the same enthusiasm and must materially suffer from coming after their superior. We are indebted to Mr. Winchester for several parts of the New World Edition, which is now completed. There is much attraction in Mr. Deming's flowing, ornate style, and his translation is well done.

FREDERICK THE GREAT, his Court and Times. Edited, with an introduction, by Thomas Campbell, Esq. Author of "The Pleasures of Hope." Second Series, 2 vols. Lea and Blanchard, 1842. Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Va.

By an oversight, the notice of this work was omitted the last month. No species of composition is more interesting or instructive than the familiar memoirs of these eminent characters who have stamped their impress upon the times in which they lived. Some doubts have been thrown, probably without sufficient reason, upon the Editorship of the poet Campbell. The first series was accredited to him and reviewed by Macaulay as the production of his pen. In these times of steam publishing and great multiplicity of books, it is no small advantage for a work to bear a well known name upon its front.

THE EXODUS OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND; and the claims of the Free Church of Scotland to the sympathy and assistance of American Christians, by Thomas Smyth, D. D., Author of Lectures on the Apostolical Succession; Presbytery and not Prelacy the Scriptural and Primitive Polity; Ecclesiastical Republicanism; an Ecclesiastical Catechism, etc. Published by request. Charleston, S. C., 1843.

This is an eloquent and able appeal on behalf of the evangelical party of the Church of Scotland (the Non-Intrusionists we believe they are called,) which has recently seceded from the Establishment, and formed themselves into a distinct body under the name of the "Free Church of Scotland." The author is known to the body of Christians, of which he forms an ornament, as an able, zealous and eloquent preacher; and, to the literary public generally, on both sides of the Atlantic, he is known, by his works on the Prelatic Controversy, as a man of most rare erudition, great research, powerful mind, and enlarged and liberal views. The character of the Messenger forbids our going into the merits of the controversy between the Establishment and the Free Church: we have noticed the sermon of Dr. Smyth in pursuance of our design to call the attention of our readers to all productions of a high order of merit which the South brings forth, that Southerners may know the jewels which adorn their literary diadem. To those who interest themselves in the controversy, particularly Presbyterians, we heartily commend the sermon of Dr. Smyth, of which, as we are informed, a second edition will be issued immediately in New-York, in a small book form, with fuller documents, as the Veto Act, claim of Rights, &c., &c.—[Communicated.]

We have been gratified by an examination of the Annual Report of the Providence Athenaeum, Rhode Island, and the Catalogue of Yale College. Old Yale is in a flourishing condition and sends forth an honorable representative in her Literary Magazine, which we have received.

Our thanks are also due for the eloquent Convention Sermon of Bishop Johns, of Virginia.

M'Culloch's Gazetteer—Part IV; Hannah More—No. 6; Gibbon's Rome—No. 2; Speech of Mr. John Duer in the New York Episcopal Convention, in support of Judge Oakley's resolutions; and Bishop McIlvaine's charge, issued by the Harpers, have been received through Drinker and Morris.

Orion for December, has been received. It will hereafter be published in Charleston. Let the South encourage the Literary efforts of her children.

ADDRESSES.

We take pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of the following excellent Addresses.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF SUCCESS. An Oration pronounced before the Philomathean and Phrenokosmian Societies of Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg. By John Todd. Sept. 19th, 1843.

An Oration delivered in Person Hall, Chapel Hill, on the 37th June, 1827, the day previous to the Commencement, under the appointment of the Dialectic Society, By the Hon. Archibald D. Murphy. Second Edition. This is the first address ever delivered before the Literary Societies of Chapel Hill. A letter from Chief Justice Marshall, dated Richmond, Oct. 6, 1827, is prefixed, in which he speaks flatteringly of the address and pays a tribute to some of the honored names of North Carolina.

DUTY—An Address delivered before the Literary Societies of the Wesleyan University, August 2nd, 1843, by Rev. Robert Emory, A. M., President protem of Dickinson College, Middletown, Connecticut, 1843. Duty is an excellent word and thing; and though the French laugh at the English for the constant use of the word, they make a mock at a great excellence of English character. We were more than usually pleased and edified, with a few slight exceptions, by the perusal of this address.

NOTE TO THE ARTICLE ON COPYRIGHT.—See Page 11.

I find, on reference, that I was mistaken in stating the establishment of the Port-Folio Magazine, as taking place during the war of 1812. I was misled by the 1st volume of the "New Series," under Judge Hall, which was published in 1813. The former series, under Dennie, was probably begun in 1805-6 in a quarto form. I can not now say when—as the work is missing from my library. But the error is quite immaterial to the argument. I consider the war of public opinion, in America, against Great Britain, as having properly commenced some years before the declaration of hostilities; and the peculiar benefits of the actual conflict, upon which I insist, are compressible into the single feeling of impatience at her domination, by which alone the nation was persuaded into the proper, though still but partial, exercise of its own intellect and resources.

OUR NUMBER.

We trust that the present number will be a favorable sample of what we have in store. We are not conscious of any effort to give it superiority over subsequent numbers, but expect to issue even better ones in future. We had intended to devote particular attention to our own department; but unavoidable interruptions have consumed much of our time. The reader will find many things on the cover, to which his attention is specially invited. When each subscriber has read the Messenger, he will please show it to his friend and neighbor and try to enlist him in the generous cause. We are resolved to give an unwonted impetus to the Messenger and invoke every friend to help us. See what the press says; see who our contributors are; observe what the Messenger is; and then say will you not speed it on.

IPHIGENIA AT TAURIS.

A DRAMATIC POEM.

IN FIVE ACTS.

(Translated from the German of Goëthe.)

ACT II—SCENE I.

Orestes. Pylades.

Orestes. We tread the path of Death, and at each step
My soul is more composed. When to Apollo
I prayed, to free me from the avenging fiends
That ever dogged my steps, he seemed to promise,
That, in the temple of his much loved sister,
Who rules o'er Tauris, I should find assistance
And relief. This plighted God's word
So full of hope, is sure of its fulfilment,
For, with my life, my sufferings soon will end.
Beautiful Sun! how easy to resign
Thy light, to one whose heart the hand of God
Has crushed to numbness. If no laurelled death,
The price of glorious victory awaits
The sons of Atreus—if, like my brave father,
Like all my ancestors, it be my doom
To die a bloody death, so let it be.
Better to bleed before the altar here
Than in a corner, by the assassin hand
Of a near kinsman. Friends of Tartarus,
Who dog my steps, while yet I walk the earth,
And, like the sleuth-hound, snuff the blood that marks them,
Let me alone! soon I go down to you.
The light of day no more shall be polluted
By sight of you or me; nor earth's green carpet
Be stained by Demon feet. There, in your den,
I'll seek you out; there, where one equal fate
Shall seal us all in everlasting night.
Thee, Pylades, companion of my crime,
Though innocent, thee, partner of my doom!
I grieve to bear thee to that mournful land,
Untimely snatched away. Thy life or death
Alone awakens hope or fear in me.

Pylades. Not yet, like thee, Orestes, am I ready
The abode of Ghosts to visit. Still I hope,
Among the tangled paths that seem to tend
All downward to black night, to find a way
That leads to life again. Of death I think not.
I wait the pleasure of the Gods, and hope,
That they will yet provide a glad escape.
Death, whether feared or no, comes when he will,
But when, to sever our devoted locks,
The Priestess lifts her hand, I still shall think
Only of thine and my deliverance. Rouse
Thy soul from this despondency. Our danger
Is but increased by doubt. Did not Apollo
Pledge thee his word, that in his Sister's Temple
Aid—solace—safe return were all prepared?
The words of Gods are not ambiguous,
Though thus the afflicted and desponding deem.

Orestes. The web of destiny my mother spread
Over my infant head, and as I grew
In likeness to my father, tho' I spoke not,
My presence to her paramour and her
Was a severe rebuke. Alas! How often

When, musing o'er the fire, sad Electra
Sat solitary in the large old hall,
I anxiously have climbed into her lap,
And stared with wondering eyes upon her tears.
Then of our noble father would she speak
And I, in eager longing to be with him,
Now wished myself at Troy, now him at home.
Then came the hour—

Pylades. O let that be a theme
For nightly converse among hellish ghosts:
We, from the memory of brighter days,
Must gather strength for new heroic effort.

The Gods have use for good men here on earth,
To do their will, and still they count on thee,
Nor gave thee as companion to thy Father,
When he reluctantly went down to Orcus.

Orestes. O! had I caught his hem and followed him.

Pylades. Much cause have I to thank the hand that saved thee;

For what were I without thee, since with thee,
And for thy sake alone, from infancy,
I've wished to live.

Orestes. Remind me not, I pray thee,
Of those bright days, when, in thy father's house,
I found a refuge, where his prudent care
Tenderly nursed the bruised and blighted blossom,
While thou, forever gay and light of heart,
Sporting around me like a butterfly
O'er a dark flower hovering, to my soul
Imparted the glad cheerfulness of thine,
Till I, forgetful of my fate, and swayed
By youthful sympathy, would lose myself
In dreams enthusiastic.

Pylades. It was then
My life began—then when I first loved thee.

Orestes. More truly say that then thy griefs began.
Horrible fate! That I, thus plague-infected
And driven from society, must bear
Anguish and death to others in my bosom.
Go where I will, tho' all before was health,
The blooming cheek grows pale at my approach
And wears the marks of death, certain tho' slow.

Pylades. Were poison in thy breath, Orestes, I Should be the first to perish; but thou seest me
Still full of cheerful confidence and courage;
And Love and Confidence are wings that bear
To great achievements.

Orestes. Great achievements! Yea,
The time has been when we to such looked forward,
When we on mount and vale pursued our prey,
And hoped to see the day, when rivalling
The courage and the prowess of our fathers,
We too, with club and sword, might hunt the monster,
Or track the robber to his cave, and then
When, leaning on each other, we would sit
At evening, looking out o'er the broad sea,
The rippling wave breaking against our feet,
And all the world spread out before our eyes:
Then would we grasp the sword, and deeds of glory
Through the dark future glittered like the stars
Whose countless host spangled the night's black brow.

Pylades. The work the soul proposes to herself
Is infinite, still burning to achieve
Deeds of such splendor, as at once may rival
The glories which are still the poet's theme,

What of thy brother's words the cloud of horror
Hid from my mind. The last of that great stock,
The lovely boy, Orestes, destined yet
To be the avenger of his father's fall!
Oh! how did he escape that day of blood?
Has a like destiny entangled him
In Death's dark net? O! tell me he was saved.
Say that he lives. Say that Electra lives.

Orestes. They live.

Iphigenia. Oh Golden Sun! lend me thy rays,
Thy brightest rays, and lay them as an offering
Before Jove's throne, for I am poor and dumb.

Orestes. If hospitable rights, or nearer tie
Connect thee with that royal house, as now
Thy beautiful delight would indicate,
I pray thee tame thy heart, and hold it steady;
For insupportable the sudden change
From joy to anguish. Agamemnon's death
Is all thou knowest?

Iphigenia. And is not that enough?

Orestes. But half the tale of horror hast thou heard.

Iphigenia. What more? Orestes and Electra live.

Orestes. And fearest thou nothing then for Clytemnestra?

Iphigenia. Nothing: for neither hope nor fear can save her.

Orestes. She also from the land of hope has gone.

Iphigenia. What! Died she raving? Shedding her own blood?

Orestes. No: but her blood brought death.

Iphigenia. Speak more distinctly.

Task not my mind to think. Uncertainty
Flaps round my frightened head her thousand wings.

Orestes. Thus have the Gods selected me to bear
The tidings of a deed which I would hide
In the unfathomable hollow realm

Of hellish night. Thy lovely lips constrain me
To speak against my will; but they may ask,
And not in vain, an effort yet more painful.
Electra rescued and concealed her brother
After his father's fall, and Strophius,
His father's kinsman, willingly received him,
And brought him up with Pylades, his son,
Who soon the fairest ties of friendship bound
Around the Orphan. Then within their souls
Grew up with them the burning thirst of vengeance
For the King's death. Sudden and in disguise
They bear the tidings of Orestes' death
With that which seemed his ashes to Mycenæ.
The Queen receives them kindly to her house:
Orestes to Electra is made known:
Within him she rekindles the revenge
Quenched by the holy presence of his mother:
Secretly leads him to the fatal spot
Where fell his father, where the trace of blood,
So foully shed with faint and ominous stripes
The floor oft vainly washed, still foully stained:
With tongue of fire each circumstance she told,
Picturing her life of wretched servitude,
The lucky traitor's arrogance, the danger
That, from the step-dame hatred of the mother,
Threatened her children: then that same old dagger,
Which, on the house of Tantalus, so long
Had sped its rage, she forced into his hand,
And by that hand—her Son's—fell Clytemnestra.

Iphigenia. Immortal Gods! who, floating upon clouds,
Spend the pure day in bliss; is it for this
That ye from all mankind have severed me,
And here so long have kept me near yourselves,
Charged only with the childlike task of nursing
The holy fire;—that you have drawn my soul
To mount like flame in holy aspirations

Up to your dwellings, but that I at last
The horrors of my house should feel more deeply?
But tell me of Orestes. Wretched man!

Orestes. O! would that one could tell thee of his death!

For from the victim's streaming blood arose
The Mother's Ghost, calling Night's ancient daughters,
"Let not the Matricide escape—pursue him,
To you he is devoted." At the call
Their hollow eyes glare eagerly around
With eagle-glance. Within their caverns black
All is a stir, and, from their deep recesses,
Doubt and Repentance, their congenial allies,
Creep on their victim. Acheron's foul pit
Sends up a vapor, on whose boiling clouds
The image of his crime is shadowed forth;
Frighting to frenzy his blood-guilty soul,
While they, tho' to destruction fated, still Trampling the beauteous surface of the earth,
(The garden of the Gods,) from which of old
A curse had banished them, with flying feet
Pursue the fugitive, and but give rest
To frighten him anew.

Iphigenia. Unhappy man!

His case is like thine own, and thou too feeblest
All the poor wanderer suffers.

Orestes. What sayest thou?

What is the case that seems so much like his?

Iphigenia. A brother's murder in like manner preys

On thee. Your younger brother told me this.

Orestes. Great soul! I cannot bear that thou shouldst be Deceived by one false word. A stranger may

A web of falsehood for a stranger weave

To snare the crafty in his purposed fraud.

Between us be the Truth. I am Orestes.

This guilty head yearns for the grave and seeks

For death in every shape—in all shapes welcome.

Whoe'er thou art, for thee and for my friend

I wish deliverance, but not for me.

I see thou art reluctant to remain:

Then find the means of flight, and leave me here.

Let my dead body tumble from the rock.

Let my warm blood-stream down into the Sea,

And bring a curse upon this savage shore.

Go ye to find a home in beauteous Greece,

And cheerfully commence your lives anew. [He withdraws.]

Iphigenia. Fulfilment! Fairest daughter of the Father
Of Gods, at length to me thou hast descended.

Thy image vast displays itself before me.

My lifted look scarce reaches to thy hands,

Which, filled with golden fruits and wreaths of bliss,

The treasures of Olympus shower on me.

As royal bounty, by its rich profusion

Betrays the royal giver, since to him

That, which to thousands would be wealth, is nothing;

So you, ye Gods, are recognized in bounties,

Wisely withheld at first, then wisely given,

At fittest moment. What is best for us

Is known to you alone. Before your eyes

Expands the wide realm of futurity,

Which still the starry misty veil of evening

Shuts nightly from our view. Calmly ye hear

Our prayers, which still, with childlike eagerness,

Would speed your purposes. Your hands pluck not

Heaven's golden fruit till ripe, and wo to him

Who, with impatient violence would snatch it,

Yet crude, and fraught with death to him that eats.

Oh! that this happiness so long delayed,

Vanish not like the shade of a lost friend,

Leaving the baffled heart to threefold misery.

Orestes. [returning.] If on the Gods thou callest, for thee and Pylades,

Name not my name with yours. Thou canst not save
The guilty, tho' you share his curse and doom.

Iphigenia. My fate to thine is bound indissolubly.

Orestes. Not so; let me alone, without a partner,
Go to the dead. For couldst thou, with thy veil,
The guilty screen from death, thou couldst not hide him
From eyes that never sleep. Thy presence now,
Oh heavenly being! awes them to a distance,
But does not drive them off. Their brazen feet,
Though bold, yet dare not tread this hallowed soil
And consecrated grove; but from afar,
I still at times can hear their horrid laugh.
Thus couch the wolves around the tree that yields
A refuge to the traveller. At the gate
They lie encamped, and, as I leave this grove,
Then will they rise, tossing their serpent heads,
And, scattering dust, will drive their prey before them.

Iphigenia. Canst thou, Orestes, hear a friendly word.

Orestes. Spare it for those the Gods love.

Iphigenia. To new hope

The gods now light thee.

Orestes. Aye; through smoke and horror
A pale ray glances from the Stygian stream,
That lights my soul to hell.

Iphigenia. No other sister
Hast thou, besides Electra.

Orestes. None that I knew.
A happy fate, tho' as it seemed to us,
Most dreadful, soon the oldest snatched away
From all the horrors that o'erhung our house.
But cease to question thus; and do not thou
Take part with the Erinnyes. They blow
The ashes from my soul, in savage rapture,
And suffer not the embers of that fire,
Which has consumed our house, to die away
Within my heart. Oh! will it burn forever,
Kindled and fanned, and with Hell-sulphur fed,
Torturing my soul?

Iphigenia. I bring sweet incense
And cast it on the flame. Oh! let the breath
Of love's soft whispering cool thy bosom glow.
Orestes!—dearest! Understandest thou not?
Or has the presence of the dreadful demons
Dried up thy blood? Is there a spell that creeps
Upon thy limbs, as if the head of Gorgon
Had petrified thee. If a mother's blood,
In hollow accents, summons thee to Hell,
Shall not a blessing from a Sister's lips
Call down the helpful Gods from high Olympus?

Orestes. It calls! It calls! And wouldst thou too destroy me?

Harbors a fury in thy breast? Who art thou,
Whose voice thus agitates my frightened heart,
Down in its lowest depths?

Iphigenia. In thy deep heart
It doth proclaim itself. Orestes, see!

'Tis I. 'Tis Iphigenia. See, I live.

Orestes. Thou.

Iphigenia. My Brother!!!

Orestes. Away, and let me be.

Touch not these locks, I warn me; for from me,
As from Creusa's bridal robe, a flame
Contagious—inextinguishable spreads.
Forbear and let me meet like Hercules
Disgraceful death with voiceless self-control.

Iphigenia. Thou shalt not die. Oh! could I hear from thee

One calm word! Solve my doubts and make me sure
That happiness, so long, so vainly prayed for,
Is not unreal. Joy and grief by turns
Whirl through my soul. I shudder to approach

A stranger's presence, but my inmost heart
Impels me to my brother, as by force.

Orestes. Is this Læmus' Temple; and his Priestess
With holy but licentious rage possessed?

Iphigenia. Oh hear me! Look upon me! O! behold
How, after long, long years, my heart expands
To bless, and yearns to kiss the dearest head
Earth e'er again can bear for me. My arms,
Long stretched to empty walls, are spread to clasp thee.
Oh let me! Let me! Not more purely streams
The eternal fountain from Parnassus flowing,
And to the golden valley gurgling down
From rock to rock, than gushes from my heart
The billowy stream, that, with a sea of bliss,
Surrounds me. Oh, Orestes! Oh, my brother!!

Orestes. Beautiful Nymph, I trust not to thy arts.
Dian demands strict servants, and avenges
The profanation of her sanctuary.

Remove thine arm; and if thou needs must save
And love a youth, and make him tender proffers
Of fairest fortune, turn thee to my friend,
A worthier man than I. He wanders there
Upon that rocky path. Go find him out:
Disclose your purpose to him, and spare me.

Iphigenia. Recall thy thoughts, my brother. Recognize
Her thou hast found, nor call a sister's joy,
Pure heavenly rapture—guilty, shameful lust.
Oh! take delusion from his staring eye,
Nor let the moment of my highest joy
Be turned to threefold wretchedness. Look on me!
It is thy sister: 'Tis thy long lost sister.
The Goddess from the altar rescued me;
Sheltered me here in her own sanctuary:
Thou art a captive offered as a victim,
And in the Priestess findest thy long lost sister.

Orestes. Unhappy Woman! Now the Sun shall witness
The last scene of the horrors of our house.
Is not Electra here? She too with us
Should perish here, and not reserve her life
To meet, at last, a still more cruel fate.
Priestess, lead on! I follow to the altar.
Our ancient race is trained to fratricide
By far-descended custom. O ye Gods!
I thank you that so young you cut me off
Yet childless! And do thou too be advised.

Set not thy love upon the sun and stars,
But to the realm of darkness follow me.
As dragons bred beside a sulphur pool
Devour each other, so our savage brood
Preys on itself. Come! Childless, guiltless come!

Go down with me! Thou lookest at me with pity.
Forbear! With such looks, Clytemnestra
Gazed on her son, and tried to reach his heart.
In vain! Her breast he smote; the Mother fell.
Indignant spirit rise! Draw near ye Furies!
Hedge us around, and at the spectacle,
The last and horridlest prepared by you,
Be present! 'Tis not hatred nor revenge
That whets her knife. She is a loving Sister
Forced to the deed. Nay, weep not! Thou art guiltless.
Nothing, since childhood, have I ever loved
As I could love thee, Sister. Lift thy steel!
Spare not, but open through my breast a way
To the warm stream of love that seethes within. [He sinks exhausted.]

Iphigenia. This bliss! This misery! They are too much
To bear alone. O, Pylades! where art thou?
Oh precious friend! Where shall I find thine aid? [She goes out.]

Orestes, [rousing himself.] One more! One more! Reach me, from Lethe's flood

The last refreshing cup. Life's spasm soon
 Shall from my breast be washed. The tranquil spirit,
 Bathed in the fountain of forgetfulness,
 Floats softly. To the ever-during mist
 Ye shades receive me. In your resting-place
 The hunted Son of Earth may now find comfort.
 What whispering is this among the twigs?
 What sounds come murmuring through the doubtful gloom?
 Come they to welcome the new guest? What's this?
 This crowd, whose high demeanor might denote
 Princes assembled in their social hour.
 How peacefully they mix—the old and young;
 Women and Men together, all how godlike,
 And all how like each other. Yes: 'Tis they,
 The fathers of my race. There Atreus walks
 And with Thyestes speaks in confidence.
 The boys sport round them. Is there then among you
 No hatred now? Has all resentment vanished
 With the Sun's light. Then I too may be welcome,
 And mingle freely in your proud procession.
 Hail Fathers! 'Tis Orestes comes to greet you.
 Last of your race, he reaped what you had sown,
 And bowed beneath the curse, he hither comes,
 Where burthens sit more lightly. O, receive him
 Into your circle. Here, where hatred lives not,
 Thee Atreus, thee Thyestes—both I honor.
 But let me see my father, whom in life
 I saw but once. O, Father! Is it thou?
 Is that my Mother, whom in confidence
 Thou ledest? Does she dare to touch thy hand?
 Then may Orestes too draw near to her
 And cry, "Behold thy Son!" Behold your Son!
 Oh bid him welcome! In our house on earth
 Greeting was Murder's watchword. But the race
 Of Tantalus has peace beyond the tomb.
 You welcome and receive me. Lead me then
 To the first father of our race. Where is he?
 Let me behold that dear and honored head
 That sat with Gods in council. You are silent,
 And turn aside. What means this? Does he suffer?
 Ah me! The overpowerful inflict
 Relentless tortures on the godlike man
 Fast forged with iron chains upon his breast.

[Iphigenia and Pylades enter. Orestes goes on.]

You too come down already! Sister, hail!
 Electra still is wanting. A kind God
 With pangless arrows soon may send her also.
 Thee, my poor friend, I pity. Come with me!
 Come with me. Let us go to Pluto's throne,
 And, as new guests, greet the assembled host.
Iphigenia. Ye twins, who to the human race dispense
 The sweet vicissitudes of night and day,
 Gemming the broad sky with your beauteous lights,
 But shine not on the dead; save us two children.
 Thou, Dian, lovest thy brother above all
 That Earth and Heaven offer, ever turning
 Thy virgin face toward his cheerful light
 In silent longing. Let not this dear one,
 So lately found, rave on in frenzied blindness:
 But, if the end of my concealment here
 Is now accomplished; if through me to him,
 Through him to me, thou art prepared to give
 The aid we need, Oh! now dissolve the curse,
 Nor let this hour of deliverance pass.
Pylades. Dost thou not recognize this holy grove,
 And the glad light, that shines not for the dead,
 And us, thy friend and sister, as our arms
 Are closely twined around thee? Grasp our hands.
 We are no empty shadows. Now give heed
 To what I say, and recollect thyself.

Each moment now is precious. Our return
 Hangs on slight threads, spun by the favoring Parcae.

Orestes [to Iphigenia.] Let my emancipated spirit first
 Find in thy arms a joy both new and pure,
 Ye Gods, whose lightning cleaves the teeming clouds,
 Who, sternly gracious, in loud thunder voice
 And roar of whirlwinds and wild-gushing torrents
 Accord the prayer of man, and melt his terrors
 Into a sense of blessing, changing the stare
 Of terror to glad looks and loud thanksgiving,
 As, in the drops that gem the gladdened leaves
 The Sun emerging, mirrors his bright face
 A thousand fold; while party-colored Iris
 Lightly sweeps off the last grey film of cloud:
 O! grant that I, here in my Sister's arms,
 On my Friend's bosom, may, with grateful heart,
 The blessings you accord, enjoy and cherish.
 The curse, my heart assures me, is dissolved.
 I hear the Furies, as away to Tartarus
 They hasten; and the distant thunder-sound
 Peals, as behind them shut the brazen doors.
 The Earth exhales fresh odors, and invites
 My steps to tread her fields, and chase life's joys
 And high achievements.

Pylades. Miss not then the time
 The Fates have granted. May the wind that fills
 Our swelling sails, to high Olympus bear
 The fulness of our joy. What now we need
 Is prompt deliberation and resolve.

END OF ACT III.

CLASSICAL STUDIES.

ESSAYS ON ANCIENT LITERATURE AND ART, with the Biography and Correspondence of Eminent Philologists—by Barnas Sears, Pres. Newton Theological Seminary;
 B. B. Edwards, Prof. Andover Theological Seminary;
 C. C. Felton, Prof. Harvard University. Boston: Gould,
 Kendall & Lincoln, 1843—pp. 413.

This is one of the numerous Germanico-classic works, which are every day pouring forth from the American press.
 It is made up of highly wrought essays on German Philology—Greek Literature—Classical Antiquity—Plastic Art of the Greeks, &c. which are somewhat affectingly attributed to sundry professors of the various schools of Germany as being opening lectures to their several classes. Beside these, there is what is called Philological Correspondence, being letters and fragments of letters, which purport to be translations of originals which passed at intervals within the last fifty years, or thereabouts, from one to another of the literati of the country aforesaid. Among these are letters from Rhunken, Ritter, Ernesti, Heyne, Schütz, &c., &c., &c.
 This book, the authors or editors have styled Classical Studies, with what propriety or pertinency, it is not easy to discover.
 The name of the book strikes us as having been an afterthought altogether. It is evidently a Salmagundi and furnished after being compounded, we doubt not, some little difficulty in suggesting a proper title, unless the authors cast lots for the name, and perchance fell on this we are utterly at a loss for a solution of the christening.
 And indeed if the preface did not suggest to us what the design of the book was—such a medley is it—we should be still more puzzled to know why it was ever written at all. But happily, like the Dutchman's picture underneath which was written libero manu, "dis is de horse," we are furnished with an account of the intent and meaning of the volume itself. It is the joint labor, it will be observed, of three very distinguished scholars—one, the first of whom, we had the pleasure and profit of knowing in earlier and far happier hours, and we take pleasure, after a considerable lapse of time, and in this somewhat distant land, in bearing voluntary testimony to his amenity as a gentleman and his ripe acquirements as a scholar. But neither the memory of youthful prepossessions, nor the distinguished position of these authors in the worlds of Letters, shall deter us from expressing with conscientious frankness the impressions which the perusal of their book has left on our mind. If, therefore, it be not considered too uncharitable, we venture to surmise that this volume was the product of some little desire on the part of these authors, to display their attainments in ancient and modern classical learning. This it undeniably does—but it falls immeasurably short of sustaining, illustrating, or enforcing the extravagant views on the subject of classical literature put forth in the preface. But passing by all minor objections and assuming, per saltum, that the matter of this book is fair and legitimate argument and illustration, as far as it goes for the positions taken, still we deny its sufficiency to sustain those positions, and we deny utterly the truth of the positions and views themselves.

The prevailing theme and leading idea of the preface is, that Classical Studies are infinitely too much neglected—that they ought to be infinitely more cultivated—that they form the staple commodity of intellectual life—that they are indispensable to the lawyer, divine, physician, farmer and mechanic, and everybody else, and in short, that they are the res vera of existence. We do not assert that these are the explicit declarations of the volume, but they are the unavoidable inferences from the unqualified glorification of classical lore. If the views of these authors import any thing, they involve these absurd pretensions. Now all this, in the latitude contended for in this book, we deny. A part of this is true, but not the whole of it. Classical studies, to a certain degree of acquirement and to a limited portion of mankind, are of essential value, in aiding—for they only aid—to discipline the mind by developing the discriminative power of the intellect—in cultivating the taste—in enlarging the vocable power of nations,—these they certainly tend to. But it must be remembered, that these are but means to be employed upon something higher, something nobler! Mental discipline, discrimination, taste, language, are comparatively useless, if they be not turned away from these mere appliances for their own production—the classics—and employed upon other noble and more useful departments of science and of art. Nature smiles in vain if we do not look upon her. She reveals her secrets to the retort and crucible uselessly, unless we scan her rereadings. The earth turns its fecund plains to the uprising sun in vain—and the waving grain will not sing a joyous welcome to his morning light, unless the hand of man cast the seed into her sides. Sharp keels will vex no foreign shores, unless the sails be given to the winds, and there be men to give them. But if every one be turned classic-monger all this must cease, for a profound and intimate acquaintance with classical learning is the result of lifetime labor. To exhaust, therefore, the discipline and taste acquired by a limited study—in exhuming Greek roots and discussing the digammatæ power—veiling the eyes to the varied sublimities of the face of nature, or the deep wonders of her womb, neglecting the beautiful and important science of anthropology and mathematical and philosophical study, is to neglect the great destiny of man and to palter with the great purpose of life. To some extent, classical learning tends to open the eye of the mind and unloose the tongue of man. But they are not the exclusive but coparcenary means in these great results. This truth these authors seem to have entirely overlooked, or have barely admitted as possible. But again, only partially true as are their pretensions, there is another limitation. There are minds upon which years of such culture would be entirely thrown away. They might make advances in science or art, or in the active employments of industrial labor, but classical learning is to them without form or comeliness—a profitless expenditure of time and money. Here is one grand defect of the present system of collegiate education—the universality of this study. In extent, therefore, as well as degree, the assumption of our authors, that classical learning is the staple of education and ought to be a pursuit of life, is ridiculous in the extreme. And yet unqualified as their assertions are—unlimited as their arguments are, nothing less can be drawn from their book. It must be admitted, as a liberal concession, that they do sometimes hint at the possibility, that there may be other pursuits in life—but no other means of culture. And only carry out, if it were possible, into realization their whimsies on this subject and we should have a nation, not of sun-embrowned, healthy and thrifty farmers, cunning and laborious artisans, men learned in physical and intellectu-moral science, but a meagre desiccated race, who, assimilating to their pursuits and stiff as parchment, could discourse, with nice precision, upon roots, arguments and reduplications, or perhaps even rise to that more extatic employment of scanning the of Homer—verily these were, if we could but see them, a useful and pleasant people!

We make these remarks in no disparagement of classical learning, pursued within reasonable limits—and if asked what limits, we reply, the usual collegiate course—but of the extravagant views and pretensions of professed scholars. Thoroughly imbued, saturated with the lore of their profession, they pore over their musty volumes, eviscerating from them antiquated and useless verbiage, or waging a furious logomachy about the relative and distinctive differences between tweedle dum and tweedle dee, now and then exclaiming, with most characteristic fervor of language, “hic labor, hoc opus est;” they, meanwhile, in blissful ignorance of most other knowledge are laughed at by the world for their pedantry and folly. In the homely language of Carlyle, “they neglect the inner heart of things in care for the mere wrappages and bandages thereof.” And a poet far elder than he, Goldsmith, says, “There is more knowledge to be acquired from one page of the volume of mankind, if the scholar only knows how to read, than in volumes of antiquity. We grow learned, not wise, by too long a continuance at college (studying classics). Every subject acquires an adventitious importance to him who considers it with application; and pursuing speculation beyond the bounds of reason one too frequently becomes ridiculously earnest in trifles or absurdity.” The truth is, the days of the schoolmen have passed away—lore is no longer learning. The beautiful fictions, the varied mythology of the ancient world have yielded to sterner truths and a sublimer God. Naiads no longer swim in streams from which steamboats pour their hissing breath,—nor do nymphs dance around Bandusian fountains to the music of a grinding mill. Fauns and Satyrs have fled affrighted from their sylvan homes at the thunder of the modern railway car. Valclusan meadows have bared their bowoms to the burnished ploughshare—Morse has outstript the telegraphic Mercury and Daguerre usurped the reins of the chariot of the sun fallen from the hands of astonished Phæbus. What need we then of classic lore. This is not the great need at the present juncture of this mighty changing and improving nation—but diversified knowledge, well imbedded in a good, substantial, healthful moral foundation. This is our great need.

THE SONG OF THE SCALD, BIORNE.

BY HENRY B. HIRST.

Biørne, Biørne, or as it is more properly written in the Norse of Eld, Bjorn, Grimolfson, a Scald or Bard, and, at the same time, a Viking or Sea King, was one of the earliest of the Norsemen, who landed on the shores of America. Eric Randa, or Eric the Red, was the first. The story of the Scald is somewhat romantically told in the following ballad. But a sequel still remains. Nearly thirty years afterwards, in 1026, an Icelander, named Gudliep, sailed for Dublin, but blown about by adverse winds, landed on an unknown shore. He and his crew were seized by the savages and borne into the interior. There they were accosted, in their own tongue, by a venerable chief, who, by dint of persuasion, saved them from the tender mercies of the natives. To their great surprise, he inquired after several individuals in Iceland, and, on their embarkation, made them the bearers of a gold ring to Thurida, the sister of the Sea King, Snorre Gode, and of a sword to her son. She had subsequently married. He refused to disclose his name, but on their arrival home no doubt was entertained that he was the Scald Bjorn, Thurida's Poet-lover, who had emigrated from Iceland in 998.

I.

Up with my pennon,
My pennon of red !
With its black raven rending
The corse of the dead—
That pennon which leaps
Like a meteor forth—
Flashing light in the darkness
Of night on the earth ;
And out with my canvass,
And Vikingirs all,
Let us fly forth, like falcons,
To conquer or fall.

II.

What care we ? What care we
For country or home ?
We can find others fairer—
Where'er we may roam !
There are yellow-haired maidens
And red gold in store
For us—who can gather—
On every shore ;
There are lands where the sun
Never ceases to shine,
Where the rivers run gold
And the forests bear wine ;

III.

There are lands where the snow
That we tread on would be
A wonder—a terror—
A horror—to see ;
There are lands that have flowers
Like the hues of their skies,
As fragrant with sweets
As their own maidens' sighs,
Where seraph-like birds
Sing from dawn until night,
And even breathe music
Till morning breathes light.

IV.

And there, the sleek Lords
Of the South hold their sway
O'er a people as timid
And feeble as they ;

And these, the weak cowards,
Who pale at the sight
Of a Norseman's fierce falchion
That flashes red light,
Shall they revel like Gods
On such treasures as these,
While the war-worn Vikingir
Whirls over the seas ?

V.

Thurida, Thurida,
False maiden, farewell !
That the Scald dared to love thee
Shall history tell ;
That he scorned thee at last
Shall be written—as red
As his fame, when he slumbers
On Glory's green bed ;
And when Odin receives him
His harp-strings shall speak
In those heavenly halls
What shall wither thy cheek.

VI.

He will sing how the Poet
(God's heaven-born son !)
Bowed his loftiest soul
To earth's loveliest one ;
And how, when he told her
His love, she returned
But her scorn for the hopes
In his bosom inurned,
And bade her base vassals
With fire-flashing eye,
" Let the song-singing lover,
The rude runner die ! "

VII.

Oh ! Odin ! 'twas pleasure—
'Twas passion to see
Her serfs sweep like wolves
On a lambkin like me !
With one surge of my steel
How their heads rolled around,
Like tree-tops the hurricane Hurls to the ground—
Like oaks 'neath the lightning
They cumbered the land,
Falling limbless and shorn
Neath my death-bearing brand.

VIII.

And she, pale, proud maiden !
When toward her I strode,
(Aye, there, in the Vikingir Snorre's own abode !)
How she trembled, her breasts
Heaving high, as she felt
My iron hand on her arm,
When before her I knelt,
And with that red right hand
Uplifted, I swore
To carry her falsehood
From shore unto shore.

IX.

I pressed her pale lips—
'Twas the kiss of young hate !
And I left her to Odin,
To conscience and fate—
I left her—her brother's
Proud palace in flame—

I left her—to linger
 The chosen of shame !
 And I laughed a loud laugh
 As I strode through the dark,
 When that flame had gone down,
 To my iron-bound bark.

X.

Ho ! Warriors, Vikings,
 And Scalds of the North,
 Give our flag to the blast,
 Fling our canvass free forth ;
 Hoist anchor ; now Iceland,
 Cold country, adieu,
 For we go, iron-banded,
 Our fortune to woo,
 And we sweep, like the eagles,
 We children of war !
 With fire-flashing eyes,
 To our harvest, hurrah !

MY DAUGHTER'S PORTRAIT.

"A tale of rapture and of soft complaint—
 The girl, the wife, the mother and the saint !
 A double music to her life is given—
 Grief's holy wail on earth ; Joy's harps in heaven."
Woman's Epitaph.

My first visit to my uncle was made at the close of my last vacation at school ; those blessed slips of sunshine which chequer the tedium of boarding school life. This was an indulgence which had been long promised, and often deferred, so that I felt peculiarly happy when I found myself at last seated upon the sofa, by his quiet fireside, my hand clasped in his, and his dear, pensive eyes, kindly turned to mine.

"See to what an interesting circle I have introduced you," he said, patting the head of a large dog which rested on his knee, and nodding with a smile at a grave looking cat, which occupied the corner of the hearth, "I am afraid you will soon tire of us my little Kate."

I was always noted for a felicitous vivacity at reply, but all my lighter feelings stood rebuked before the gentle seriousness of my uncle, and I only ventured a timid pressure of the hand which I held in reply to this remark. The servant, who had been employed in arranging the tea table, now bowed to his master, and he rose, and leading me to the table, placed me by his side. I was a good deal surprised at the delicate tastefulness of all the arrangements of the table, which seemed almost out of place in an old bachelors establishment ; but much more by the fact that my uncle did not invite me to perform those little services which generally devolve upon ladies on such occasions. The seat at the head of the table remained vacant ; a servant standing at the side of the table presented our tea. My eye once or twice wandered to the vacant seat, until I observed a shade gathering over the expressive face of my companion. I knew that my uncle was a man of many peculiarities, and I dismissed the matter without further reflection. When the tea table was removed, my uncle talked with me of my friends, my studies, my prospects—but his manner became more and more abstracted, and after a little he said, in an altered and tremulous tone :

"I believe you were too young, Catherine, to remember my Evelyn. But you have probably heard that a supposed likeness between your cousin and yourself, was the foundation of my partiality to you. Come, I will show you Evelyn's apartments."

"This room," he continued mournfully as we walked towards it, "this room is sacred to those memories of the past, which are more precious to me than the living and present happiness of half the world. I permit no intrusion there. You are the first person besides myself who has entered it for years." He opened the door as he spoke, and I absolutely started, as the fairy scene within broke upon my view. It was no dark, deserted chamber of death, which my imagination had pictured, but all bright, glowing and cheerful. A profusion of lights placed in different parts of the room, revealed every object however minute, and a chastened magnificence pervaded the whole. There was no vulgar drawing-room glare, but that delicate elegance, which an indulged and tasteful female is apt to draw around her. Every thing looked natural and familiar, as if the beloved tenant had but just stepped out and might return again in a moment. A small, white glove lay upon the light guitar, which was but half drawn from its jewelled case. An unfinished drawing, with pencils and brushes around, was seen directly below the astral ; and even a lady's scarf was thrown carelessly over the superb harp which occupied its appropriate recess : while scattered through the whole room, appeared the toys and playthings of a child, distinctly intimating some fairy scene of infant happiness.

As I advanced, turning my eye from object to object, a dim consciousness of familiarity stole over my mind, as if some faded picture of the past was suddenly revived before me.

"I think I have seen this room before," I said irresolutely.

"Do you indeed remember it," replied my uncle, his whole face irradiated by one of his sweet, but rare smiles, "yes, my dear, you have indeed seen this room before."

"And in that chair," I continued, "sat a fair, sick lady."

My uncle pointed to a portrait just above us.

"That is the lady," I cried, with a gush of passionate emotion, gazing upon the sweet, pale face, and fragile form which seemed to recline upon the canvass for support. At once the whole flashed upon my mind—the tones of love, the fond caress, the soothing tenderness, which had been to me as the dim dreams of infancy, rose clear and distinct before me,

“As if again, in every vein,
My mother's milk was stirring.”

And turning, imploringly to my uncle, I cried, “My mother, is that my mother.”

“Not your mother, dearest creature; she died at your birth—but the only one from whom you ever received a mother's love.”

When I had in some measure recovered my composure, I observed that the apartment was hung with four full length portraits, which bore to each other, that indefinable resemblance, which constitutes identity in the same face, however changed in some respects.

The first in the series represented a glowing Hebe looking girl, apparently about my age; the rounded contour of the face, and that peculiar peach bloom, so seldom seen beyond childhood, together with a profusion of pale ringlets, imparted an inexpressible charm of youthfulness. She looked like a radiant personification of Hope. No shadow had yet fallen upon that young heart, and her eyes wore a sweetly, trustful gladness of expression.

The second was evidently the portrait of a bride: there was no mistaking the jewelled brow, the nuptial white, and that soft flutter of timidity, which the artist had arrested, and portrayed with admirable skill. Just beyond, the same lady appeared again, with an infant in her arms. Her eyes were fixed upon his face, with that fond downward gaze, which concentrates all that is loving in the human countenance; and from the parted lips, we seemed to hear the soft and silvery talk which mothers love.

The last portrait in the series, was the same to which my uncle had directed my attention.

I was never weary of gazing at these pictures, but turned from one to another, with constantly renewed interest. My uncle seemed affected and pleased by the irrepressible exhibition of my feelings. “My dear Catherine,” he said, as we parted for the night, “I see that I was not mistaken in you—you are worthy of the proof of my confidence which I have given you. Perhaps,” he added, drawing from a cabinet a small roll of manuscript, “perhaps, you may feel some interest in these scattered fragments, written at different periods, and forming something like a historical appendage to these portraits.”

I received the manuscript eagerly and gratefully, and the moment the door closed after my uncle, I hastened to peruse the following pages:

EVELYN'S RETURN FROM SCHOOL.

It is four years since I have seen her, and she is probably much altered. I parted from her a pale and sickly little girl, but she was always a gentle and loving child. Whatever she may be, she is all that is left to me. The only fragment remaining of that magnificent fabric of happiness, built of youthful love, of well earned wealth and fair reputation—all now reduced to this single coal, which is left unquenched upon my desolate hearth.

She is come! and how different from what I expected. My imagination had only extended the image preserved by memory, but scarce a trace remains. Oh health, is this thy matchless work! 'tis “thine own sweet and cunning hand which has laid on” the rich carnation of her cheek, the clear effulgence of her eye,—but this is not all; “the ethereal beam” within, shines out in every look, in every varying shade of color and expression, in that April face of tears and smiles—the quick gushing tear, the radiant smile, which chases it away. And this sweet bird of beauty is mine, mine in a sense in which she never can belong to another. Whether she comes to me in her morning freshness, like a rose which has been bathed in the dews of night, or shaded with the pensive sweetness of evening,—how lovely, how precious! I have returned as it were by magic to the days of my youth. She hangs upon my arm when I walk, she rides by my side, or she sings to me the songs her mother sang. Once again I hang over the instrument and beat the time to tones which have rolled back the tide of years, and once more the quick pulse of youth seems to beat within me. These long silent halls ring again with the notes of music and gladness; “the cloud and the rain have passed, and the time of singing birds has come.” My Evelyn sits to Alberti to day for her portrait. I would fix the two evanescent hues of youth and beauty.

EVELYN MARRIED.

It is done,—my child is no longer mine, Evelyn belongs to another—I like him not. With all his imperial beauty and nobleness of appearance; his transcendent talents, his wealth, his fame—all those things which have given him to ride triumphantly upon the high places of the earth, have only enthroned self-supreme in his sordid bosom. Why does he seek her! only as a jewel for his own crown—near his heart she will not come. Heart! he has none—he does not understand, he does not even dream of the pure sanctity of love, its holy energy, its deep unspeakable devotedness.

And thus will he snatch my little hoard of happiness, to waste and dissipate unused. And she too, dear, infatuated girl, her own hand directs the sword which must finally pierce through her soul.

I dared not oppose, but I can not approve, I have no reasonable objection to allege, but I cannot like him. To day Alberti sent home Evelyn's bridal portrait. I was alone all the morning, and I have gazed at it until my eyes grew dim with tears. Surely it is a gem of rare beauty. How different from the girlish Hebe which hangs opposite. It is the finished and dignified woman; the serenity of self-government is there, the calmness of self-possession, and that sweet reserve, in which is veiled all the deep mysteries of a woman's heart. And this loveliness must waste its fragrance unheeded, unnoticed. Her beauty indeed, her grace, her accomplishments, all these he will prize; but when once the toy has lost its gilding, its value will be gone. Ah, then for the days of darkness.

EVELYN A MOTHER.

My Evelyn and her babe! this is Alberti's third sketch. See in the sweet earnest gaze of those dear, thoughtful eyes, is wrapped all the holy charities of the mother and the wife: This is the bright meridian of womanhood; all high, unclouded noon—yet, surely a shade has stolen over that beloved face; an anxious look, a pensive abstraction; and, when I compare it with its glowing companions, it looks dim and faded. Is it that the rose which has left her own fair cheek, is only transferred to the dimpled infant in her arms. Is it only the natural progress of things? and yet—but hush, thou jealous heart, old man be still. Hast thou not watched with eagle eye every word, every look, and all is fair. But why is Evelyn so solicitous to convince me that she is loved? Why does she tell me every little act of seeming affection? Why are his costly gifts exhibited, his kind words repeated, unless it be to persuade me of that, she greatly doubts herself! Why are her manners so constrained!—what has become of her guileless simplicity, her bewitching naturalness! Ah, Evelyn, my child, I fear for thee!

EVELYN IN SORROW.

Is that pale shade my Evelyn! Alas, the "violet of death" already appear in that wan face: those faded eyes reveal the mute anguish of a settled sorrow,—the silent bleeding of the heart at its thousand pores. O thou, whose arm of love should now support and cherish, where art thou now! A year has passed since he has seen her. He has accepted a foreign embassy, and now, in a distant land, he sates his ever craving appetite for the pomp and glitter of life. With no shadow on his brow, and no sadness at his heart, he basks in that glare for which he was formed. But why am I thus harsh; he is no tyrant husband, no false deceiver: the first word of unkindness has never yet been breathed. He did not chide, he only forgot. She was one among the many interests which absorbed him; she took her turn with other things, and like other things, was dismissed and forgotten. How often, even in their happier days, while she was still the object of his pride and passion, have I seen the cold chill of disappointment steal over her, when all her little efforts to attract and interest him past unnoticed. She played, (and tears chased each other down my face as I marked the significant tenderness of the pieces she selected,) but he heard her not. She spoke, but he did not reply. Absorbed in his newspaper, or book, or by the most uninteresting visiter, he seemed scarcely conscious of her presence. Yet there was nothing in all this greatly wrong; it was only the inevitable consequence of that most fatal mistake in life, an ill-assorted marriage. Oh, Evelyn, thou wast formed for love, and those rich treasures of affection which have been locked unused within thee, will burst their "fleshy casket." He has robed thee in splendor, he has decked thee with jewels, only to hide a breaking heart.

But Evelyn's marriage at least opened to her one new and untried source of happiness. She was now a mother, and into this new channel she poured the full tide of her warm and lively affections. All mothers love ardently; but with Evelyn it was undivided affection. Her repulsed and wounded spirit sought here its solace and its object. Her music, her books, her pencil, were forgotten. One thought, one feeling absorbed her. Whether she held him sweetly folded in her arms, hushed in rosy slumbers; "breathed his soft breath," and printed his velvet lip with the light but passionate kiss of love; or, joining his childish gambols, pursued his flying steps and mingled her silvery laugh with his, still she seemed to feel but one presence, see but one image. Her voice, when she spoke to him, was love's own music, her look,—but who can describe a mother's look of love.

It was a child of rare beauty. It might have been an old man's fancy, but I never thought he would live; she loved him too well.

One evening, as I sat alone in this room, the little boy came bounding in, as usual followed by his mother.

"I have been running races with mamma," he said, quite out of breath, "and now I am so tired."

She laid him to rest upon the sofa. I felt uneasy as I noticed the quick, short panting of the child: his cheeks were crimson, and his lustrous eyes seemed to burn in their sockets. I felt his hand, it was hot and feverish.

"The boy is sick, Evelyn," I said anxiously.

Her quick apprehensions were excited, and she hurried him to bed. In the course of the night he was very ill, and the morning light revealed the rapid ravages of disease. As the sun rose the following day, the little sufferer said, "mamma, let me sleep: I'm weary now;" and, folded in that last convulsive embrace, he gently breathed his spirit away.

I watched my poor Evelyn with an agitation which amounted almost to terror. She sat metionless as a statue, with her eyes riveted on the face of the child, watching, in mute suspense, for his next respiration. It came not—and she cast a wild, hurried glance around her, and gathering from our looks the sad confirmation of her fears, she uttered a cry of anguish, so deep, so hopeless, that even now I shudder to recall it.

They say that there is no such thing as a broken heart; but I do believe, that in that moment of overwhelming agony, the silvery cord of life gave way—from that time forth she was but a dying creature.

The physician, to whose care Evelyn was consigned, administered a strong opiate; and in a short time she sunk into a deep sleep, which lasted all the morning. I passed that wretched day between her bed-side and the room in which were laid the remains of the little boy.

The friendly hand which had prepared him for the grave, had shrouded his little form in that pure white linen, which, when thus used, is always associated with the robes of those blessed ones, who “walk in white” above: and the ineffable purity of his looks, well agreed with this association. His little hands were meekly folded on his bosom; his bright locks, so life-like, stirring with every light breeze which passed over them; his eyes closed so naturally, so softly, that, spite of the sad certainty of death, I felt every moment as if they would break their marble slumber. These, and the celestial whiteness of his countenance, unvaried by the slightest tinge of color, save where the golden lashes rested, like finest pencilling upon his unsullied cheek, formed a picture of such solemn sweetness, that while I contemplated it, the turbulence of grief dissolved in tender sorrow and holy resignation.

The few short months which remained to my Evelyn, were so sad; the change in her so piteous, that my heart fails when I attempt to sketch it. The shattered casket of love had exhaled in a moment, the gathered sweets of years; and then the dark void, the deep want of the soul, its ineffable yearnings!

She did not complain, she seldom wept: but the fatal work of disease, was rioting in silence upon the vitals of that still sufferer. Her cheek grew paler, her form more attenuated. She knew she must die. I knew she must die, but neither of us distinctly admitted the fact; she for my sake, and I for hers.

Once, we sat alone in this room; at her request the play-things of little William, had been left strewed about, just as he had used them last, and hence she often loved to resort hither, though she seldom adverted to the child. It was evening twilight, and the beams of an early moon fell in long slips from the windows upon the carpet. She rose, and drawing her guitar from its case, (it was the first time she had touched it since his death,) she played the lullaby she was accustomed at this hour to sing for her little boy. There was something so sweetly plaintive in her altered tones, so touchingly mournful, that I was entirely subdued, and though habitually self-controlled in her presence, I now “lifted up my voice and wept.” She seated herself upon the sofa beside me, and laying her wasted hand on mine, she said, “Father, I have wished to speak to you all day. I wanted to tell you that I do not grieve for little William now. He needs no lullaby of mine, I do believe,” she added, with something of her former animation, “I do believe that he is even now listening to the holy harpings of angels—and that thought is healing here.” Her hand was prest upon her heart as she spoke, and her eyes lifted reverently upwards. The slow tear-drops, one after another, stole silently down her cheek, but there was nothing like agitation in her manner; that was sweet and calm.

“Father,” she continued, “I have sinned deeply; I have sought to fill up this heart with the things of earth—God would not have it so; He has dashed my idols in pieces before my face, and now my soul returns to its rest.”

It was the day after this conversation, that Alberti, unknown to herself, sketched his last Portrait of my Daughter. J. A.

MOONLIGHT MUSINGS.—No. III.

BY E. B. HALE.

Among my kindred let me die,
How many a soul has said;
There let me close my weary eye,
And lay me where my fathers lie,
Beside their honor'd bed.

But when the soul hath kith nor kin,
And all are coldly spoken;
When bosom friends that once have been,
No more receive the wanderer in,
His spirits crush'd and broken;

Blame not the exile—no, O no!
Thank God thy lot is blest;
His gnawing pain thou may'st not know,
Nor feel the stings of torturing wo,
That pierce his bleeding breast.

His anguish—hast thou felt the same?
His grief—was't all thine own?
O lightly speak the Exile's name,
His agony, of quenchless flame,
Thy soul has never known.

Full many a sweet and dulcet strain,
The harps of England sing;
But many a year I ween will wane,
E'er men shall see the like again,
Of Harolde wandering.

"My days are in the yellow leaf,
The fruits and flowers of love are gone,
The worm, the canker and the grief,
Are mine alone."

So sung the lord of England's lyre,
E'en in his manhood's prime;
Glowing with sparks of seraph fire—
Soaring on wings that knew no tire—
Ethereal and sublime.

So sung the Bard—but sung no more!
His lofty spirit fled;
And from the old heroic shore,
With mourning winds the ocean o'er,
They brought the noble dead.

They brought him home—the Wanderer—
Cold was his marble brow;
Speak lightly ye who do not err,
Speak lightly of the Slumberer,
Blame not his memory now.

They brought him Home! Endearing name!
Home, to his native shore!
And who among his kindred came,
To meet the favorite Son of Fame,
Returned to go no more?

Who crowded 'round the sable bier,
With gasp of wild distress;
And pour'd the bitter briny tear,
O'er him the noble and the dear,
So mutely motionless?

She ne'er forgot—did she behold
The pale and letter'd brow;
And in the marble features cold,
Recall her bosom lord of old,
And her neglected vow?

The idol of his soul—his own—
The all to him below—
The Beautiful—to whom alone,
His anguish'd soul had often flown,
To tell its secret wo;

Ada! Met she her father there?
Took she a last farewell?
Might not his idol-daughter wear,
One circlet of his clustering hair,
She, that he loved so well?

They met him not: nor all—nor one—
No crowd came 'round the bier:
The Muses wept their gifted son,
Whose fitful race so shortly run,
But kindred shed no tear!

Justice! to Justice give its due!
Poor Fletcher 'tis to thee!
Thy honest heart was kind and true,
The only mourner Byron knew,
In his calamity.

Where sleeps he now? th' illustrious, where?
Among the lordly brave?
Made they his bed of glory there,
Where Newstead's noble ruins are,
A well befitting grave?

Ah! no! an humbler place he found,
A lowly quiet spot—
No costly fane enclos'd him round,

No sculptur'd tablet marks the ground,
Of him the unforget.

Softly! his fitful life is o'er—
Broke is the golden bowl—
His syren song he'll sing no more,
Unless upon the Eternal Shore—
May God have saved his soul!

But aye, the bright and beauteous one,
The rainbow of his sky;
The all of bliss when life begun,
His secret love 'till life was done;
A love that could not die;

Where slumbers she? or what of her?
Survives she still below?
Ah! listen ye who would not err,
Turn not away the worshipper,
His love ye little know.

There is no deed man will not do,
No act of daring high;
No bar, but he will fondly woo,
And burst th' opposing barrier thro',
At love's approving eye.

But mock him—with his feelings play—
Heed not his earnest pray'r—
And thou hast made his soul a prey,
To bitterest pangs that gnaw away,
The peace that slumbers there.

Poor Mary Chaworth! had'st thou known,
The heart that beat for thee;
How Byron's love was all thine own,
Around thy very being grown,
Enduring, deep and free;

Could'st thou have seen the coming years,
All darkness, doubt and gloom;
The golden hopes obscur'd with fears—
Thy smiles bedimm'd with trickling tears—
Thy pale and wasted bloom.

O thou had'st never, never flung,
That noble heart away;
Pale sadness never would have clung
Around thy soul—nor sorrow sung,
Thy early dying day!

Death woo'd and won thee!—thou art gone,
Gone in thy beauty's bloom!
Gone as the blush of the Summer's morn,
Gone to the bright eternal dawn,
Beyond the shrouded tomb!

There sin and sorrow never come!
The pain, the grief, the sigh;
How should they dim the angels home,
Where bright ethereal spirits roam,
And soaring Seraphs fly!

The broken hearted live not there!
Hush'd is the voice of wo!
And thro' the ever-crystall'd air,
Bright beings in their glory wear,
The robes of spotless snow.

And 'mid the groves of evergreen,
That spot the Heav'nly plain;
The truthful soul will find, I ween,
Its counterpart—with witching mien,
And harp of thrilling strain!

There dwell the beautiful and bright,
Who fade from earth away ;
And on the far celestial height,
In climes of bliss—and realms of light,
Survive the grave's decay.

* * * *

In Hackwell church—in deep repose—
Poor Byron's ashes lie ;
As few have felt his bleeding woes,
O blame his memory not as those,
Who curse with envious eye.

O'er hill and dell a little way,
Where weeping willows wave ;
And evening zephyrs softly play,
And softly falls pale Luna's ray,
Is Mary Chaworth's grave.

They sleep in silence cold and deep,
And Envy's poisonous breath ;
Would e'en forbid the soul to weep,
Tho' Genius slept an eternal sleep,
Lock'd in the arms of death.

But o'er their graves we'll drop the tear ;
Farewell, unhappy pair !
Farewell ! The senseless world may sneer,
But thou shalt live to memory dear,
And in that brighter happier sphere,
That cloudless clime,
That bourne sublime,
The ever pure and holy Heav'ns,
With souls redeem'd—and sins forgiv'n,
May'st thou have entered there !

INTERESTING RELICS.

The following scraps of "the olden time" were furnished us by the kindness of Wyndham Robertson, Esq., late Lieutenant Governor of Virginia. They were copied by his father from "old papers" in the Council Chamber of Virginia, whilst he was the clerk of the Council, which office he held for many years. We have more in store.

[Ed. Mess.

An Account of what his Majesty said at his first coming to Council.

His Majesty, at his first sitting in his Privy Council, was graciously pleased to express himself in this manner—

MY LORDS :

Before I enter upon any other business, I think fit to say something to you : Since it hath pleased Almighty God to place me in this station, and I am now to succeed so good and so gracious a King as well as so very kind a Brother ; I think fit to declare to you, that I will endeavour to follow his Example, and most especially in that of his great clemency and tenderness to his People. I have been reported to be a man for Arbitrary Power, but that is not the only Story has been made of me : and I shall make it my endeavours to preserve this Government both in Church and State as it is now by law established. I know the principles of the Church of England are for monarchy, and the Members of it have shewed themselves good and loyal Subjects, therefore I shall always take care to defend and support it. I know too, that the laws of England are sufficient to make the King as great a Monarch as I can wish : and as I shall never depart from the just rights and prerogative of the Crown, so I shall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in Defence of this Nation, and I shall still go as far as any man in preserving it, in all its just Rights and Liberties.

Whereupon the Lords of the Council were Humble Suitors to his Majesty, that these, his Gracious Expressions might be made Public : which his Majesty did Order accordingly.

Printed 1684, by Henry Hills, and Thomas Newcomb, printers to the King.

At a General Assembly summoned to meet at her Majesty's Royal College of William & Mary, adjoining to the City of Williamsburg the 17th day and begun the 19th day of March 1702 in the 2d year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lady Anne by the Grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith &c. and thence by several prorogueons continued to, and held at her Majesty's Royal Capital the 21st day of April 1704 in third year of her Majesties Reign.

His Excellency Francis Nicholson Esq. her Majesty's Lieut. and Governor Gen'l of Virginia.

Wm. Byrd	Philip Ludwell	} Esq'rs.
John Lightfoot	Wm. Bassett
Benj'n Harrison	Henry Duke
Robert Carter	Robert Quary
John Custis	John Smith

Ordered

That the Clerk of the Gen'l Assembly go to the House of Burgesses, and acquaint them y'r his Exc'y com'ds their immediate attendance on him in the Council Chamber.

The House being come, his Exc'y was pleased to acquaint them, that her most sacred Majesty having been pleased to renew his Commission to be her Majesty's Lieut. and Governor Gen'l of this her Majesty's most ancient and great Colony and Dominion of Virginia, he would cause the said Commission to be read to them.

And accordingly his Excellency's Commission was publicly read by the Cl'k of the Gen'l Assembly.

After which his Exc'y read that part of his Instructions wherein the Council are nominated and acquainted the House that upon Colo. Page's Death, the number of Councillors falling under nine he had appointed one to supply that Vacancie.

And then signified to the House that he had Commissionated some of her Majesty's hon'ble Council to adm'r the Oaths unto the Burgesses.

Whereupon the Burgesses withdrew, and the hon'ble Wm. Byrd, John Lightfoot, and Benj'n Harrison Esq's went to Administer the oaths to them.

The Gentlemen of the Council appointed to Adm'r the Oaths to the Burgesses being returned. Ordered

That the Clerk of the Gen'l Assembly go to the House of Burgesses and acquaint them that his Exc'y com'ds their immediate attendance on him in the Council Chamber.

The House of Burgesses being come, his Exc'y made the following speech.

HON'BLE GENTLEMEN.

God Almighty I hope will be graciously pleased so to direct, guide and enable us as that we may to all intents and purposes answer her Majesty's Writt by which this Assembly was called, and by prorogation is now mett in this her Ma'ty Queen Anne her Royal Capitol: which being appointed by law for holding Gen'l Assemblys and Gen'l Courts, my hopes likewise are that they may continue to be held in this place for the promoting of God's Glory, her Majesty and her successors interest and service with that of the Inhabitants of this her Ma'ty's most Ancient and great Colony and Dominion of Virginia so long as the Sun and Moon endure.

Gentlemen. Her most sacred Majesty having been graciously pleased to send me her Royal Picture and Arms for this her Colony and Dominion, I think the properest place to have them kept in, will be this Council Chamber but it not being as yet quite finished, I cannot have them so placed as I would—

By private accounts wh'ch I have from England I understand her Ma'ty hath lately thought fitt to appoint a day of public fasting and humiliation there, but I have not yet seen her Ma'ty's Royal proclamation for it wh'ch makes me not willing to appoint one here till I have. And had it not been for this, I designed that her Ma'ty's Royal Picture and Arms shou'd have been first seen by you on St. George his day, and to have kept it as a day of public thanksgiving, it being the day on wh'ch her Ma'ty was Crowned, and bearing the name of his Royal Highness the Prince of Denmark, and likewise of the patron of our Mother Kingdom of England.

Hon'ble Gentlemen, I dont in the least doubt but that you will join with me in paying our most humble and dutifull acknowledgm'ts and thanks to her most sacred Ma'ty for this great honor and favor wh'ch she hath been pleased to bestow upon y'r Country, and in praying that she may have a long, prosperous, successfull and Victorious Reign, as also that she may in all respects, not only equal but even out do her Royal predecessor Queen Elizabeth of ever Glorious Memory, in the latter end of whose Reign this Country was discovered, and in honour of her called Virginia.

It is now within two years of a Century since its being first seated at which time if God Almighty and her Majesty shall be so pleased I design to celebrate a Jubilee, and that the Inhabitants thereof may increase exceedingly, and also abound with Riches and honours, and have extraordinary good success and fortune in all their undertakings, but chiefly that they may be exemplary in their Lives and conversations, continue in their religion of the Church of England, as by law established, loyal to the Crown thereof, and that all these things may come to pass, I question not, but you will most cordially join with me in our most unfeigned and hearty prayers to God Almighty for them.

FR. NICHOLSON.

And then the Burgesses returned to their House. And the Council Adjourned till to-morrow morning 9 o'clock.

LXII.

OH, JOY! FOR THE DAWN.

1.

Oh, joy! for the dawn is now breaking
O'er all these broad forests and shores;
From her slumber of ages awaking,
Her light again liberty pours;
O'er the wastes of the new world extending,
Where lately the Savage but trod,
Young Freedom her War-Song is blending
With the anthem that rises to God;
The gallant no longer are sleeping,
And the tright sword in sunlight is leaping.

2.

That wild virgin land shall no longer,
By the Tyrant's foul foot be debased;
The God in his own realm is stronger,
And his altars now rise undefaced:
From mountain, from river, from valley,
The shout of the warrior ascends;
To the feast of the Eagle they rally
And the doom, and the danger impends—
The blood of the brave streams like water,
And the hills wear the garments of slaughter.

TO THE SOUL OF HONEST FAME.—ODE.

To the soul of honest fame,
In the arts of peace is shame,
Follow'd, when the foe,

Stands o'er home and altar,
 With his steel and halter,
 Ready with his blow.
 Peace is but the reign of rest,
 Out of season never blest,
 War is vigilance ;—
 Soul, and strength, and virtue,—all
 When the foeman would Enthal,
 To bestow, at freedom's call,
 Sweet deliverance!
 Sound the trumpet, tira-la!
 Tira-la! Tira-la!

2.

Charge of horse that plunges!
 Bayonet that lunges!—
 Roaring cannon, rending hail,
 Tira-la! Tira-la!
 'Till the arm of right prevail,
 'Till the foe is stricken down
 Howling, groaning, dying,
 Or in silence hurries on,
 Panic-stricken, flying!—
 While the lordly trumpet rallies
 For the final charge that brings
 Peace to all our vallies—
 And our Ensign-eagle sings
 Tira-la! Tira-la!

THE SPIRIT OF THE LAND!—HYMN.

1.

The Spirit of the Land,
 The mighty cry hath heard,
 The trumpet of Command,
 The forest depths hath stirr'd;
 A voice is on the hills,
 And a voice is in the vale,
 With a cry that nothing stills,—
 "Do not fail!"

2.

But it needs no voice to wake,
 The fierce spirit of the land;
 It has cruel chains to break,
 And it stirs with heart and hand;
 Not in sudden wrath it comes,
 Like the rising of the gale,
 That in summer noontide hums
 Soon to fail!

3.

But with souls that long have striven,
 With a rolling, rising strength;
 To whom mighty thoughts are given,
 Being mighty deeds at length;
 Ye behold them on their path,
 And ye may not doubt the tale,
 That a people right in wrath,
 Never fail!

ONCE MORE, OR WE'RE OF LITTLE WORTH.

1.

Once more, or we're of little worth!
 When cunning tyranny grows strong,
 The war-cry must again go forth,
 A Peal of terror, loud and long,
 A cry to waken up the earth!

2.

Our fathers gave us Liberty ;—
 Their blood-writ lessons, conn'd at length,
 The dearest portion of the free,
 Have fix'd the faith, have warm'd the strength,
 And make the freeman's memory!

3.

And they have bared the sword in vain,
 If now we lose the faith they taught;
 Fruitless the peril and the pain,
 Vain all the battle-fields they fought,
 And we must do their deeds again.

4.

The tide in kindling fervor runs,
 The storm is high, the foemen press;
 We see their swords, we hear their guns,
 Yet thousands look on passionless—
 Say, Fathers! are these men your sons?

5.

Gathering at Liberty's last fane,
 'Tis now the hour, who would be free,
 To seek her cell, to snap her chain,
 And with the blood of tyranny,
 To sanctify her shrines again.

6.

One joyous battle shot and now,
 We smite, we strike the oppressor down;
 The death shot cleaves his iron brow,
 We see him gasp, we hear him groan,
 We hurl his bloody banner low!

IN THE FREE MOUNTAIN AIR.

In the free mountain air our banner is streaming,
 The vallies now echo with many a sound;
 Bright arms in the blue skies of heaven are gleaming,
 And proudly our warriors are gathering around;
 No longer the dark clouds of silence and anguish,
 O'ershadow the glorious and great of the past,
 But the hearts of the mighty long destined to languish
 Have kindled in freedom, for vengeance, at last.

2.

Triumph!—the free man wears fetters no longer;
 Vengeance for murder, indignity, hate;
 Glory, the triumph is not to the stronger,
 Freedom has fought with the strong arm of fate;
 By the blood we have shed, by the shades of our fathers,
 The remembrance that blooms beyond battle's red heath,
 That fame shall we keep, while Eternity gathers
 His harvest of years from the dread reappings of death.

3.

No longer in sorrow our maidens repining
 Shall sigh the bright morning of being away;
 Their eyes with pure light, like our own blue sky, shining,
 Shall meet our return from the fight ever gay.
 In their bowers at eve, by the Tyrant oppress'd not,
 Shall they weave the bright garland of song for the brave,
 And sing how the soul that by beauty is bless'd not,
 Though bound by no chain is the Soul of a Slave.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE MALTESE PEOPLE.

BY W. W. ANDREWS, U. S. CONSUL AT MALTA.

The Religious and Popular Superstitions of the Maltese people; their Carnival and its consequences—Duels at Malta, and Remarks on Duelling.

It would appear from the many superstitions now existing among the Maltese people, as if each one of the nations, who have governed their island for the last fifteen hundred years, had left impressed on the minds of its inhabitants at the time of their rule some singular belief in superstitious events. Coming, as these all have, down to the present day, a catalogue of several pages would hardly contain them. We will, therefore, content ourselves with naming only a few of the most important. If by any chance a sign appears in the Heavens, at all resembling the shape of a cross, it is thought by the Islanders, that some desperate calamity is shortly to follow. Such signs, it is said, were seen in 1813, a year now remembered for the sad ravages of the plague, and also in 1837, an equally sorrowful year, from the thousands who died of the cholera. When the comet made its appearance, only a few months ago, the people of the casals left their houses, their shops and their fields, to fly to their churches to pray. And it was not until they were told by many respectable persons from Valetta, that they had nothing to fear, that they would rise from their knees and return to their duties again. During the three weeks that the comet was seen, the weather was uncommonly boisterous. The wind blew a gale from the Eastward, and the squalls, as they passed over the Island, discharged their torrents of rain. Truly the dense black clouds looked lowering enough, and the conduct of the ignorant villagers at such a time, in running to their altars for protection, is not to be wondered at. When first we saw this comet, we were on board of an Arab boat, and going down with a stiff breeze from Cairo to Atef. We had just seen the sun go down, a magnificent sight, which we will leave St. John to tell, when our naked captain pointed to another quarter of the heavens, and told us to look. This he had hardly done before he was on his face in prayer, as were all the rest of his crew. Even the helmsman, in his fright, fell on his knees and left us to take his place, where we stood watch for an hour, though we remained on deck for the night. "Poets and travellers, (says St. John,) speak with enthusiasm of the sun-sets of Italy, Switzerland and Greece. I have seen the sun go down in each of those countries, but never with half the splendor which on this day accompanied his disappearance; and could I succeed in reflecting upon the reader's imagination half the grandeur of this gorgeous show, he would unquestionably concur with me in thinking that, but for its evanescent nature, it was far more worth a voyage to Egypt even than the Pyramids. No sooner had the sun's disk disappeared behind the Libyan desert, than the whole western sky along the edge of the horizon assumed a color which, for want of a better term, I shall call golden: but it was a mingling of orange, saffron, straw color, dashed with red. A little higher, these bold tints melted into a singular kind of green, like that of a spring leaf prematurely faded; over this extended an arch of palish light, like that of an aurora borealis, conducting the eye to a flush of deep violet color, which formed the ground work of the sky on to its very darkness. Through all these semi-circles of different hues, superimposed upon each other, there ascended, as from a furnace, vast pyramidal irradiations of crimson light, most distinctly divided from each other and terminating in a point; and the contrast between these blood-red flashes and the various strata of colors which they traversed, was so extraordinary, that I am persuaded no continuation of light and shade ever produced a more wonderful or glorious effect." It was from such a sight as this, that we raised our eyes on the evening of the sixth of March, 1843, to look at another heavenly show, which was far more remarkable, and still more beautiful. An Egyptian sunset may be seen many times in a month, but such a comet, in a clear blue Egyptian sky, not once again in a century. All our fears of the plague, all our trials, troubles, peats and sufferings during our stay in Egypt, are not to be thought of in comparison with our enjoyment for only the five first minutes after we took the helm of that Arab boat. If to see a sunset from the Libyan desert is worth a voyage to Egypt, where would St. John have gone to see the sight we saw? For the seven successive nights that we were on board the French steamer, from Alexandria to Malta, we were always on deck for a half hour to see the comet, though it never appeared as brilliant at sea as it did on the Nile. After our arrival on this tufa rock we found it gradually fading away, until, on the fourth or fifth of April, it had wholly disappeared. With its departure the Maltese peasantry forgot their prayers and recovered their courage.

We are told by Boisgelin, that the Islanders, in former times, thought that May was an unfortunate month; so much so that they would not cut a coat, for fear it would not fit, neither build a house, for fear it would never be let. Happy are we to say that the men of this day are wiser in their generation; that they will either work or build, if they have the order, or the wherewithal to do it, whether it is in December or May. We hope it will not be long before many other idle superstitions will be done away with. How is the howling of a dog to bring death in a family? 'Tis true, that the Maltese in entertaining this belief are not alone. Many persons in England, Ireland and America will tremble at this dismal sound, who never trembled before. How is the killing of a serpent which is found in a man's dwelling, to bring affliction on the person who does it? And how is the lighting of a small insect, of a black color, on a man's body to cause his dissolution? These are all silly, idle fears, and should be rooted out of the public mind. Another ridiculous superstition, that of a belief in an "evil eye," is now to receive our attention. The Sicilians and Romans have written volumes to prove that it does exist, and in Greece it is believed to this day. If a traveller, passing through a Greek town, stops to admire a beautiful infant, the mother will spit in its face, to counteract any sinister effect which this admiration might otherwise cause. The credence given by the Maltese to this superstition, will be illustrated by the following incidents.

A baker who had established him in business to bake English bread, biscuit and cakes, was, a short time after he opened his shop, suddenly taken ill. Thinking some one was envious of him on account of his success, (for certainly he took in several scudes in a day,) he at once declared, on taking to his bed, that he had been struck with an "evil eye." Not knowing how to rid himself of its effects, he was advised to consult with his confessor. The reverend father observing the delusion under which his patient was suffering, humored him in it for a time, that he might the sooner recover. It chanced to be on the evening of a festal day, when the priest was called, and fortunately it was for the baker, as the floors of all the churches had been covered with leaves, which, though they may be trodden under foot while the services are being performed, are nevertheless, when they are finished, thought by some to be sacred. After the confessor had repeated his prayers, a basket of these leaves was brought in the room where the ill man was lying and thrown in a copper saucepan. The doors and windows were then closed, and a shovel of coals thrown on them, the priest at the same time retiring, and as he left, saying to the baker, "now my son be quiet, and bear your smoking patiently." As this was rather a dangerous remedy, the inmates of the house remained in the entry, to be near when they were wanted. It was not long before a stifled cough was heard, and then a cry for help, which was immediately answered by opening the door and running to the ill man's assistance. On the confessor's entering and telling his patient that he had nothing more to fear from his enemies, he arose from his bed, saying he felt much better, and at an early hour on the following morning was seen at his shop kneading and baking his dough again. That an ignorant baker should believe in an "evil eye" is certainly not much to be wondered at, and had this been the only case with which we are acquainted, we should have never given it publicity. But it is far different. This superstition is too generally credited by all classes of the Maltese people. Strange as it may seem, the lawgiver on the bench and the boatman in his bark alike give credence to this unmeaning belief. We give another instance. A gentleman is now living in Malta who holds a most trustworthy situation and is by marriage and birth connected with the first families in the Island. Mr. S. is supposed to be afflicted with an "evil eye," and to prove it the following stories are told. Not a long time ago this gentleman was walking in the country with two of his children, when he met with Mr. L., a wealthy merchant, who was approaching him on horseback. As he was passing, Mr. S. observed, "indeed you are a fortunate person to be able to ride where so many are obliged not only to walk, but to do so barefoot, over such rough and stony roads." Hardly had this remark been made and the parties got twenty yards apart, (which distance we suppose it was necessary they should be from each other to enable the "evil eye" to work on the horse,) when the animal suddenly reared and threw his rider, who broke his arm by the fall. Unfortunately this was not the only accident which occurred on this occasion, for as the horse was going at full speed he ran against a cart of cabbages which he upset as well as the driver. The poor man was so much injured, that instead of going with his load to market he was carried on a litter to the hospital, where he was kept a long time before his wounds were sufficiently healed to enable him to return to his country again.* A crowd soon gathering around the sufferers, various inquiries were made to know how the accident had happened. The poor countryman could only say that he had been pitched from among his baskets of vegetables and brought to the ground by a runaway horse. Not so, however, with Mr. L., for he declared in a loud and nervous voice, that there was not "a quieter animal in the whole Island than the one which he was riding, and that it was the "evil eye" of Mr. S. alone which had brought his misfortunes upon him." It so chanced that a friend of the gentleman thus spoken of was present among the crowd, and though as far as his own feelings were concerned, he was disposed not to notice this cutting remark, still he felt obliged to do it for the sake of his friend.

Something like the following conversation is reported to have taken place on this occasion.

Friend. "Is not this a public road, and has not Mr. S. as good a right to walk here as any one else has to ride?"

Mr. L. "Most certainly he has, though I think it should not be longer permitted."

Friend. "You say it was Mr. S.'s 'evil eye' which caused you to fall. Did you not see him approaching before you met?"

Mr. L. "Certainly I did."

* Most absurdly does a Maltese call the village where he was born his country, though it may be built on a barren spot, and have but five or six miserable hovels within its narrow limits.

Friend. "Then why did you not turn your horses head and thus avoid him?"

Mr. L. "For the very charitable reason that I did not wish to hurt his feelings, which I now confess, I was a fool for observing."

Friend. "If from a false sense of delicacy you will run into danger, you can surely have no one to blame but yourself."

With this the conversation ended, as Mr. L. was taken home by his friends, where he remained for several weeks confined to his bed, and suffering so much from his shattered limb as at one time seriously to threaten his life. So firmly are the people persuaded that Mr. S. was the cause of this accident, that it will doubtless often be mentioned by the superstitious to prove their belief in an "evil eye" long after the actors in it have passed away and their names have been lost to memory. In all societies it is no difficult task to find men who are prone to talk too much. Persons who, to monopolize the most of the conversation, are compelled to speak not only of past, and passing events, but to foretell what may come for the future. When people are thus all the time predicting, it would be singular indeed if they did not for once, or twice, or even thrice, prove right in their predictions. We will not say that Mr. S. is a person of this character, or that he has met with this success. If rumor speaks correctly, this gentleman once went into the house of a friend, and seeing some gold fish in a glass globe, was struck with their size, and their brilliant and beautiful color. His admiration, we are told, had such an effect on the fish, that he had hardly taken his leave, before they turned on their backs, came to the surface and died. Singular as this incident is said to be, it is not more remarkable than the one which we are now to tell.

Mr. S. was playing whist one evening at the house of a friend, and a gentleman learned in the law was his partner in the game. A Maltese officer and, we believe, a foreign consul were his opponents. When the cards were being dealt, Mr. S. remarked, "it is a long time, Judge, since you have had a trial for a capital offence, but I do not think many days will elapse before some one, or other, will be at the bar to be tried for his life."

Judge. "I certainly hope not."

Officer. "Pray, Mr. S., what is to happen, that such is your opinion?"

Mr. S. "In the common course of events it can not be long. Seldom do twelve months go round, without our having a trial for murder."

The conversation now ceased as the cards were assorted, and by the laws of the game which these gentlemen were playing, when this was done, each person at the table was obliged to be silent. Mr. S. made this prediction just before the carnival time—for the Maltese, like all other Catholic nations, have this festival, which comes in the months of February or March and always lasts three days.

It is an ancient and a popular festival with the Islanders, having been observed by their fathers and themselves for the last three hundred years. Intended, as it doubtless was, as a season of relaxation, of gayety and amusement, when Malta was ruled by the Knights, the people looked forward to its approach with pleasure, and engaged in its frivolities most cordially. But how different is it now. For the last three-and-forty years the Maltese have been governed by protestant rulers, who have done all in their power to dampen its gayety and destroy its hold on the public mind. Sometimes, a few handfuls of comfits have been thrown from the palace windows on the dense and gaping crowds below, but this is all which the governors have done to encourage the rabble to perform their wild and foolish pranks.* 'Tis true, that now and then a ball has been given by his Excellency on the second night of carnival. This, however, did not take place in honor of the festival, but because a rigid fast for six weeks was approaching, during which time the Maltese ladies withdraw themselves from society, and attend only to the duties of their church. After the expiration of Lent, the weather usually becomes so oppressive, that the very thought of dancing is said to be enough to throw an English woman into a profuse perspiration. Although we should not judge that such was the case, by the usual conduct of Saxon women at picnics and parties in the summer time, still we are aware that many fond mothers have declined invitations from the natives, by saying that their daughters were delicate girls, who could not waltz in a furnace, as a ball-room at Malta literally was after the month of May. Thus, what with the delicacy of English women, and the religion of the Maltese, if the governor did not give his ball in carnival, it would not be such a popular squeeze as he always seemed anxious to make it. We have said thus much on this subject, as we are desirous that the true reason should be known why this rout takes place on the night that it does.

The carnival season at Malta is too often seized upon by the dissolute to ridicule and slander well-known persons, who, either from their public, or private acts, have become disliked by the people. Perhaps we shall be told, that this is natural enough in a small town, where there are so many grades of society, and in each of them so much jealousy, animosity and strife. But should this be sanctioned by the government, merely because the parties are obnoxious to them, and have become so only on political grounds? Certainly not. It is high time, that an exhibition like that which we shall now describe should be prevented by the police, and the actors be taken in charge for breaking the public peace. Nearly every year a worthless fellow puts on a lady's habit, and mounting a horse, passes through the streets with a companion, who is drest in the height of fashion. This couple appear to be engaged in a deep conversation, and the subject of the sham lady's thoughts is told by some words like the following, which are spoken sufficiently loud for the rabble to hear.

Lady. "I can assure you, Mr. T., I feel a deep interest in the welfare of the Maltese people."

Mr. T. "I do not doubt it, Madam, neither can any one else."

Lady. "Some malicious persons have said, that my husband's high position as a Royal Commissioner, and what is much more important to him, his high salary, influence me in my good feelings towards them."

Mr. T. "I can assure you, Madam, that no such expression has ever been made in my presence. It is a vile slander, by whomsoever said."

With this the lady appears to be satisfied; for, separating from her companion, she is observed to smile while arranging her dress, which, ridiculous enough, is all in her lap. Mr. T., who is in love with a dark eyed belle of Valetta, is anxious to continue the conversation, that he may know how much longer he is to be employed on the commissioner's staff. Approaching, he asks, "pray can you tell me what measures are to be adopted for the relief of this nation?"

Lady. "No course has yet been decided upon. One thing, however, is certain, that the present distress is occasioned by an overgrown population, and so long as marriages are sanctioned among children, so long will the people remain in their miserable and degraded state."

Mr. T. "Cannot the commissioners legislate in their social relations, and thus prevent these early marriages?"

Lady. "In such delicate matters I can only interfere. I have already visited many villages and mingled much with their inhabitants. But I fear it has been to little purpose; for after I had exerted myself to persuade mothers not to let their children marry before they came to the age of womanhood, I was invariably answered in some such way as this. 'My good lady, your remarks are very true, but I was married at twelve, and before I was thirteen, had given my husband a child. Why should not my daughters do the same? They have the same feelings, and the same wishes as I had at their age. My parents did not interfere with me, and why should I with them?' This is their reasoning, and I can assure you it will be almost impossible to change a custom which appears to tend to little else than to marry and starve."

Mr. T. "The priests, I think, sanction these early marriages, and if so, your labors are lost."

Lady. "I am well aware that the opposition we meet with comes only from them. Did they but sanction my wishes I should not despair."

Forty or fifty ragged boys, carrying flags with various inscriptions, were following in the train of these vulgar masks, and on a given signal would send forth their shouts in applause of their conduct. It will hardly be credited, that by this exhibition it was intended to ridicule Mrs. Austen, who is so well known in England and America for her thorough acquaintance with the German and for the many correct and beautiful translations which she has given us from that difficult language. Yet such is the case. A few years ago two Royal Commissioners were sent out by Lord Glenely to look into the affairs of Malta, and to see whether the charges of the Maltese against their rulers were to be substantiated from personal observation. While Messrs. Austen and Lewis were thus engaged, (and it was no pleasing employment, for hardly could they make a move in a public way without making an enemy,) the wife of the former was trying to alleviate the miseries of her sex and discover some measures for its lasting relief. But all her exertions were useless. The Catholic mothers of this Island would not listen to the advice of a protestant woman, and for this reason, and this alone she failed. Mrs. Austen, for thus attempting to assist the mothers and daughters of Malta, and for suggesting a measure which all who wish well to the Islanders must justify, is annually made the vulgar character of a carnival, and ridiculed by the very dregs of the nation.* So distinguished a lady should not be thus disgraced.

Although we have so long lost sight of Mr. S. and his "evil eye," still the conversation at the whist table must be borne in mind, as it is supposed by the superstitious to bear on the tragical occurrence which we are ere long to relate. Singularly enough, the Maltese† think, that during their three days of noisy, wild, and foolish amusements, they can act as they please with a stranger and still have nothing done in return. Often have we seen a number of people in masks approach an English officer, and with loud cries, which very much resemble those of the wild Arabs of the desert, pelt him with peas, beans and sugar plums, until their stock was gone, or his patience exhausted. One fiery son of the Emerald Isle, who was unaccustomed to such a greeting, losing his temper, seized a person who was thus tormenting him, and tearing off the mask, recognized a lady with whom he was well acquainted. The gallant Irishman, regretting his rashness, quickly apologized for having thus rudely exposed the face of so lovely a woman to the prying gaze of a crowd of ignorant Smaitches.* This excuse was quite sufficient, for the young lady simply called it a carnival adventure, and went on her way to find another mask. But it is not often that an affair of this kind would have been so easily settled. In all garrison towns, the feelings of fathers and mothers are peculiarly sensitive as to the treatment which their wives, their daughters, or sisters receive from the officers who are stationed about them. And this is not without reason. In every regiment some young men will be found who, being of noble birth, and enjoying large incomes, are favored by their commanders, and left with little else to do, than to waste their money in gifts to giddy women, and their time in fulsome flattery. Unfortunate indeed are those ladies who are so much lost to themselves and their families as to receive their remembrances, or listen to their vows. For to such their ruin is sealed. How many instances might we name in this small town, where affection has been estranged, and the peace of families utterly destroyed by the thoughtless conduct of mothers and daughters, in listening to the protestations and receiving the presents of abandoned men. Is it not during the excitement of carnival, and when the parties are concealed by masks, that these first advances are usually made to married women, and these first liberties taken, with their, until then, innocent daughters? Is not this the season also when the libertine stalks about at noon-day, seeking whom he may ensnare, and when he is more successful than at any other period in his iniquitous search? These questions can only be answered in the affirmative. Then why, therefore, do respectable husbands and parents countenance a custom, which may so easily bring such affliction in their families, and such misery on themselves? Well do we remember the expression of the Turks of Constantinople and Smyrna, when they said of the carnival, in their grave way, that it was a time when the Franks were mad. And were they not correct? For what else is a carnival, whether it may be in Rome, in Naples, or Malta, but an allotted period, when persons are at liberty to think, to dress and act like very fools. Were a person to appear in public, at any other season of the year, disguised as a baboon with a long tail, or as Satan with his cloven foot, (which we have observed were two favorite characters,) would he not be thought mad? And were this same man to be examined by a medical board, we think it would be a difficult thing for him to prove, that he was not deranged, however correct his answers might be to their interrogations! For a much less foolish act, many persons have been placed under the guardianship of their friends, or confined within the walls of a lunatic asylum. Thus strange it is, that people are allowed to do those things with impunity for three days in a year, which, were they to be done at any other time, would bring the actors to a prison or a mad-house.

* A Maltese is called a Smaitch, in the same way, that an Englishman is called a John Bull, or an American, a Yankee.

Vieusseux, in his clever letters on Italy, tells us the following anecdote of the carnival at this Island, which is worthy of a relation, inasmuch as it shows with what spirit the Maltese and the monks alike engaged in this popular diversion, some sixty years ago. He states that a "Turk, who had been for some time a prisoner at Malta during the dominion of the Knights of St. John, after having been exchanged and sent back to Constantinople was examined before the Divan as to the strength of Valetta, and the most probable means of taking it. He replied, that he thought it almost impossible to conquer it as long as the Christians were on their guard, but," added he, "there is a time in the year when the infidels are subject to a periodical fit of insanity, (meaning the last three days of carnival, which was the only time allowed by the Grand-Master for that popular amusement,) and should the Capudan Pacha contrive to be near at hand with his fleet and a body of troops, I have no doubt but he could easily take the place by surprise, as all order and discipline are at an end during that period. But the business must be done quickly; for on the fourth day a priest applies a pinch of ashes to each man's forehead, which has the wonderful power of restoring him instantly to his senses and rational faculties." Vieusseux, in closing this anecdote, aptly remarks, "Si non e vero, e ben trovato."

THE PARENTS' LAMENT,

OVER THEIR CHILD, LOUISA OVERTON—

Sleep little blossom! we have spread
The dust above thy golden head;
Our latest kiss of love have prest
On marble cheek and sunken eye,
And poured beside thy place of rest
Our farewell prayer, our parting sigh!

Sweet little cherub!—deep our woe!
Thus early in the crumbling mould
To lay our precious treasure low—
Those eyes of light—those locks of gold!
We miss thy prattle and thy mirth
At evening by the social hearth,
We miss thy childish lisp, when all
Our youthful group surrounds the board;
—Thou only silent to our call,
When bread is shared and cup is poured!

Though silent—yet thy tones still come
From the dull chambers of the tomb;
Though silent, that soft voice hath yet
An echo we may ne'er forget.
In the deep silence of the night
It whispereth in accents light.
On fancy's ear that airy call
Seems like an angel-sigh to fall,

Murmuring sweet words as softly clear,
As ever lisped in mortal ear.

Methinks, amid the seraph band
I see thy shining wings expand;
Methinks, in heavenly depths serene
From radiant clouds I see thee lean,
Thy thoughts upon this earth intent,
Thy gaze upon thy kindred bent,
Wafting to them from worlds of bliss
The seraph hymn, the spirit kiss;
Still watching with delighted gaze
Thy earthly sisters at their plays,
And mingling still, thyself unseen,
In all their sportings on the green;
Still breathing in their hearts a prayer
From the pure upper realms of air;
Still loving, when they sink to sleep,
Above them on soft wings to sweep;
Breathing out tidings of that world
Where thy bright pinions are unfurled;
And beck'ning to the way that leads
Through blissful realms and heavenly meads,
To worlds that have no ain nor stain—
No anxious hearts, no dying pain!

Can we forget thee? Can the bloom
Of our sweet floweret in the tomb
Fade from our hearts and leave no trace
Within the memory of our race?
Though lowly lies thy fragile frame,
Yet in our hearts the living flame
Of love enkindled by thy hand
Dies not, by pure affection fann'd!

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

No. I.

The Messenger has always devoted itself to the support of the great general interests of the Country, involving no party altercations. Its large size has enabled it to do this without the least disparagement to the interest of the general reader, who can always find matter adapted to his taste. But who is there so indifferent, so ungrateful as not ever to feel a lively interest in our gallant Army and Navy? When their services are demanded, every eye and heart are turned towards them, with hope, confidence and pride. In Peace, then, let them receive that interest and attention, which may prepare them to act most efficiently and incite them to the noblest efforts in times of danger. But apart from their importance in a national point of view, a Literary Journal should lend them its aid, because they contain so much literary spirit and taste; and their members have done so much for the production and illustration of our Literature. The Messenger, then, will continue to uphold their rights and interests and invites them to assist in maintaining and advancing it.—[Ed. Mess.]

An army is a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man.—Locke.

TO THE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON:

The distinguished part you have acted in the councils of our nation—the devotion you have exhibited to its general welfare—the untiring industry which has ever characterized your public career, and the important position you have so long occupied as a leading member of our military committee in the United States Senate, where you have never failed to advocate the true interests of the service, induce me to claim your attention to a few "Notes on our Army." In these notes I shall "nothing extenuate, nor ought set down in malice." I wish it understood, that I am free from all political and party prejudices,—uninfluenced by any private animosity, or personal dislikes, and unknown, personally, to most of those whose acts I shall examine. My object is the correction of abuses which have gradually crept into our service, unnoticed, because unimportant in themselves, and producing but slight injury until, for want of a check, their rapid and almost unaccountable increase has proved a burden under which our system must sink, unless a remedy is applied. And to whom can I so properly apply for that remedy as yourself? A statement of the abuses under which we suffer, will be all I shall presume on calling your attention to, on that head. A few comments, however, on the practical operation of existing laws and regulations, and suggestions as to the amendments and additions they require, founded on observation and experience, will not, I conceive, be out of place—and may lead to some improvements in our present imperfect and almost disorganized military establishment.

"Impossibilities must become possible" before we can expect the President, his Secretary of war, (as at present selected,) or Congress, to be acquainted with all the details of our military organization and duties, and the manner in which the one is kept up and the other performed. And since this information cannot be obtained from the reports of the Bureaux, (whether suppressed from policy or negligence, it is not my province to inquire,) a plain statement of facts, accompanied by a few comments, will enable the public to judge whether they receive an equivalent in return for their annual expenditures; and whether the patronage delegated by them is used solely for the benefit of the country, or whether private interests, political power and family connexions have a controlling influence.

The office of "Secretary for the department of war" was established by a law of Congress, approved on the 7th of August, 1789. This law requires, that "he shall perform and execute such duties as shall, from time to time, be enjoined on, or entrusted to him; by the President of the United States. * * * And furthermore, that the said principal officer shall conduct the business of the said department in such manner as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, order and instruct." There is no such idea conveyed in the above extract from the law, nor did Congress ever intend to convey an idea that the Secretary should, nor did it expect he ever would, assume the military command and control of the Army. If such had been the intention of Congress, why did it afterwards provide for a "Major General Commanding" as the Hon. Secretary is pleased to style him! In establishing the department of war and creating the office of Secretary, Congress contemplated relieving the executive from the annoyance of details: in other words, they intended him to perform for the executive, duties analogous to those performed by the Adjutant General for the Commander-in-Chief.

When do we ever hear of the Secretary of State taking upon himself to issue instructions to a foreign minister, without the express commands of the President, and so stating in his despatches? Yet, how often does our Hon. Secretary of war inflict long orders and circulars on us which carry convincing proof in their own folly, that he, and he alone, is responsible for them.

The whole intention of the above quoted law has been entirely perverted, and we are now supplied with a political commander—a civilian Secretary, whose aim is popularity, and who knows no more about the details of military duty and the requirements of the service, than a soldier does of the practice of medicine, or a lawyer of the science of fortification. The annual report lately rendered by this officer proves this assertion but too clearly. Surrounded by the Staff Bureaux in Washington, all of which have chiefs, active and energetic in sustaining themselves and those under them, he seems to have forgotten there was any other Army, or, at least, any that required, or was worthy of his attention. After a long and tedious extract from the Army Register, to inform the President and Congress where to find his great Army, a very necessary piece of information by the way, he comments at large on each of the Staff Bureaux. One is "efficiently organized and faithfully administered," whilst "its importance is manifest to all military men." He forgets, if he ever knew, that half the duties of this department are performed by line officers, for which they receive no compensation.

"The attention of the officers to their duty," in a second staff corps, "has been assiduous." So one would naturally suppose from a reference to the Army Register, by which it will appear that five sixths of them are living at their ease in large cities, receiving emoluments sufficient for their comfortable support over and above what is considered as pay, and of which they receive more than officers of the same rank in the line. It would be a curious document for reference if Congress would call on the Secretary for the names and rank of all the officers of the Army with a statement annexed to each showing the amounts of money received from the treasury and for what, during the year 1843. The officers of a third staff corps receive high commendation for having promptly "accounted for the money placed in their hands:" * * * * * "the value of property under charge of this branch of the service is $17,393,021.07, and in itself shows the amount of pecuniary responsibility in which the officers who have it in charge are involved." "The officers who have it in charge!" What a great pity for these meritorious and deserving gentlemen, that this same impertinent little Register shows that nearly every arsenal, armory and dépôt is supplied with a store-keeper, a civil officer, who has all the responsibility of this valuable property. However, the Hon. Secretary only says "the officers"—not the officers of this corps "who have it in charge." The vast importance of each of these staff corps is commented on at large, and one is almost convinced that Napoleon would have carried the day at Waterloo had he only known what the world now learns from the late report of the Secretary of war. He says: "In regard to the staff of the Army, it may be laid down as a sound rule, that it should never be regulated by the number of troops in the line, but by the extent of country over which the Army is spread." What might have been the consequences with an Army of "Deputy Quarter Master's General" and "Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels, and Majors" of "Ordnance and Topographical Engineers," the wisdom of man cannot decide. The present crowned heads of Europe should congratulate themselves that this grand military discovery was not made in an earlier age. Can it be that the recent threats of war against Mexico have been based on the conceived invincibility of these lately discovered engines of power—Staff Corps?

The Hon. Secretary in his report, if we omit the copious extracts from the Army Register, and the recapitulation of the requirements of the law of August, 1842, has very condescendingly devoted seven lines of ordinary newspaper length to the line—the Army proper.

We are indebted to the wisdom and sagacity of Mr. Calhoun for our Bureau organization, which has been recently and advantageously adopted for the Navy. But had he foreseen the results it has produced, he would have preferred ———"to bear the ills we have,

Than fly to others we know not of,"

Had Mr. Calhoun remained at the head of the department, such results as we now deplore would not have followed his admirable suggestions; and, should the office of Secretary of war be in future conferred upon men of known military attainments, or on those possessing the untiring energy and transcendent abilities of Mr. Calhoun, the system may again be made to work well.

As at present ruled, we have a nominal Commanding General who, if he wish to prescribe the length of an officer's or soldier's whiskers or mustaches, must apply to the Hon. Secretary of war for his decision, (see circular from the Adjutant General's office, dated Washington, 31st May, 1843.) The authority of this Commanding General, by courtesy, over the different staff corps is about as great as it is over the United States district courts. If the Secretary of War is to supersede the Commanding General in his duties, why not dispense with that office? It would relieve the treasury of a heavy charge, some $7000 a year, and in a short time render the whole Army so obnoxious as to produce an entire re-organization or disbandment, the latter of which even would be preferable to permitting it to remain in its present condition. But I would suggest whether the office of Secretary of War might not be abolished with more propriety, after being vacated by the present incumbent whose further researches may be followed by results which will redound to the honor of his country, and place him on an equality with the renowned Don Quixote.

The 2nd section of the law establishing the department of war, approved 7th August, 1789, provides: "That there shall be in the said department an inferior officer, to be appointed by the said principal officer, to be employed therein as he shall deem proper, and to be called the chief clerk in the department of war, and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books and papers appertaining to the said department." During the last summer, when the Secretary was on a tour to New England, his duties were devolved on a young man, a subordinate clerk in the Indian Bureau, who may or may not be a relation of the Hon. Secretary. The fact of both possessing the same name has created suspicion. The only very distinguished act of this young gentleman was the issuing an order, on assuming the duties of the office, directing the Commanding Officer of one of our forts to fire a salute in honor of the President of the United States, who, if no accident occurred, would pass on a railway within about three miles of the fort at, or about a certain hour. The intention of the above law is very plain, and it seems strange that one who has graced the Bench should so easily misunderstand it.

I cannot forbear to extract from a foreign journal a few lines which apply with much force to our service. A correspondent, speaking of a civil Secretary, says, "Within the precincts of his own circle of acquaintances he will never meet the worn and disappointed regimental officer, or have his better feelings touched by the sad spectacle of a widow lady and her orphan children, reduced, in one moment, from comparative comfort to the very verge of poverty and despair. His associates and friends are amongst the wealthy and fortunate members of the service: he sees, indeed, amongst them the marks of severe wounds, and traces on the countenance the ravages of hardship and climate,—but, at the same glance, his eye rests on the brilliant star and medal on the breast," (an additional badge for a brevet in our service,) "and his mind reverts to the pay and pension which, in these instances, a grateful country has bestowed on her well deserving soldiers." Such is literally the case with us. The only information which our Secretary can communicate is second-handed, and, as he is so situated as to be daily, almost hourly, in constant intercourse with these staff gentlemen, it is not at all astonishing that their interests and their fame alone are trumpeted by him. I appeal to you whether such should be, and whether it shall be.

LINES BY A FATHER ON THE DEATH OF A CHILD.

(ADDRESSED TO THE MOTHER.)

Hid art thou in the dark grave—William!
In vain thy mother longs to press thee;
In vain, thy father to caress thee;
But not in vain in prayer they bless thee,
They fondly trust—my darling boy!

Hush'd is thy voice's prattle—William!
But list! that cry, that thrilling tone—
My slumber's fled—the dream is gone:
But not in vain thy accents join
Th' angelic choir—my darling boy!

Sealed are thy soft blue eyes—William!
We mourn in vain their early night,
In vain call back their joyous light:
But not in vain their radiance bright
Shines still in Heaven—my darling boy!

Gone is the flush of thy cheek—William!
In vain would we recall its bloom,
Its kindling beauty, from the tomb:
But, cheering hope! He will relume
Its cherub-hues, my darling boy!

Young and innocent wert thou—William!
Then cheer thee, love! nor wait thy lot;
For "of such my kingdom is" He taught,
He kindly greets and forbids him not,
Our angel-babe—our darling boy!

THE IRISH EXILE.

BY THOMAS DUNN ENGLISH.

Dear was the cabin which stood in the valley,
The cot of my fathers, the home of my youth,
Green trees were round it where breezes might dally,
And lovers might whisper affection and truth.
Soon came the SASSENACH, bitter and bloody;
Around us the red-coated minions were poured;
Cottage so lovely and children so ruddy,
The one fed the torch and the other the sword.

Crush us they may, but we still must remember
The wrongs of our country, the death of our sires;
Brooding in silence while memory each ember
Shall fan 'till they kindle to terrible fires.
Then shall the moment arrive when the cruel,
Who struck without pity, our rage shall pursue;
Then shall our Erin, our heart's only jewel,
Make bare to the stranger LAMBH GERRY ABOO!*

Hasten the time when from slumber arousing
Our land from the scabbard shall draw the red brand,
Scatter the tyrants who now are carousing,—
And strike right and left with a terrible hand.
Then shall the sun-burst awaken a glory
O'er mountain and valley, o'er river and sea;
Then shall the land that is written in story,
Be mate to her masters, be glorious and free.

THE ENCHANTED GIFTS.

BY MRS. JANE L. SWIFT.

In the days when magic was practised in Persia, there lived in Ispahan a wise and skilful magician, whose name was Kabulneza. He had spent a long life in acquiring the secrets of his art, and was consulted in omens and auguries by even the monarchs of the East. He was a counsellor of princes; and no chief, who could gain access to him, would commence any undertaking of importance, without first having recourse to his cabalistic lore, and his enchanted spells. But he had never made a bad use of the power which he possessed; and knew little about evil genii, excepting as he invented charms to repel their baleful approach.

With all his art, however, he was unable to resist the influence of time, or to ward off the stroke of death; and when he had reached his eightieth year he prepared for the event, which he expected at a certain moment. His auguries proved true; and on the last day that he had to live, he sent for his brother's four sons, who were all young men just entering upon the duties and cares of life. He had loved them well, and they had been educated by him in the ancient lore of their land; but he had not initiated them into the mysterious spells by which he exercised so mighty an influence over mind and matter. He knew, too, the bias of their minds, and by his dying instructions he wished rather to leave them a salutary token of his regard, than to bestow upon them the dangerous art he exercised.

As with unfeigned sorrow they approached the dying magician, their eyes fell upon the articles that were placed on a small table before him; a golden purse, a silver wand, a ruby heart, and a magic glass.

"I have sent for you, my sons," said the sage, "to bestow upon you a portion of what I have to leave. You have seen me rich, powerful, beloved and happy; at least, as much so as mortal can be. Here are the means, but I cannot give them; you must choose, and in the order of your birth. Neither may I advise you in your choice; your own inclinations must prompt your decisions."

"The glass will be for me," thought the youngest, as he looked with a sigh upon the other glittering treasures, and regretted, for the first time, that nature had not bestowed the privilege of seniority upon him.

Elmana, the eldest, came forward; and bending on one knee said, "I choose the purse, father." "As I thought, Elmana, you have chosen what you imagine will procure all that your heart sighs for; it is yours, but yours to use and not to abuse. While that purse is in your possession, you have but to wish for the gold that you desire, and it will fill your coffers at your bidding. But the purse may be lost, or stolen from you; there is no spell to guard it from accidents like these."

The second, Haladdin, eagerly pointed to the ruby heart, "give me that, father," he exclaimed, with a glowing cheek. A smile passed over the countenance of the sage as he said, "You would try its power over the beautiful Kezia; is it not so, Haladdin?" The youth blushed and spoke not. "Take it, my son, and while it remains with you, it will enable you to possess the heart of her you love; but remember, that it may be lost, and nothing can replace it."

The third, in his turn, came forward and chose the wand. "Your spirit, Hazif, is a high and noble one, but this will prove a dangerous gift unless used with discretion. It will give you power when you wish to exercise it; power to sway the minds of others—but the wand may be broken, it is for you to guard it well."

With downcast eye the favorite nephew of the seer bent at his feet and said, "This glass is mine, father, without right of choice; but I shall value and keep it in remembrance of you. When I am old, I may need it." "Not so, Riezzin, it is for the young, as well as for the aged; and if I had my life to live over again, I would choose, my son, what by chance has fallen to you. This glass will enable you to view every thing in life through a true medium; but you must guard it and keep it bright. You will find it a greater treasure than you deem it now."

"And now, farewell my sons. The shades of death are gathering round me, and I go to the home of my fathers. Remember the advice of Kabulneza, and cherish his memory when there is nothing left to you but his tomb."

* * * * *

Quarter of a century had elapsed; and the name of the magician no longer resounded through the length and breadth of the land. He had gone down with his generation into the vale of forgetfulness; and slept, undisturbed, in the tomb of his fathers. Others, skilled in the magic of their clime, arose to replace him; yet none acquired the influence over the wise and great that Kabulneza had succeeded in obtaining.

It was a gala day in the city of Ispahan. The sun had shed its last ray upon the gilded domes and minarets of the gorgeous capital; and as darkness drew her veil around, the glimmer of lamps gradually brightened the scene, until thousands of them glittered in the streets and squares. The city was illuminated to celebrate the accession of the recently appointed Vizier Azem* to his office. He had that day made his triumphal entry into the city, and had taken possession of the palace prepared for him.

* The Vizier Azem is the prime minister of Persia, or "the great supporter of the empire; as he alone almost sustains the whole weight of the administration."

From the balcony of his princely residence, the Vizier looked out upon the eager crowd anxious to do honor to the new favorite; while, undazzled by the splendid career that seemed to open before him, he calmly listened to the seductive tones of flattery, and turned away with a smile from the obsequious attention of his followers. He was a man about five-and-forty years of age, tall and commanding in his form, with a mild, benignant expression of countenance, that seemed as if it had never been ruffled by the contending passions that so soon grave their deforming furrows in the brow.

As the night waned, festivity and revelry gave place to a profound stillness; and, at length, dismissing his attendants, the Vizier retired to an apartment that overlooked the gardens of his seraglio. The moon shone brightly in, and lent a softened beauty to the oriental magnificence of all that surrounded him. He had sought the quiet of the midnight hour to compose his excited mind, and to commune with his spirit on the eventful proceedings of the day. He had not long been there, when a veiled female glided quickly to his side, and before he was aware of her entrance, she had cast herself upon her knees at his feet, and was gazing with an expression of the deepest attachment into his face.

"Jewel of my heart!" murmured the Vizier, removing the veil, and stooping to kiss the fair, white brow; "more precious art thou to me than all my greatness. Yanina, beloved Yanina, thou hast shared the triumphs of this day with Riezzin; is it not so, my fairest?"

"As the parched flower drinks in the dew that nourishes it, so has the triumph of Riezzin refreshed the heart of Yanina."

"I knew it dearest; and amid all the pomp and parade of power, I did not forget my rose of beauty. How fair thou art, Yanina; fairer, it seems to me, than when first thy charms awoke the thrill of love within my soul. Time has dealt gently with thee, loved one; he has not marred one dear lineament."

"The rose is withered by the unkind frost; but there has been no wintry chill within our bower. The suns of ten summers have risen and set since I was thine, and yet thou lovest me, Riezzin?"

"Aye; as nature rejoices in the sunbeam; so does my spirit find its light in thee, Yanina."

"Dear Riezzin!" she murmured; and, rising, she stood before him in all the matured loveliness of female beauty. She was past the age when the women of the East are usually most attractive; but not one destroying trace of time was visible upon her countenance.

"I would be alone, Yanina, for a little while. I need composure. In an hour I will rejoin thee, dearest."

She left the apartment; and the Vizier resealed himself at the open window. The events of the day again passed before him. Honor, power, wealth, love, all were his. Step by step he had ascended the eminence of fame, and now he could look down from the summit, and trace the various means that had aided him in the ascent. The past rose before him with its many colored hues; years gone by seemed but as yesterday; and as he retraced the path of existence he felt as if he must be still a boy, so vivid were the reminiscences of his early youth. While he yet pondered on these things, he turned, and beheld the outline of a figure shrouded in a filmy haze, yet sufficiently distinct to present the semblance of a man.

"I have come to thee, my son," said the spirit, "in thy hour of triumph; dost thou know me, Riezzin?"

"Shade of Kabulneza! I welcome thee—though the chill of the tomb surrounds thee, and I tremble in thy presence, still, I welcome thee."

"Nay, stretch not out thy hand to grasp mine, Riezzin. The frame I once tenanted is mouldering in the dust; it is my spirit alone that is with thee now."

"What would'st thou, revered shade of him who was my best friend?"

"I have been permitted to revisit these earthly scenes, that I might learn what has befallen those I loved since I quitted this vale of tears. Tell me, Riezzin, have my dying gifts been blessings to thy brothers, as well as to thyself?"

"Alas! Kabulneza, they but betrayed my brothers to their destruction."

"I would know their fate, Riezzin, if thou may'st reveal the story of their lives."

"Thou knowest, father, that Elmana chose the purse. He was immediately surrounded by every luxury that wealth could procure. He denied himself nothing. He built palaces; he laid out gardens; he hired singing men and singing women: the costly wines of Shiraz sparkled at his board, and viands from distant realms were heaped upon his table. Gold was lavished among his dependents, as if it had been but the sand of the desert. He went to every extreme of indulgence; and injured his health, and enervated his frame by riot and excess. He lost the esteem of his friends, and consequently his self-respect. He sank lower and lower, until, one fatal evening, he fell asleep among his companions with the golden purse in his bosom. While he slept, it was stolen from him. To others, the purse was useless, excepting for the price its weight would bring; but to him it had become the alpha and omega of existence. He has sought it in vain for years; but, with an infatuation as vehement as it is fruitless, he still continues a wanderer on the face of the earth, expecting to recover his lost treasure. I have entreated him to resign the hope of finding it, and to begin a life of activity and usefulness; but those years of supineness and self-indulgence have prostrated his energies. With a body enfeebled by former excesses, and a min unfitted for employment, he will probably pass the remainder of his days in pining after the enjoyments which he abused, and which he can never expect will be his again."

"It is as I feared—but Haladdin—what use did he make of his gift, the ruby heart?"

"He soon succeeded in winning the affections of his first love, the beautiful Kezia. For a time, I thought my brother the happiest of mortals; he lived but in her smile, and serenity and bliss seemed to wait upon his steps. But, true to the fickleness of his nature, he soon wearied of one who had charmed him only by her beauty, and while her whole soul was devoted to him, he cruelly neglected her. Her very attachment to him tended to strengthen his growing dislike; but she was bound to him by that fatal spell, and the cast off leman only found repose in an early grave. Haladdin gave himself up to the worship of woman; and in that idolatry of the heart he wasted all the noble and high-toned energies of his nature. He could influence the love of the fairest with that ruby gift; and at last, it became the instrument of his destruction. He saw by stealth the flower of his sovereign's harem. To see, was to love—to love, was to obtain. By stratagems, their stolen meetings remained long unsuspected; but Haladdin became careless and confident, and his deluded victim could not know the fearful danger of her position. A spy of the Shah's household betrayed them; and the bow-string was the punishment of both."

"Alas! he was a youth of promise; unfortunately, wavering in his principles; yet I trusted that he would not have abused the gift he chose. But Hazif, the proud, the noble Hazif—what of him, Riezzin?"

"He did nobly, father, at first. He used the wand to advance himself in the councils of his country. He exerted his power for the benefit of others, and made himself a name and a reputation that outvied the great ones of our land. All bent before his talents; and his eloquence was like the breeze of heaven, bringing freshness and purity to the soul. His career was glorious, and would have been happy, but ambition gradually twined her fetters around him, and whispered, at length, accents of treason in his ear. I warned him; I entreated him to be content with the love and admiration of a people. I told him to beware how he stepped upon the paw of the sleeping lion. Reason availed not, when ambition lured; and I saw at length, with heart-felt sorrow, that the favorite of the Shah was suspected as a traitor. He was too popular to be destroyed at once, but he was banished from the land of his birth. He now finds a home on the confines of Arabia; and still possesses, I hear, the magic influence given him by the silver wand."

"He may retrieve the past, Riezzin; it is not yet too late. But tell me now, my son, the story of thy life."

"Behold thy gift, my father. The magic glass ever rests upon my bosom, and is guarded by a massive chain. When I first received it from thee I did not prize it, for I was disappointed in the allotment of thy gifts. I saw my brothers enter at once, without effort, into the possession of what each had sighed for; while I was left to toil and struggle in the world. I envied Elmana the wealth in which he revelled; I coveted the love of beauty; I yearned for the possession of power. I felt within me the aspirations of a proud and ambitious soul, but discontent of mind impaired my happiness. I was not willing to make use of the necessary means to advance my fortune, but wished that what I desired might come at my bidding as by the touch of an enchanter's wand. Envy of my brothers made me miserable, and in pining after some undiscovered good, I lost the precious amulet of content. The dark temptations of Eblis beset my path, until life became a burthen almost too grievous for me to bear. In despondence of soul, I invoked the angel of death to summon my spirit to his home; but Azrael was deaf to my entreaties, and I lived on during many moons a prey to vain regrets. But at length, O Kabulneza, I visited thy tomb, and as my tears fell upon the costly shrine, I remembered thy gift. Thy words arose to my memory, and I sought in haste the magic glass. After thy death, I grieve to say, it had been thrown aside in the disappointment of the moment, and for hours I searched for it in vain; but at last, amid a heap of rubbish, I found it. It was tarnished by neglect, and the glass was soiled and dim. However, I cleansed it; and then, invoking thy blessing, I looked through it. I beheld letters of gold, but they sparkled like the diamond with such dazzling brilliancy, that my eye could not at first bear the lustrous splendor, and around these letters streamed beams of light, that seemed to radiate until their outer circle reached the heavens. By degrees I was enabled to decypher the shining characters, which, as I read, were engraved upon my memory with magic power; and this, Kabulneza, was the transcript of that luminous and enchanted page—

"Pause, Riezzin—the rose of youth is on thy cheek, thy hand is strong, and thy frame vigorous. Life spreads itself before thee; thou art but on its threshold, its many paths are round thee, which to choose; but in supineness and regret thou art wasting thy strength in mourning after the shadow when thou mightst possess thyself of the substance. Wealth, love, power, confer not happiness, excepting as the mind is disciplined to make a good use of them; and the vicissitudes of life are intended for that discipline. Naught but sunshine will wither and blight the garden flowers; they must have clouds, and rain, and tearful dews. Youth is the season for effort. Employ then thy talents with all the energy of thy nature, and the bread that is earned by thy daily toil will taste sweeter to thee than the luscious viands which are heaped upon the table of Elmana. Win, by the consistency of thy principles and the purity of thy life, the respect of thy fellow men; and power, honorably acquired and nobly retained, may crown thy brow with greener laurels than Hazif will ever wear. Place the affections of thy manhood where they will meet with a pure return, for even in the harem's casket there may be found a precious pearl: yet, enervate not thy soul by the worship of beauty that may perish in an hour, and the rose of thy garden may bloom when that of Haladdin shall have passed away. Go forth then, to toil, to strive, to overcome, to endure. The warrior wins not the victory without the battle; the poet wears not the wreath without having won the prize. The world is man's battle ground, worthy of his destiny. Coward he, who faints ere the conflict is begun; and traitor to himself, if, when the first blow is struck, he dare not strike again. On! on! Riezzin; stay not to ponder, the angel of life weeps over every wasted hour.

"The golden characters disappeared, the dazzling light faded; and as I pressed thy gift to my lips, I felt that a veil had been lifted from my moral vision. I saw life for the first time through a true medium; but a partial glimpse, it is true, yet enough to point the stepping stone of my career. I waited only for the morrow's dawn; and, resuming the occupation of my father, I determined to excel as an artisan, and leave to destiny the shaping of my fortune. A load was lifted from my heart; my prostrate energies revived, my drooping hopes seemed to bud and blossom beneath the refreshing influence of high resolves, and in the useful exercise of my faculties, I found my nature invigorated and improved. I had no time for repining; and when at night I sought the restoring comfort of repose, my sleep was sweet, and undisturbed by the wild dreams of ambition. Once, the throb of envy and regret returned, when I beheld Elmana showering dinars of gold among the multitude thronging round him; but, looking through my glass, I read these words; 'Better is poverty with honor, than wealth with degradation.' I turned, and recoiled as I marked the reeling, staggering form of Elmana, and returning to my employment, I felt, in the approval of my own heart, a sense of happiness hitherto unknown.

"I need not dwell, Kabulneza, upon my rising fortunes. In the pursuit of my calling my wealth increased, and the warnings of the magic glass prevented my placing undue value upon worldly treasures. As the stream of time flowed on, the lessons thy gift imparted, added the weight of truth to my decisions, and before one gray hair had tinged these locks, the name of Riezzin was known throughout Persia. They said that the wisdom of Kabulneza had descended to me, and from the poor artisan, I became the wealthy, influential counsellor of princes. Success would have been my ruin; but with every accession to my wealth, or fame, I took thy gift from my bosom, and from it, I learned to be prosperous without exultation, and to be great without pride. It showed me that life was never a state of perfect happiness, or of unalleviated misery, and that contentment was the key that would open the secret treasure-house of earth. It reminded me that the great and the mighty must sleep at last with the lowly, and that none of the world's glittering baubles could be carried with us to the tomb. Thou seest, oh! Kabulneza, upon what an eminence I stand; dare I hope to sway with judgment and integrity the mighty destinies of this land? I tremble, lest, having attained the summit of my loftiest ambition, I should forget myself."

"The glass, the glass, Riezzin," murmured the departing shade; "it will warn and guide thee to the end of thy pilgrimage."

With reverential awe, the Vizier gazed once more through the enchanted glass, and these were the characters of light reflected from its surface.

"Success is the test of greatness. The moth is overpowered by the light of a taper; the eagle can gaze into the sun. If thou art truly great, Riezzin, thou wilt feel that pomp and power can never elevate the soul; it soars or sinks, as it is true or false to the nobler impulses of its nature. Thy position will have for thee no dangers, if thou wilt value rightly the elevation it bestows, and guard thy spirit from the treacherous whisperings of pride."

The Vizier turned to address the shade of Kabulneza, but it had disappeared, and the veiled form of the beloved Yanina again stood by his side.

THE BURIAL OF EROS.

BY HENRY B. HIRST.

Love lieth in his halls a corpse,
While, mourning, round his coffin, stand
The wan and pallid Feelings, like
Dim spectres from the shadow-land.
His nose is pinched, his lips are blue,
His once round cheeks are sunken in,
And heavily lie his clotted locks
Upon his yellow, waxen skin.
"Poor Love, dear Love," the mourners say,
"Tis sad that one so young should die."
Poor Love, dear Love, ah, dreary day
That seeth him in cold earth lie."

"He was a merry wight," saith one,
"But fond of mischief," saith another,
"And yet, despite his wayward ways," Quoth Hope, "I loved him as a brother.
He used to laugh and chat with me
For days, existing on my smiles,
I heedless of his many tricks—
There was such magic in his wiles."
"Poor Love, dear Love," the mourners say,
He was too good a lad to die."
And then uprose from every lip
A wild and weird and wailing cry.

"I never shall forgive myself,"
 Quoth Hope, "that I forsook the boy;
 Had I remained, those sightless eyes
 Would now be lit with life and joy."
 Quoth Grief, "no sooner had you gone,
 Than down he came and sat with me,
 Crying and sighing all night long,
 A very baby at my knee."
"Poor Love, dear Love," the mourners say,
"'Twas wrong in Hope to leave the boy,
Had she remained, this dreary day
Would be a day of golden joy."

Then spoke Despair, "from Grief he came
 To me, his eyes with fury wild;
 I took him in and cherished him,
 But soon a maniac grew the child;
 And then I took his quivering form
 And on my bosom made his bed,
 Nursing him with a mother's love
 Until he slumbered with the dead."
"Poor Love, dear Love," the mourners say,
"A weary vigil was Despair's,
Her's was the mother's gentle watch,
And her's the mother's many cares."

They screwed Love's coffin cover down
 With many a sigh and many a tear,
 And placed him, heavily of heart,
 Upon his plumed, ebon bier,
 And rung them in double line,
 (How did the plumes and weepers wave!)
 They bore him from his lonely home
 And laid him in his silent grave.
The bell is tolled—the mass is o'er—
The prayers are said—the service done—
And all are gone, save Hope, who weeps
By Love's untimely tomb alone.

LETTER FROM GIBRALTER.

(TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.)

We anchored off Gibraltar, last evening, almost at the instant when the guns of the forts were giving the signal for closing the gates of the city, and the only passengers who obtained permission to land were some English officers, arriving, like ourselves, from Lisbon. All the other passengers had to sleep on board and to await, this morning, the arrival of certain gentlemen, dressed in black, whom we might have taken for the Councillors of some Spanish real audiencia, so grave and serious was their deportment, if we had not been informed that they were the members of the numerous family of the licitadores of Gibraltar who came to offer us their services. As no stranger is allowed to enter the city unless an inhabitant becomes his security, these gentlemen carry out this police arrangement and pass their lives in becoming answerable to the authorities for almost all the strangers that touch at Gibraltar. They address you ceremoniously and, after the exchange of a few words, offer to present you to the police, to have a ticket of residence delivered to you (which must be renewed every fortnight) and, in short, to go security for your good behavior during the time you remain in the city, the whole for the present of a douro. If it happens that, from inattention, or some other cause, the traveller leaves Gibraltar without returning his ticket of residence to the sea-gate, his licitador is subject to a fine of two hundred douros, not to mention his being personally responsible for every thing that the individual whose security he is may have done contrary to law in the city. We were about to land, Count M... and myself, under the protection of these important personages, when my friend received a visit which greatly diverted us. The visitor was a Monsier Galiano, an old Genoese corsair, at present Greek consul at Gibraltar, who, apprised of M... 's arrival, came to honor in his person the son of King Otho's minister at the court of Madrid. After having offered him his services, the consul pulled his silk handkerchief out of his pocket, hoisted it on the end of his cane and began waving it, uttering genuine corsair cries in the direction of a Greek brig that was in the roads. He had already sent orders to the captain to hoist his flag in honor of M..., but the business not going on as quickly as he desired, the energetic and impatient old man now hastened it by every means in his power. "Eccola! eccola! là vedete, there, there do you see!" cried he at last, with an enthusiasm rare in a man of more than seventy years of age; in fact they had, at length, just hoisted the blessed Greek cross. Satisfied with having been so well obeyed, M. Galiano then placed his boat at our disposal, very courteously inviting us besides, to accept a good breakfast at his house, to which we did honor after we had put ourselves right with the authorities of the city. This latter, viewed from the sea, presents but a dull appearance, notwithstanding the cheerful color of its houses, painted outside in the Italian style. It lies like a selva on the western slope of the rock of Gibraltar, opposite Algeiras, and one feels as if oppressed at the first sight of this gigantic and attenuated peak, pierced in all directions with murderous mouths, and whose base is an immense battery constructed on a level with the sea. This melancholy feeling grows still stronger in the interior of the city; at every step is a sentinel with shouldered arms, who prohibits your stopping on the footwalks; and, with the exception of the sailors and soldiers, you see about you only a jumble of Jews from all the countries in the world, who survey you with a greedy eye and seem to be asking themselves if they can not make something out of you.

We were still at M. Galiano's when the sound of military music attracted me to the window; it was the guard going on duty, which, preceded by music, was proceeding to the Governor's palace. You know all my partiality for the English; ah, well! these red clothes, the sight of which was so agreeable to me in England, then made the same painful impression on me that every good Spaniard must feel when he sets foot in Gibraltar. I pass over, if you please, the surprise of Gibraltar in 1704, afterwards legalized by the treaty of Utrecht, and consider only the Gibraltar of our days, become since 1809, the great focus of English smuggling in Spain. You should see these bold and venturesome Andalusian smugglers petted, almost esteemed, by the authorities, prancing proudly through the streets of Gibraltar; in truth, one might take them for the lords of the city; and wo to the Spanish custom-house officers if, forgetting that Gibraltar no longer belongs to their country, they dare, in the ardor of their pursuit, to pass the line of the Campo Neutro, which marks on the isthmus the limit of the Spanish territory, or else to push their boats into the English waters. A boat of the custom-house of Algesiras happened, some years since, to follow into these waters a smuggler's felucca which it had vainly chased for more than a week. Without previous summons, the English cannon fired upon the custom-house bark and one of the crew was killed by the discharge. Nevertheless the smuggler's felucca was captured and carried off by the custom-house officers to Algesiras, where its cargo was sold. A whole year passed away after this event, when the smuggler, having adroitly found means to entice the custom-house officer who had captured him into Gibraltar, denounced him as guilty of an act of piracy against him. The officer was arrested and brought before the tribunals, who sentenced him to pay the smuggler the sum of three thousand duros under the name of damages and interest. Truly the English were in the right throughout this whole affair; so I have only mentioned it to you with a view to prove to what extent the presence of the English, at Gibraltar, favors this fatal smuggling, which is one of the principal causes, if not the chief, of the great immorality with which the population of the Andalusian coast is charged.

Here are some details respecting the regular organization which directs this illicit commerce, thanks to the connivance of a crowd of faithless agents. If the question for the smuggler is how to introduce, fraudulently, a cargo of foreign grain, he presents himself at the Seville custom-house and by means of a pot of wine, or two or three pesetas for each *fanèga of grain that he calculates on landing, he always succeeds in procuring a certificate of lading of Spanish grain for Malaga, or such other point on the coast as he points out. Fortified with this certificate, he repairs to Gibraltar with his vessel empty, buys as many fanègas of Odessa grain as he is thought to have of Spanish grain on board, loads it and then sets sail for Malaga. If the custom-house of this city opposes the landing of the cargo, alleging the quality of the grain, the smuggler coolly opens the certificate given him at Seville. In vain is the fraud evident to every body, the custom-house of Malaga is not the less compelled to let go its hold, in order to avoid an endless lawsuit with that of Seville, which would not miss taking its revenge at the first opportunity. When the price of grain reaches eighty reals, a fanèga, the law authorizes the importation of foreign grain into the provinces of Malaga, Seville, Grenada and Cadiz, but there is no example of its having ever been applied, the smugglers having always taken the first step.

The smuggling of tobacco and cotton goods has its avowed brokers, who are called corredores de contrabando. They are, in general, men faithful to their word, of approved courage, sometimes at peace, sometimes at war with the resguardo, the name by which the custom-house soldiers are designated. The corredor goes to Gibraltar to make his purchases, and then appears with his bark at the point on the coast to which he has already summoned the smugglers. These, at sight of the signals agreed upon, come out of the lurking places where they have kept themselves hid, hastily load their mules and then lead them to the parada, the place previously fixed upon for a general halt. All these operations are usually performed during the dark nights, and almost always under the eyes of the custom-house officers, who, for fear that the corredor may cheat them, come to ascertain upon the spot, if he respects the contract entered into with them. At the moment of landing the bales are truly enormous. As, according to the old custom, the seguro (the right of passing paid by the corredor to the resguardo) and the freight of the vessel are both paid according to the number of bales to be landed, whatever the size may be, the corredor is interested in making them of an extraordinary size; most commonly each bale, which, at the outside, ought to contain only half a mule's load contains a whole one; a single mule, however, carries two of them, not to mention that if the danger is pressing, the poor animals are frequently seen climbing the steepest mountains with loads, still greater. It is not until after the arrival of the convoy at the parada that the smugglers regulate the burdens of their mules for the road.

Usually the corredor pays for each bale on board an ounce of seguro to the custom-house officers and eight duros of freight to the captain of the vessel. The latter is bound to appear off the coast for three successive nights. If during this term the landing cannot be effected, form causes independent of the good will of the smugglers, he receives but half the freight and then returns to Gibraltar, where he waits until the corredor wishes to attempt a new expedition. Often the corredor attempts the landing at his own risk, à guerra y jarand, as the smugglers say. Then he surprises the custom-house forces, fights to the utmost, and his mules pass during the firing. The most courageous man of the company first loads his mule and his comrades concede him the dangerous honor of marching at the head of the column.

One fact, whose authenticity was vouched for to me, will prove to you what an immense share the agents of the custom-house have in the smuggling carried on upon the coast of Andalusia and their remarkable bad faith towards the poor smugglers. When the last insurrectionary movement took place at Malaga, one of the principal mercantile houses of this city offered the sum of eight thousand duros to the chiefs of the resguardo, on condition that they would allow them to land in safety, in the neighborhood of Laurin, a large quantity of English merchandise. The offer having been accepted, the sum was faithfully counted out to the chiefs of the resguardo. On their part they ordered great movements of their soldiers upon points of the coast needing no guard, and, thanks to so much complaisance, the landing of the cargo was effected without the least hindrance. Next day a train of four hundred mules, bending beneath the weight of their loads, bore the landed bales to Laurin. The question now was how to introduce the goods into Malaga without compromising the custom-house. Like a man full of delicacy, the merchant distributed the goods in raisin-boxes and the next appeared at the head of his train at the gates of the city. But, O cruel surprise! his innumerable boxes are there seized by the custom-house, who pretended that the seguro only availed for the landing on the coast, but not the least in the world for the entry of the cargo into Malaga. It was in vain for the unfortunate victim of robbery to protest, all his goods were confiscated.

It is said, that in 1826, Ferdinand, sensible how important it was to his treasury to put an end to the scandalous smuggling carried on in Andalusia, resolved to destroy it at all hazards. Convinced, however, that it would be almost impossible for him to attain this object, if he relied upon the persons in his employ, he made a contract with a Mr. Riera, to whom, as the price for the work, the Spanish monarch granted a part of the proceeds of sale of the government tobacco, besides the absolute ownership of all the prizes he might succeed in making of the smugglers. The said Mr. Riera armed twenty-four feluccas, granted a pension of five thousand francs to too pretended emigrants, entrusted with watching the patriot refugees in Gibraltar, and began cruising with so much success that the unfortunate smugglers were reduced to having to wait for a favorable wind to land upon the beach between Mervella and Estrepona. But the corredores having soon made arrangements with the captains of the feluccas, Mr. Riera found himself obliged to interest their subalterns in the prizes, that they might at length cease to make common cause with the smugglers. The latter then addressed themselves to the Genoese captains, settled in Gibraltar, who procured papers for a voyage to Genoa and then put into Malaga. It was in vain for the custom-house officers to post sentinels on board these ships; as the captains were not obliged to limit their stay, it followed that the corredor had as much time as he wanted to corrupt the guards, charged to watch him, or at least, to prepare for an unexpected landing at the time of his vessel's departure. Judge, from these sad details, of the immense difficulties that the Spanish Government will have to overcome before it can succeed in extirpating this scourge, which now meets with such powerful auxiliaries in the disorder of the administration, inseparable from every civil war, and in the state of complete destitution in which so many unfortunate persons in their employ are groaning, whose pay is so greatly in arrear from want of money. Picture to yourself that most of the insurrectionary movements of Malaga have been based upon nothing but ignoble smuggling operations. Four or five houses, whose names are known to every body here, take advantage of those troubled moments to introduce immense cargoes of foreign merchandize into the city; next day every thing returns to its accustomed order, without any change in any thing except the fortunes of some miserable speculators, whilst the revolution of the day before remains an enigma in the eyes of a stranger.

Lastly, the ignorance of the administration is such that, in fact, it becomes the accomplice of the smugglers. Thus, in all Catalonia and the Balearic isles, where nothing is smoked but Brazilian tobacco, it would seem natural for it to consider means of supplying the numerous consumers itself; the administration does not sell a single leaf, and the market remains entirely open to fraud. The enormity of the duties encourages this illicit commerce still more, for although the administration buys of first hands, it persists in selling for three sous the same kind of segars that the clandestine manufacturers furnish to smokers at the price of seven centimes.

Note. The above letter and that on the Basque Provinces of Spain, which appeared in the September number of the Messenger, are translated from a recent work entitled "Deux Ans en Espagne et'en Portugal Pendant la Guerre Civile. Par le Baron Charles Dembowski."

Let the young Poet, exulting in his lay, and hope (how false)
of fame,
While watching at deep midnight, he buildeth up the verse;
Let the calm child of genius, whose name shall never die,
For that the transcript of his mind hath made his thought immortal,—
Let these, let all, with no faint praise, with no light gratitude confess
The blessings poured upon the earth from the pen of a ready writer. Tupper.

THE SURRENDER.—A SONNET.

'Tis o'er! As one who knows that he must die,—
 From whom all earthly hope is withering,
 When every well-beloved familiar thing
 Glasseth its form but faintly on the eye ;—
 As drowning mariner, o'er whom the sky
 Beams its last smile, so must my heart now fling
 Away all hope! Like serf beneath a king,
 Under the weight of woman's tyranny
 I bow! Oh, cursed be the luckless hour
 I gazed upon thee first, thou serpent-dove!
 Thy starry charms, thy rich entrancing dower
 Of beauty and of wit, all praise above—
 These are the fiends who, with un pitying power,
 Drag me deep down into the hell of Love!

NOTES ON CUBA.

"A chiel's amang ye takin' notes,
 And faith, he'll prent it."

The Magnolia Magazine was enriched, during its recent publication in Charleston, with the Notes of an intelligent traveller in the Island of Cuba. The following is the fourth letter of the series, with which we have been favored, and for which we are particularly grateful. We trust that the writer will be pleased to honor us with a continuance of that correspondence which was equally creditable to himself and to the Journal in which it was published. The article, (we may add for the satisfaction of our readers,) though one of a series, is yet complete in itself, and will, we are very well assured, amply reward and satisfy perusal.

[Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.]

On the original map of the Island with the divisions, as laid out by the aborigines, no mention is made of Guines, which was included in the partido Habana; although near the mouth of the river which runs close by it, then called the Bija, the town of Habana was first built, in 1515. It is probable, therefore, that its origin is of recent date; one of those places, which have gradually grown with the increased wants of a thriving, cultivated country, passing through the different stages of a tienda and its dependencies, a hamlet, a village, and ending in becoming a town. With its eight cuartones, it contains 16,213 inhabitants, of whom 7,248 are whites, 1,267 are free colored and 7,698 are slaves. 2,954 are engaged in the cultivation of the cane and the manufacture of sugar, 1,737 in raising coffee, and 8,007 in farming and other rural occupations, the whole distributed among 21 sugar estates, 26 coffee estates, and 843 farms. Its schools, like those of the other sections of the island, have, for a long time, attracted the attention of the more intelligent classes, and yearly reports are made to the Sociedad Patriótica of Havana of their condition. That of 1843 represents them as flourishing, and promising much good fruit from the increased means of instruction, and the reader, who may be ignorant of the low state of education in Cuba, will therefore be surprized to learn that they contained only 235 scholars. The difficulties, however, here thrown in the way of education are such, that too much praise cannot be awarded to those whose efforts to extend the blessings of knowledge throughout their land have been unremitting. Nor have they confined themselves to mere instruction in letters, —a system of apprenticeship has also been introduced in Guines as well as in other places, which no doubt will result in rescuing many from a life of vagrancy.

The plain of Guines offers but little interest to the geologist. One cannot, however, fail to remark the vast extent of perfectly level ground which stretches out for many miles until it reaches the sea, while on three sides it is bounded by high precipitous mountains. This position, and the black alluvial deposit which covers its surface, impresses on the beholder the certainty that it once constituted the bed of a large lake, the waters of which have been discharged into the ocean by the sinking of its seaward barriers. From a partial geological survey of it by Sr. Zancajo, there was found below the soil a bank of pure carbonate of lime, creta, extending from the source of the Guines river S. E. and N. W. more than nine miles long and twenty-one broad. It is of a yellowish, and sometimes of a pure white, in horizontal masses, inclining to the N. N. W., is brittle, soft to the touch, effervesces freely when mixed with acids, adheres slightly to the tongue and hardens on exposure to the air. In various parts, kidney shaped siliceous pyrites are found in veins, which ignite the particles of steel when struck by it; no fossils are found with these. The inferior calcareous formation of the bank is more rough to the touch, enclosing petrifications, of which the equinites are the most peculiar and abundant; and bulbous shaped flints, conglomerated and in horizontal beds. In the transverse scissures of this bed, iron is sometimes found of a grey color, ochreous, with bands of flesh color or violet, probably from the presence of cobalt, corresponding to the quadersandstein of the Germans. S. S. W. of the town around the Ninfa sugar estate is seen a bank of tertiary formation, supra cretacea, lying upon another of reddish sand of little thickness, and containing numerous fossils. Twelve curious species of these were collected by Sr. Zancajo, two of which have ceased to exist in the neighboring seas, the Pecten podopsistruncata and the ammonites varians. The beds of chalk are traversed by veins of marble of various qualities; some of the class Lumachelli, having an ash grey, a yellow, or a blackish tint, and containing petrified conchs and fragments of Nautilus, with red, green and blue shades. One specimen, stalactite, Chaux carbonatée concretionnée, was of a snow white; in parts of a pearly lustre, with fluted fibres and portions of testacea, translucent, brittle and semi-dura. From this species is extracted the oriental white alabaster used for the finest sculpture and relievo; and should the expectations of Sr. Zancajo be realized of finding a large bed of it, a source of considerable wealth might thus be opened; the vicinity of the Havana rail road, and the level state of the country admitting of an easy transportation to the capital.*

But to return to Guines and subjects more congenial to the taste of the majority of my readers, let me advise the traveller who passes a single day in that city to procure an introduction to "the Consul;" a soubriquet bestowed on one of its citizens who, from his untiring attention to every visiter, richly merits the title. Do you want a horse, a volante; do you wish to purchase any thing, or having already bought, find that you have been cheated; will you go to a ball, the cock-pit, or to any of the neighboring plantations—in short, do you wish for anything in Guines, a few paces from the Mansion House will be found a shoemaker's shop, where, amid his busy workmen, he stands, who can supply your every want. There he holds his daily levées, and his evening soirées, visited by all; even the lieutenant-governor often steps in to taste his coffee or gurapo, invitingly placed on his counter, which serves the double purpose of a table for his friends and a cutting board for his leather. His services are indispensable to every stranger; and while he makes a small profit from the hire of his horses and volantes, you feel that you are amply repaid by the hearty good will with which he looks after all your commissions, and the knowledge that he does not subject you to extortion in his charges. We had determined to cross the country to Matanzas, and having sent our trunks by the rail-road to Havana to be forwarded by a steamer, we proceeded to the lieutenant-governor to have our passports, which we had the day previous taken for Havana, changed for others for Matanzas. But here an unforeseen difficulty arose; we were informed that the list with our names had been sent to the Havana police, and the lieutenant-governor, who had seen service in Mexico, did not altogether like our wayward movements, and made many other objections to granting new ones. At length, when we had almost despaired of success, "he said, bring your Consul with you here after dinner." We accordingly returned at the appointed time, when a few words from our influential friend seemed to solve the mystery of our sudden change of route, and remove all the difficulty. "He thought you were Englishmen," he told us, laughing, "and half suspected you were abolitionists; but I assured him that you were true Americans, and here are your passports, pay two rials for them." All doubts as to our country being removed, we were very courteously treated; the lieutenant-governor gratuitously assuring us that the roads were quite free from robbers, and we complimenting him on the efficient and active police of his partido, of which we knew as much as he did of the safety of the roads. Apropos, the English are more detested here than even in France, and the American will do well on every occasion to make known his country, or he will often pay as dearly here for speaking his mother tongue as on the continent of Europe.

Among our fellow boarders, who numbered about forty, were representatives from nearly all the sections of our widely extended country, from Maine to Louisiana. Planters and merchants, indian-agents, lawyers and jailors, clergymen and physicians, all intent on one object, the prolongation of life. It may readily be supposed, that their respective ailments formed for each sufferer the favorite topic of conversation; but there was also a class whose improving health and cheerful spirits rendered their society agreeable, and the house did not, in all its parts, resemble a hospital, which it certainly did where the more debilitated congregated to tell over their sufferings. Taking leave of all our acquaintances, and of our worthy host and his kind family, early the next morning I took my seat beside my compagnon de voyage in the volante which had been brought to the door, and gave the word to the postilion that all was ready. But all was not—intending to occupy two days in the journey, we had hired three relay horses, for which and their driver no passports had been obtained, for horses require them as well as their riders, and we were told that they could not be got before the lapse of two hours; so, after a consultation with our postilion, we set off with the promise that they should soon follow us. One who has not rode in a Cuba volante can form no idea of the ease of their motion. With their enormous wheels, long heavy shafts and low hung chaise-like body suspended on broad leathern straps to the cross pieces of the frame, and quite in front of the axle, they seem at first sight clumsy. But they are very light on the shaft horse, or the small animal placed there with a heavy postilion on his back, when in single harness, has more strength than the largest of our American horses. We had, however, three; the two outside ones being attached on either side the shafts by traces to the first cross-piece near the body. The postilion rode on the left horse, and the right had a pair of reins fixed to the side of the volante, by which he was to be held in by us on going down a hill, while a strap four feet long, connecting his head to that of the middle horse, kept him from straying too far to the right, and another, attached to the bit of the latter, and held by the postilion, prevented his being pulled after him. The traces were of rope, the harness much the worse for wear, and the horses had apparently, for some time past, been dragging out a miserable existence, if their skeleton frames told the truth. Their tails were, however, tightly braided à-la-mode, and their extremities lashed to their cruppers, and with something like an effort to hurry, they scrambled off, one after the other, under the repeated lashes of the postilion, and we soon reached the open country. Our road, after leaving the vicinity of the city, ran along the foot of the mountain, which bound the plain on its northern side, over a gently undulating surface. It was, moreover, McAdamized here and there with large stones a foot or two in diameter, thrown in heaps wherever a cart had previously been bogged; and over and around these we trotted, or rather scrambled at the rate of five or six miles an hour, with far more ease to ourselves than could be expected from the appearance of the road. Not so, however, with the poor beasts they had imposed on us for horses. The central one, with nearly the whole weight of the volante and its contents on his back, and hampered by the shafts which did not reach as far as his shoulders, seemed scarcely able to struggle through the difficulties that beset him on every side. Now his four legs would be all entangled with each other; then the horse to the right would sheer off at a wide angle and jerk his head after him with the leash connecting them, and anon he would return slapdash against him, forcing him against the postilion who, dashing away his head, and jumping his own animal in front of him, would suddenly arrest his progress, almost crushing him between the two; and then he would again be dragged forwards with the whole vehicle by the sudden efforts of the others. In this manner, we were carried over rocks and through mud holes, up hills and down into ponds, with scarcely any jolting, although the body of the volante rolled and pitched like a small boat in a short sea. As to an upset, the first deep hole into which one wheel sank while the other was elevated on a high bank, assured us that such an occurrence could not by any possible means take place. The face of the country, as we proceeded, gradually changed from that of the fertile plain of Guines to one wild and unsettled, with hills of waste barren land, and potreros void of cattle. Now and then, the isolated cottage of a harriero, or of a small farmer, and one or two ruins of old churches were seen, by their loneliness, enhancing the desolate appearance of the country, nor did the deep silent woods through which we occasionally rode, remove any of the sombre air which hung over the scenery. At length, after riding nearly three hours, we caught sight of the white-washed church of Madruga, perched on a distant high hill, and leaving the undulating grounds of the lowlands, we commenced the ascent of the elevated land on which the village lay. The scenery now changed to one of exceeding beauty, made up of thickly wooded hills and small valleys covered with a rich cultivation, amid which the cottage and the mansion seemed to repose in happy security; while moving teams of oxen or pack-horses, and men laboring in the fields presented a lively contrast to the lonely and desolate wilds we had just left. Slowly clambering up the last hill, our postilion, who with all his stolid looks had a spice of pride in him, walked his horses until close to the village, and then, with a sudden start, attempted to dash through the streets; but the already tired animals, not entering into the spirit of the thing, it was a complete failure, and they only scrambled along up to the door of our posada. This was a large building of two stories, on the corner of the public square, with one end occupied as a tienda, containing the usual show of bottles of sweet oil, cordials and wines, a bar and counter, and the medley always seen in a country store. It was by his counter that our host received us with a bow, and offered us seats; but when he learned from our postilion that the "Consul" had strongly recommended us to his particular attentions, he at once declared that "the whole house and all it contained were at our service," and forthwith ushered us up a narrow stairs into a spacious room above, which, during the bathing season, when many from Havana resort to this place to use the neighboring mineral waters, served the double purpose of a parlor by day and a ball room at night. From the balcony, a fine view was obtained of a long valley, the gently undulating surface of which was covered by the rich verdure of the cane, by coffee estates and farms, with the ever graceful royal palm scattered singly, or in groups, over its whole extent, and sugar houses, mansions and groups of negro huts half concealed by groves of mangoes and oranges; while on the left, the Madruga mountains, in a long extended line, raised abruptly their wooded ridges and precipitous sides, broken into numerous peaks by intersecting ravines. There was not one rugged feature in the whole; a rich verdure clad the mountains and carpeted the lowlands; and as it brought back to my recollection similar scenery in Switzerland, amid which, in by-gone days, I had often loitered, I could not but own that this surpassed in loveliness the fairest I had there beheld. I was, however, soon called from the enjoyment of the sense of sight to one more congenial with my wants, by the summons of our host to breakfast. Our table was covered with a clean white cloth, and the repast of fresh eggs, rice, plantains, meats and excellent bread which was spread before us, soon engrossed all our thoughts. After the meal, under his guidance, I visited the sulphur spring near by, which is celebrated for its medicinal qualities. On our way, we passed the square surrounded by low cottages, during the season teeming with life and fashion, now closed and silent; and taking a path to the left, after descending for a short distance, we reached the bathing houses and spring. The latter was bold, running from a well six feet deep, and leaving a white deposit in the gutters that conveyed its waters to the different baths. Its taste was sweet, and it is but slightly aperient, but the strong sulphurous smell which pervaded the place plainly indicated its strength. The basins were of stone, large enough to accommodate about ten persons in each, and the other arrangements were good, without any show of comfort. They are resorted to in March and April, when the dullness of the place is changed to a stirring activity. Good boarding is obtained for $1.50 a day, but the wealthier families have private mansions on the adjoining hills which they occupy only at this time. The village and its suburbs are said to have more than a thousand inhabitants, but I suspect the census was taken during the bathing season, for it now did not appear to contain two hundred; it is only four leagues from Guines and would form a pleasant retreat for invalids during the heats of spring. Our resting place for the day was but nine miles distant, and we hastened to depart, that we might reach it before the norther, which we saw gathering its misty shroud in the horizon, could overtake us. Our host was attentive to all our wants to the moment of parting, and when he could do nothing more, gave us multiplied good wishes for a pleasant journey. The horses which, at our expense and against the articles of our contract, had made a hearty meal, seemed somewhat inspirited by that unusual occurrence, and we were quickly carried to the foot of the mountains, up the steep acclivities of which the road began to wind through one of the ravines. We passed several hills of coarse granite, whose sterile soil yielded sustenance only to the stunted palmettos of the Savannas, which, scattered over its surface, with their fan-like leaves disposed in whirls from the center, looked like so many gigantic nests. The highlands now enclosed us on every side, and completely shut out the view, and to add to the wildness of the scenery large scuds, the rapid forerunners of the norther, were swiftly sweeping over our heads, so low that they seemed but a few feet above the surrounding heights. Urging our horses to their utmost speed, we gained a small valley cultivated in sugar cane, but which, from the old orange trees seen among it, we knew had formerly been planted in coffee. The steam engine was busily at work expressing the rich juice from the canes which lay in large piles around the sugar house, and looked so ripe and tempting, that after asking the way of the bueyero, who had just arrived with his ox-cart laden with fresh from the field, we begged for a few pieces. He immediately selected some of the best, and trimming off the hard envelope, presented them to us. A ride of a league more, and we saw the bamboo avenue which led to the mansion of the Carlotta estate, and driving hastily through its deeply shaded walks, arrived at the house, just as the storm broke over our heads, and the clouds, dissolved in showers of mist, were driven by the violent gusts of wind into every part of the volante. We made a hasty retreat into the piazza, where the administrator, in the absence of the owner, received us with much kindness, and under his hospitable roof we soon found ourselves, in homely phrase, quite at ease. This is one of the most beautiful and best arranged estates I have ever visited. The house, which is built in the style of the English cottage, is surrounded by a wide piazza, along the border of which a thick hedge of perpetual roses rises nearly to the balustrades, while a garden, rich in every variety of flowers and shrubs, adjoining the back of the house, offered a pleasant promenade to its inmates. The site was elevated, and commanded an extensive view of the coffee grounds, with its alleys of palm and orange which lay in the vale below, and of the rich cane fields which stretched out to the very foot of the opposite hills, studded over with isolated palms, the verdure of the whole rendered still brighter by the recent rains. Eastward, the habitations of the slaves, neat, white-washed, stone cottages, were placed on either side of a spacious level tract of ground; at one extremity of which, near the entrance to the estate, were seen a large airy building, the hospital, and a few yards from it the general kitchen in which all their food was prepared; while a capacious coffee storehouse, and a mill for separating the berries from their pulpy envelope occupied the other end of the square. The whole presented the appearance of a miniature village; and as I saw the laborers retiring to their homes after their day's toil had ceased, and gazed on the troops of young creoles gambolling about them free from all care for the future, I could not but contrast their state with that of the half starved and overworked slaves of the English manufacturing districts, and concluding that the lot of the Cuba slave, when under a proper discipline, was the happier one. Between this group of habitations and the neighboring hills were a large number of thatched huts, from which most unmelodious cries rose on the evening air;—these were the pig and poultry houses of the slaves, the source of many a hard dollar to them, and where several were now engaged in giving to their hogs their meal of plantain leaves and cane. There were about three hundred negroes on the estate, chiefly the old, and those who were not sufficiently robust to work on the owner's sugar estate. Indeed, although it once yielded one hundred thousand dollars from a single crop, the Carlotta is now retained almost solely as a country seat and as an asylum for the infirm slaves. It is, however, a perfect nursery for children, for whose especial use twenty cows are kept, and so judicious is their treatment that very few die. The land is very elevated, and the well which supplies the slaves as well as animals with water is more than three hundred feet deep, cut through the lime stone rock. In 1813 all the coffee shrubs were killed by a frost; which induced them to plant amid the new trees numerous plantains, the broad leaves of which quite protected them in 1822, when a slight frost was again formed, although the plantains themselves were destroyed.

*In the Pueblo del Cano are several mineral springs, those of Aquacate and Lima, and that of Santa-rancas, the latter highly impregnated with salts and sulphur. Obsidian and sand, fit for fire bricks, clay used extensively in pottery and decomposed pumice stone are also there found. In las Poyas and Cacaragicas, serpentine of a pure green color, sometimes passing into a blackish shade, intermingled with garniss, and of a conoidal texture, has been collected near the arroyo del Gato. Hornblende, red jasper, silicate of aluminous iron, deutoxide of aluminous iron, sardonix perfectly conoidal, heliotrope, lignite, micaceous sand, magnetic pyrites, magnetic iron, antimony and bismuth are also among the minerals that have been found in the two latter places.

Our host, who was a Frenchman, and well informed on all the passing events of the times in Europe as well as in America, had, for many years, attended to the agricultural interests of the family to which the owner of this estate belonged, and had wisely invested the snug fortune he had here accumulated in landed property in France. He was a tall, noble-looking specimen of manhood, and on account of those very advantages had fled to Spain, when all such were eagerly sought for in France to fill the ranks of the Emperor. Thence he had come to Cuba, and his flight had proved that if he cared little for glory, his present comfortable position was an earnest of the good sense he possessed. After passing a pleasant evening in his company and that of his wife, a lady from the United States, we retired to our chambers, as the crack of the whip, thrice repeated, summoning the slaves to rest, was distinctly heard from the distant boheas. Early the next morning, after a light repast and taking leave of our kind host and his family, we once more occupied our seats in the volante. We had not proceeded far before the gait of our horses struck us as being very similar to that of those which had dragged us along the previous day, and on interrogating the postilion we learned that but one had been changed, the other two of the relays not being draft horses. It would have been unjust to have vented our spleen on him, so we proceeded in silence, "nursing our wrath to keep it warm," determined to send it sealed up in a double sheet to the owner of the animals. To add to our vexation, we soon learned that the horses would not walk up a single hill unless we did so before them, and as these increased in number and height as we approached Matanzas, it required no great effort to close our hearts against any charitable feelings towards their owner, who, by-the-bye, was not the "Consul." Our road lay over a rolling country presenting but little to interest the traveller, until we reached the St. Juan river, along the fertile banks of which the ground was in a high state of cultivation. About a league from the city, we passed a sugar refinery, the only one in the island, and that one owned by a citizen of the United States. Yet, strange to relate, in a country where the abundance of sugar is only excelled by its inferior quality, even this single establishment has to look abroad for support, and sends much of its sugars to old Spain. Being made from fresh muscovado, it retains the rich flavor of the cane, and is far superior to any refined in the United States, where the very refuse of sugars is used to make the loaf. The appearance of Matanzas as we entered it was not prepossessing, for our postilion drove us through by-streets of low, mean-looking houses, and brought us to our hotel near the bridge of the Yumuri, without our having seen any but the worst part of the town. This city derived its name from the murder of certain Castilians by the Indians, during the earlier settlement of the island, when, according to Herrera, a number emigrated hither from Havana; only one man* and two women were saved, the Indians escaping in their canoes to the other side of the bay. The place was thence called Matanzas,† signifying the slaughter of a battle-field. It is situated at the head of the bay, on a mangrove swamp which has been partly reclaimed, and on the rising grounds which lie between the two small rivers St. Juan and Yumuri. The water is so shallow, even at the extremity of its long wharf, that none but boats of light drafts can approach it; and the shipping is moored in the bay a mile from the town, launches being employed to load and unload them. Soon after being made a port of entry, it increased rapidly in size, and now extends an arm through the mangroves on the South, called the Pueblo Nuevo, and another towards the Cumbra, named Versalles, while it covers a large space of ground between the rivers which separate it from those two parts. The whole population of the city and its suburbs is 19,124, of whom 10,304 are whites, 3,041 are free colored, and 5,779 are slaves. Besides a small church in Pueblo Nuevo, it contains another well-

* This man was preserved three years by a Cacique, who saved his life and treated him as his own son, until the arrival of Narvaez in the province Habana; when, preceded by three hundred Indians bearing presents, he went out to receive the Spaniards and delivered up his guest. His imitative powers appear to have been strong, for the historian remarks, that he retained all the habits of the Indians, squatting on the ground, and using his mouth and hands like them.

† Matanzas was founded in 1693 by Manzaneda, then the governor of Cuba, who, on Saturday, the tenth of October, commenced the city at the plaza de armas and laid out the streets and the site of the church. The place was consecrated a few days after by D. Diego Evelino de Compostela, who erected a cross on the spot, and blessed the first stone then laid in its foundation by the governor. They are now, 1843, just finishing the front by the erection of a second tower. The next day, they selected the place called the Punta Gorda for the erection of a castle, which they named after the governor, San. Severino.—Valdes.

built edifice now undergoing improvement ; a theatre, a cock pit of course, large handsome barracks, a fine spacious hospital for the poor, the military and strangers, a well built and new prison, several public and private schools, a college, and a single mantua-maker and milliner, which I mention for the especial benefit of my countrywomen, the Spanish creoles making all their own dresses. The paseo forms a pleasanter promenade than any in Havana, and commands a fine view of the bay and the surrounding country, and the plaza is as large as that of the latter city. During the year 1841, when the commerce of the island was much depressed, 480 vessels entered its bay, and 558 sailed from it, paying to the government, in tonnage and other duties on their cargoes, etc., nearly a million of dollars : 302 of these vessels were American bottoms. Its importations the same year amounted to $1,995,311, of which $434,599 were for lumber from the United States ; and its exportations to $4,374,780, of which $3,733,879 were for sugar, $351,733 for molasses, and $163,385 for coffee. The houses are chiefly of stone brought from the neighboring cliffs of the Yumuri, and are built in the same durable manner as those of Havana, with their windows barricadoed by iron bars. The number of those built of wood on the bay, and the English heard at every step in that busy street give it much of the appearance of an American town to the stranger who approaches it from the sea. It is certainly the most quiet city I have ever visited ; scarcely a single person being met in the streets after 10 o'clock at night, and the silence being only broken by the whistle and repeated cry of the watchman, who, with his lantern, spear and double brace of pistols, will be frequently seen by the pedestrian at that hour. During the three winters I passed in its vicinity, often visiting the town, I heard of but one assassination, and one bold attempt at house-breaking ; yet the stranger will no where hear more tales of murderers and robbers than he will in Matanzas, which on investigation are found to refer to years ago. Even now I was greeted with fearful accounts of the disturbed state of the very partido whither I was going, Limonar ; but as the letters from my friends there contained nothing relative to it, I strongly doubted the credibility of what I heard. There are many beautiful drives near Matanzas, and no stranger will quit the place without visiting the Cumbra, and the celebrated vale of the Yumuri. Leaving the city at early dawn in a volante and three horses, we crossed the bridge of the latter river, and commenced the ascent of the high hill which leads to the Cumbra. It was, in a great measure, bare of trees, but its whole extent was covered with a carpet of yellow flowers, that, from a distance, gave to it a beautiful appearance. Following a road of the roughest kind imaginable, we passed behind the large barracks and hospital, and the solitary mansion with its pillared and arched front, which strikes the attention of the traveller, on sailing up the bay, by its lonely appearance. Not a tree was planted near it, for the Spaniards fear too much their tendency to attract the lightning to permit one to grow near their houses ; but its cool verandahs, and the fine view it commanded of the bay and city proved the good taste of its wealthy owner. Our horses were urged to a gallop wherever the road at all permitted that gait without endangering our safety, and we soon reached the narrow ridge of the Cumbra, more than a thousand feet above the sea. As I walked along the now level road, I knew not on which side to fix my gaze, the landscape was everywhere so beautiful. Seaward, was the wide ocean, and more than thirty miles of the coast towards Havana in full view ; while the bay of Matanzas, dwindled in size, looked like a smooth, broad river leading to the city, whose houses were spread out over a level tract at its head. On the other side of the road, far down, below our very feet, lay the lovely vale of the Yumuri, with its grounds now broken into peaked hills, now gently undulating, its palms, its cane fields, its farms and its cottages. As the morning mist, which partially enshrouded it, rolled up the sides of the surrounding mountains, and object after object became lit by the bright sun's rays, throwing into bold relief the portions illuminated, while the shadow of the Cumbra still lay on the rest, it brought back to my recollection those graphic descriptions of tropical scenery given by St. Pierre in his Paul et Virginie ; and as I gazed on the palm thatched cottage below me, perched on the very pinnacle of a small conical hill, and listened to the distant crowing of the cock, and the bleating of the kids, I could not but envy the poor montero his secluded abode, so quiet and happy did it look. The valley is quite small, which adds to its beauty, and is so hemmed in by its high surrounding hills, to the West stretching far away, that it seems almost inaccessible ; while its oriental air, and calm, peaceful appearance is increased by the contrast of the wildness of the surrounding heights. But the heart is pained on recurring to its past history ; and as fancy sketches to the mind the carnage which this place has witnessed of its former innocent inhabitants, it seems well that the name of the neighboring town should be significant of slaughter. It was here, that in 1511 numbers of the aborigenes were cruelly massacred by the Spaniards, and the remainder, driven to the surrounding hills and hunted by bloodhounds, rushed to the precipices that overhang the Yumuri river, over which they threw themselves, crying out in their despair, " io mori, io mori,"* " I die, I die ;" whence the name of the valley and river. On the ridge were several private residences, into one of which, being invited by the owner, we were regaled with a glass of fresh milk, that most uncommon article in a Cuba country house. During our descent of the hill, while returning to the city, several most beautiful landscapes were presented of its bay and shipping, and its whole suburbs. Turning off by a road which began close by the bridge of the Yumuri, we rode rapidly along its level surface, and entered the gap which leads to the valley. Close to us lay the placid waters of the little stream spread out into a miniature lake, while the opposite precipices overhung it with immense, rugged festoons of partly colored rock, and massive stalactites, beneath which the entrance to a large cave was seen. Suddenly, the valley in all its beauty burst on our view, and after lingering awhile to enjoy the picture, we returned to the city, and driving up the hill behind it, again regaled our sight with the varied landscape, the valley, the town, the bay, and the surrounding country. Our ride occupied three hours, and I had never before looked on so many different views in the same space of time. The panorama changed at every step, and the whole was so lovely, that the heart was kept in one continued flutter of delight. Matanzas is declared by all its inhabitants to be the healthiest city in the universe, but its surrounding mangrove swamps induced me to doubt it, and I asked Belle, a fellow citizen of Charleston, who keeps a fine bathing house, and is moreover a living receptacle of all the news in the city, about its health—"My good sir," she replied, "every body had fever-and-ague last summer." By-the-bye, my countrywoman is quite a blue stocking, and has travelled as far as Paris; although not a direct descendant of Japheth, she is very entertaining, and a seat in her parlor, amid the gentlemen who make it a lounge, will introduce the stranger to all the topics of the day. To verify her opinion, I became sick myself, and experiencing all the discomforts of a boarding-house of not the cleanliest kind, although the best in the city, I determined to leave as soon as the return of health permitted me to do so. My departure was in better style than that from Guinea; the volante was a fine one, and three strong horses, under the guidance of a young negro postilion, dressed in an embroidered jacket and having a long sword lashed to his side, carried me rapidly along. Soon after crossing the bridge of the St. Juan, connecting the city with the Pueblo Nueva, we reached the shores of the bay, along which the road ran more than a mile, and overtook four volantes filled with ladies bound also for the country. They were escorted by a horseman, dressed in a pair of white pantaloons, with his large loose shirt over them, fluttering in the sea breeze as he galloped by their side, and armed with a long Spanish fusil, and the Toledo blade lashed to his back. He was one of those fine specimens of manhood not unfrequently seen among the monteros; tall and erect, his brawny limbs without a portion of superabundant flesh, with his bold bearing he seemed able to face a dozen poltroon robbers. For a moment, I regretted the absence of my pistols, but as I had a well filled purse I knew that if attacked, of which I felt assured there was scarcely a probability, I should get off with only a moderate beating. Our party moved gaily on by the margin of the beautiful bay, with its fleet of vessels at anchor on its blue waters, and the heavy launches conveying to them the produce of the country, or returning to the city with loads of their discharged cargoes. The waves, propelled by a north wind, were dashing high over the rocks of its southern shore, guarding its whole extent by a line of breakers; while over the shoal water near by, several pelicans were slowly sailing, their cumbrous beaks pointing forwards like bowsprits, and their heads turning with one eye downwards then the other, searching their prey in the crystal waters beneath. On the margin of the reef, a brig of about three hundred tons was hove down, and men were busily employed in cleansing her bottom with burning tar: she had just landed near the bay eight hundred slaves from Africa; for the trade, although it has diminished on account of the low price of negroes, still continues, and receives the private support of the island government by their connivance at the open infringement of the laws. On the right lay the mangrove swamps, covered with water and exposed to the full heat of the sun, the bushes having been all cut down the preceeding summer, for the purpose of tanning hides, the bark being used for that purpose. A large number of convicts were at work on its borders cutting transverse trenches in the soft coral rock, and squaring the blocks already raised from the bed. Each had the free end of his chain attached to his waist, while the other was securely fastened to his ankle, and their clanking at every movement of the body, as the pickaxe rose and fell to the ground, reminded me strongly of the galley slaves seen about Naples. They were under a guard of soldiers with loaded muskets, and seemed to work together, both whites and blacks, without any promptings from their overseer. The road, as we ascended the highlands before us, was alive with numerous harrieros, carrying corn and other farming products into the city; and caballeros, mounted on fine pacing barbs, with solid silver buckles and plates spread profusely over the head pieces and bit and holsters; themselves, armed with long swords having large silver basket hilts, and massive spurs of the same metal, urging their steeds to a rapid speed, their swords jerking about, and their spurs jingling, looked not unlike so many knight-errants in search of adventures. Now and then, we passed a montero with his wife, or sweetheart riding in front of him on the same alvardo, his arm around her waist, and his hand holding the loose reins, the slightest pressure of which against the neck of his intelligent steed sufficed to guide him. We crossed rather a barren country for a couple of leagues, when my postilion turning to the left through a newly made road, I parted company with the other volantes, and entered a succession of deep woods. I now met few persons, but a solitary traveller could occasionally be seen riding rapidly along, his valise buckled to the back of his saddle, and his holsters fixed to the crupper. My postilion, who seemed impatient to arrive at the end of his journey, kept the horses in a continued trot, galloping up all the hills, and we soon reached the Canimar river, which, seen from the high grounds we were descending, presented a picturesque landscape. From its margin, high cliffs rose abruptly, covered with air plants, vines and shrubbery, having their summits crowned by large timber; while the stream silently glided out of one gorge in the mountains to enter another, and was soon lost to the view. On the opposite shore was the Caserio, the embarcadero at which all the produce of the surrounding country is shipped by launches to Matanzas, its warehouses reaching to the very edge of the water; while a road was seen leading up the steep hill behind it, with several ox-carts slowly descending into the village. On the banks I met two pretty girls with their horses, afraid to enter the swollen stream; they gazed wistfully at my volante, and I was more than half tempted to offer a passage; but my postilion driving suddenly into the water, which rose nearly to the top of the seat, I lost all thought of them in a desire to protect myself. After floundering about a while, we reached the other shore; and driving through the crowded streets of the Caserio, or small village, where hides, boxes of sugar, pack horses, oxen, carts and harrieros seemed all mingled in one mass, we moved rapidly over the stony road that led to my future residence. It was but two leagues distant, and I soon saw its lime hedge and coffee shrubs, and its numerous orange trees laden with their golden fruit. A few more cracks of the whip, and I entered its avenue of low trimmed orange, and was set down at the door of the house, receiving the warm welcome of my kind friend. As I had passed the larger part of the two preceding winters on this estate, I was known to all the slaves, who, as they passed, greeted me by low salaams, the most graceful of all bows; the arms being crossed on the chest, the head bent, and the body half bending, half sinking, and retiring slightly. The young creoles, who were gamboling on the secaderos, naked black imps, sent up a shout of "el medico, el medico," not unmindful of the dulces I had often thrown among them on a Sunday afternoon; and the large bloodhound, the frequent and close companion of many of my former rambles about the estate, suddenly recognizing me, expressed his joy by whining and rubbing all the red clay dust from his rough coat on my clothes.

I could not but rejoice heartily in the change from the cold civilities of an hotel, to the unstinted hospitality of a friendly roof; and as I rested in an ample arm-chair from the fatigues of my journey, which, in my debilitated state, had nearly exhausted my strength, I felt that here "I could take mine ease."

The reader will perceive, that in the journey from Havana to Guines and thence to this place, I met with not a single accident; that the means of travelling were easy, and the difficulties of the route only nominal. I moreover was not compelled to speak one word of Spanish; for whenever I left a place, full directions were given to the postilion where to carry me, and as to the dangers of the road, I have learned to disbelieve nine tenths of the tales of robbery I hear, and seldom carry pistols, unless when rambling through unfrequented woods, where the only danger is from the cimarones. These, being often but a few months from the wilds of Africa, retain much of their native ferocity, but are easily kept off by fire arms. The courtesy of the Spaniard is well known, and there is no country through which a stranger can pass more easily than Cuba, if he will but obey the laws regarding passports, etc., and refrain from an insolent bearing towards those with whom he comes in contact.

El desterrado.

TO MY MOTHER.

BY MRS. MARIA G. BUCHANAN.

List to that music on the summer air,
 Low breathe its tones around.
 —I see a child as opening rosebud fair—
 Upon a woman's neck its arms are wound,
 'Tis from its lips that seraph music wells,
 And Mother is the sound
 That echo answers from her mystic cells.

Behold that beautiful and quenchless light,
 Breaking the prison's gloom,
 Like moonbeams on the dusky brow of night
 It gilds with golden rays the convict's doom.
 Oh! 'tis the lustre of a Mother's love,
 Fading not at the tomb,
 Where guilt and shame and fear keep watch above.

Over the ocean of unquiet thought,
 As wave on wave mounts high,
 By passion's stormy tempest overwrought,
 A Mother's voice steals in low melody;
 Calm grows the soul's fierce discord 'neath her will,
 As if her words had caught
 Some portion of His might who uttered "Peace, be still."

When tears of meek repentance humbly fall
 From the crushed penitent;
 When 'tween him and his God frowns sin's dark wall,
 A cheering brightness with his woe is blent;
 Oh! 'tis the rainbow of a Mother's smile,
 Which seems as if 'twere sent
 As Mercy's pledge from Him who knew no guile.

Oh! mother, fast between thy child and thee
 A hundred rivers flow,
 But still thy speaking smile's dear witchery
 Is present with me wheresoe'er I go;
 By Fancy's ear thy thrilling voice is heard
 Swelling in harmony,
 Thro' sleep's dim realms by mortal sound unstirred.
 I've left my home upon thy gentle breast,
 Where love and peace are met.
 Within a husband's shelt'ring arms I rest
 And shadowed by his tenderness—but yet,
 Even in that blissful circle of repose,
 Thee do I ne'er forget,—
 Thee will I love 'till life's last scene shall close.
 Tho' on thy lofty brow sad age has placed
 The signet of the tomb—
 Though lines by time and sorrow deeply traced
 Now mar the cheek on which the rose did bloom—
 Tho' bent thy form where once reigned perfect grace,
 Oh! yet to cheer this gloom
 Beauty's best sunshine still illumines thy face.
 Thine eyes' clear lustre, beautiful as night
 When stars are on her brow,
 Is yet scarce faded, and love's spirit bright,
 Which on my childhood shed its angel glow,
 Lives yet within them, and undimmed thy smile,
 As when, so sweet and low,
 Thou sangst 'till sleep flung round me her soft wile.
 Oh! mother, loved inspirer of my song,
 Source of its melody,
 With whom are linked the brightest shapes that throng
 'The twilight realms of dark-eyed Memory,
 Accept this humble tribute to thy worth,
 Unworthy far of thee—
 Thee in whose breast all virtues have their birth.
 My Mother, when of thee I think, or speak,
 So perfect is my love,
 The energy of language is too weak,
 Its wondrous height and depth to fully prove,— Words fail as dies the taper in the blast;
 'Tis known to Him above,
 With whom we hope to live when death's dark gulf is passed.

SHELLEY.

(Extract from a Lecture on the "Genius of Shelley.")

BY T. H. CHIVRES, M. D.

"How rose in melody that child of Love!"—Young.

Shelley was a poet of the highest order. He was the heavenly nightingale of Albion, whose golden eloquence rent the heart of the rose bud of Love. There is an unstudied, natural elegance of expression about his poems which makes them truly enchanting. There is a subtle delicacy of expression, an indication of the wisdom-loving divinity within—which enervates while it captivates the admiring soul. He was the swiftest-winged bee that ever gathered the golden honey of poetry from the Hybla of this world. He was, among the Poets, in delineating natural objects, what Claude was among the painters in delineating the landscape. All his minor poems, and more particularly "The Question," "The Zucca," and "The Woodman and the Nightingale," with a few others, are, as poems, what the works of Titian were among the painters—the execution far surpasses the design. They appear to have been written just for the delight which they gave him. The richness of his genius flowed unconfined, and, like a mighty, crystalline river, gathered volume as it onward flowed. Human language never expressed a more sublime, poetical truth than may be found in his "ODE TO LIBERTY," where he calls

"The Dædal Earth,

THAT ISLAND IN THE OCEAN OF THE WORLD.

A more perfect truth was never uttered than the following, which may be found in his "REVOLT OF ISLAM"—"TO THE PURE ALL THINGS ARE PURE."* What, but a generous nature, could have given birth to such a divine sentiment as this? "LET SCORN BE NOT REPAID WITH SCORN."

He was the most purely ideal being that ever existed. He possessed the intellectuality of Plato, with the ideality of Æschylus, and the pathos of Sophocles. His divine conceptions are all embalmed in the sacred tenderness of melting pathos. He possessed the artistical skill of Moore, without his mannerism. One of his peculiar characteristics is the giving to inanimate objects the attributes of animation. His description of the manner in which the rock overhangs the gulf in "THE CENCI," is an instance of it, where he says it has,

"From unimaginable years,
 Sustained itself with terror and with toil
 Over a gulf, and WITH THE AGONY
 WITH WHICH IT CLINGS SEEMS SLOWLY COMING DOWN."—

No lines ever conveyed to me more meaning than the following, wherein you can see the agony of Beatrice setting itself into a resolve:

"All mortal things must hasten thus
 To their dark end. LET US GO DOWN."

"THE CENCI" is far superior to any thing written in modern times. The following lines are not to be surpassed by any thing that Shakspeare ever wrote:

"They say that sleep, THAT HEALING DEW OF HEAVEN, STEEPS NOT IN BALM THE FOLDINGS OF THE BRAIN," &c.

His delineation of the character of Beatrice is true to the original. It is the most effecting beautiful that can be conceived. From the divine fountains of her infinite affections the warm tide of her female nature gushes forth in unfathomable fullness. There are no leprous stains of selfishness spotting the saintly purity of that divine form which stands before us in all its naked majesty. Her unflinching determination is dignified by its sincerity. I firmly believe that any being who could thus be induced to vindicate and revenge her injured honor, contains, in her very nature, the essence of all that is noble and good. It is the wretchedness by which we are surrounded, which makes us what we are. There is a dignified composure in her resignation to death, which nothing but an inward goodness could impart. Her passions were inspired by a lively respect for the sacredness of her honor, although they were the inaudible prophets of her own destiny. Her love, rising into devotion, is consecrated by her sorrows. There is a mournful sweetness in her death, and we embalm her virtues in our memory, while we weep over her misfortunes!

* See note at end.

Shelley has invested the most ideal thoughts in the most beautiful language. His poems are the most perfect idealisms of the subtlety of his divine genius. His spirit was like a Sybil, who saw from the "heaven-kissing hill" of truth the vision of the coming centuries. The seeds of divine liberty, which he has sown in the hearts of England's slaves, will spring up, like immortal Amaranths, in the glorious Summer of To-come. Soon will the Spring of Liberty, which he so much desired, burst forth, in all its splendor, on the enraptured souls of men. Then will her barren nakedness be covered with the green verdure of perpetual happiness. Then will the winter of her slavery be clad in the rich garments of the Summer of Liberty. Then will she appear like a BLESSED ISLAND rising out of an ocean of divine tranquility, greened with the freshness of an immortal SPRING.

His poems are the elms of the soul, where there are many palm trees, and much running water. Hope was the Evening and Morning Star of his life. The mother of his Hope was FAITH; her daughter, PATIENCE; and her husband, LOVE. Life was to him precisely what Jean Paul Richter said of it, "Man has but two minutes and a half to live—one to smile—one to sigh—and a half to love—for in the middle of this minute he dies!" He was anointed by the hands of Liberty as the Prophet of humanity. Some of his Elysian scenes are as sadly pleasing as the first sight of the green pastures of our native land, from which we have been absent a long time. We are, while perusing his poems, like a Pilgrim in the LAND OF OLIVES, who sees the mournful aspect of the country around, while tasting of its delicious fruit. He treated the most of his enemies like the King of Aragon did his. When some one railed out against him, he sent him a purse of gold. Being asked the reason for so doing, he replied, "When dogs bark, their mouths must be stopped by some morsel." He was that divine harmonist whose seraphic breathings were the requiem-carols of his soul panting after perfection. There was in his patient spirit something of the tender sorrow which dictated the Book of Job, mixed with the spirit-stirring felicities which filled the heart of Solomon. He embalmed his most tender expressions in the fountain of his heart's best tears, which were the outgoings of the joy of his sorrow. By the astonishing alchemy of his divine genius, he could transmute the most earthly things into the most heavenly idealities. In his own beautiful language on the "DEATH OF KEATS,"

*"He is made one with Nature; there is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder, to the song of Night's sweet bird."*

He is the "PRINCE ATHANASE" of his own beautiful creation.

*"He had a gentle, yet aspiring mind;
Just, innocent, with various learning fed;
His soul had wedded wisdom, and her dower
Is love and justice, clothed in which he sat
Apart from men, as in a lonely tower,
Pitying the tumult of their dark estate.
For none than he a purer heart could have,
Or that loved good more for itself alone;
Of nought in heaven or earth was he the slave."*

The difference between Byron's poetry and Shelley's consists in this, that the breathings of the former are the melancholy outbreaks of a spirit at war, from disappointment, with the world; those of the latter are the pathetic expressions of a soul which panted after an ideal of intellectual perfection. Shelley carolled for the listening ears of an enraptured world, while Byron sang its requiem. Byron was like the sun in eclipse. Shelley was like "Hesperus, the leader of the starry host of heaven."

Moore is as different from both, as they are from each other. His poetry is the heart-sustaining expressions of the phases of his own uninterrupted pleasures. Though widely different from Byron's, in many respects, yet it has the same object in view in regard to the perfection of man. They were no reformers—they appealed immediately to the affections and the passions of men. They wrote for the Present and the Future, when it should become Present, without any determinate object in view, save that of conferring on mankind, in general, the same kind of delight which they experienced themselves in their own compositions. Shelley was a reformer—he had a more lofty object in view. His poetry is the liquid expressions of that undying self-sacrificing desire within, to perfect the nature of MAN—to establish some principle, through the deathless yearnings of the divinity within him, for his regeneration. The poetry of Byron and Moore will satisfy the intellectual wants of a Nation, far inferior to what Shelley conceived as his ideal of human greatness. The poetry of Byron and Moore is the studied expression of the inspiration of the divinity within. Shelley's poetry is the artless expression of the perfection of Art. It proceeded from the burning fountains of his soul, in the unpremeditated exercise of his prolific genius, with as much unstudied sweetness, for the gratification of the intellectual wants of perfectly mature man, as did the crystalline waters from the Rock of Horeb, when stricken by the rod of Moses, to quench the parching thirst of the Israelites in the valley of Rephidim.

It was the Venus Urania—the intellectual love—which is the handmaid of the heavenly Uranian Muse—which inspired the poetry of Shelley. She was the virgin which kept the fires of love upon the altar of his heart forever bright. It was the Venus Pandemos which inspired the poetry of Byron and Moore—as it appeals more directly to the passions of man. The poetry of Shelley was presided over by the elder Venus, the daughter of Uranus, who had no mother, but was co-eternal with the divine Berazhith. The poetry of Byron and Moore, and all the poets of passion, is the inspiration of the younger Venus, the daughter of Jupiter and Dione, who is called the Pandemian. Those who gaze upon the divine countenance of the Venus Urania, are ever afterwards impressed with the god-like grandeur of the immortal mind. She is the aspiration of the love of the intellectual. Those who gaze upon the less radiant countenance of the Venus Pandemos are inspired with a passion to adore the form—not the soul. The former is the companion of the spiritual—the latter of the corporeal. The Venus Urania lives in the poetry of Shelley as the perfume does in the flower—she is the soul of the body of his verse. The intellectual love is the divine redolence of the rosebuds of thought, which adorn the enchanting garden of his soul. He has arrayed the spotless body of his divine love in the snow-white linen garments of the purest poetry. He stands in the TEMPLE OF FAME like a BAS RELIEF cut in the solid wall—you can never move him without pulling it down.

* Note to p. 104. Shelley was probably indebted for this beautiful sentiment to the Bible, in which the following passage occurs. "Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving nothing is pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled." Epis. to Tit. I., 15. Though he denied its truth, his mind could not but have appreciated the poetical and moral beauties of the Bible.

GOODNESS.

There is a grace in Goodness that outshines
The pomp of Kings. 'Tis loftier than lines
Of beauty—it commands the soul with all
Its deep affections—it becomes the brow
Better than coronals of gold—the low
Cluster about it as a gift—the proud
Kneel at its shrine, and Wisdom who hath plough'd
The sea, and traced the sources of the streams
That feed it: who hath realized the dreams
Of fancy in her developements, and borne
The Past upon her palm—e'en she hath gone
And bow'd herself to Goodness.

THE CRUSADER'S RETURN.

BY D. H. ROBINSON.

This poem is a counterpart to one by the same author, entitled, we think, "the Faith of Woman," published in the late Magnolia. This was also intended for that popular Magazine; but on its suspension, its accomplished Editor kindly sent it to the Messenger.—Ed. Mess.

TO ISABELLA.

DEAREST, will you accept this little poem as some slight atonement for the slander against your gentle sex contained in the rhymes you wot of!—The Author.

"Where should this music be? 't' the air or the earth?
* * * * * Sitting on a bank

Weeping
* * * * *
It crept by me upon the waters
Allaying both their fury and my passion
With its sweet air!"—The Tempest.

"I hate inconstancy—I loathe, detest,
Abhor, condemn, abjure the mortal made
Of such quicksilver clay, that in his breast
No permanent foundation can be laid,
And yet last night"——

Byron.

I.

With golden gladness came the Sun
From the blue skies, the world upon—
Sending afar his glorious glance
Over the vine-clad hills of France.
Oh the young Morning! She is fair
And breathes a blessing everywhere!—
Whether she come to glad the eyes
Of those who gaze on Persian skies—
Or, like a glance of hope that falls
With cheering power on prison walls,
Her car of fire with wheels of gold
O'er the dim Iceland heaven is rolled—
Or when, like patriot's wreath of fame,
She wraps the prairie-land in flame—
Or when in joyful pride she comes
To gild with glory Southern homes,
And Earth, like maid with rosy lips
A draught of dewy sunlight sips,—
Still is she beautiful and grand
In every clime, on every land:
Yet brighter far than o'er them all,
Comes Morning over glorious Gaul!

A young and gallant knight is he
Who rideth o'er the plain:—
From battling on right manfully
To set the holy city free
Of infidels profane;—
From doing deeds of chivalry,—
He rideth on right joyfully
To his dear home again!

He who, for many a weary hour,
Hath battled 'gainst the Moslem power,
Whose eye alone hath caught the gleams
That on the red God's banner dance,
Now drinketh in the peaceful beams
Of Morning in his native France.

And well may joy, like sunrise, now
Break brightly o'er the young knight's brow:
And when he gazeth on that scene
With every gorgeous color shewn—
Upon the mountains bathing high
Their foreheads in the cold clear sky—
Upon the fields of waving grain,
That flash the sunlight back again—
Upon the carpet of the grass
Where fairy feet alone should pass—

Upon the sparkling of the rill,
That leapeth joyful from the hill,
And murmurs, whilst it rolls along,
Over the verdant sod,
A sweet and tributary song
To its Creator, God!—
Upon the charms on every hand
That deck alone his native land,
Like a bright spirit-band who throng
Alone to some dear home of song;—
Well may a gushing pleasure start
From the deep fountains of his heart!

And more: The Deity who sends
To man each stream of pain and woe
With every bitter wavelet blends
The rolling of some pleasure-flow;—
The sky that frowns with night awhile,
Will brighten with a moonlight smile;—
The rosy Spring trips o'er a sod
Where Winter's icy feet have trod;—
And when, with bosom wildly beating,
A lover from his lady parts,
How joyful ah! shall be the meeting
Between those severed faithful hearts!
And our young knight, when first he roved
To battle with the Paynim's power,
Had parted in a woeful hour
With a bright lady whom he loved:
And now to meet her once again
He deemeth soon shall be his fate;
And over hill and dale and plain
Well may the young knight ride elate!

Alas for hope! Oh who could deem
That with the coming morrow
The sun of joyfulness, whose gleam
Was round him like some happy dream,
Would set in gulfs of sorrow?—
And he was rushing blindly on,
Beneath the day's empurpled dawn,
To mournfulness and horror!
Who hath not witnessed scenes like this,
When, full of hopefulness and bliss,
The doomed one hastens to the strife
And blindly poureth out his life?
As the proud eagle roams on high
The cloudy path-ways of the sky;—
With plumes unfurled the air upon
He gazes boldly at the Sun;—
He cannot pause from his shadowy flight
To look on this orb of lesser light,—
And deems not, dwelling in the air,
Death's messenger will reach him there!
And thus all proudly to the sight
Speedeth along our gallant knight,
Beneath the mantle of the morning bright
And filled with fleeting phantoms of delight.

Here leave we now our knight while rest
Hope's brightest day-beams on his crest;
When not a shade of warning sorrow
Tells of the anguish of to-morrow;
Whilst the broad flashing joy of Morn
Into his very heart is borne!

II.

It is the mournful vesper bell
That calls the sainted ones to prayer—
From gloomy nook and cloistered cell
The nuns are sadly gathering there;—
They come—they come,—a lengthened train—

They pass through each dark recess,
And soul subduing is the strain,
Filling the air with mournfulness,
That sweeps along the chambers dim,
Like sadly-sweet remembrings
Of Heaven-banished Cherubim,
When evening's silent shadow brings
The memory of their lost abode
Within the presence of a God!

'Tis o'er:—The sounds have died away
Within the convent's gloomy walls,
And the last light of dying day
Upon the earth so faintly falls
As scarce to give a color back
From wood or plain or rolling stream:
Night lifts aloft her banner black,
Victorious o'er the Day-God's beam!
And nuns in scattered groups repair
In quiet from the place of prayer.
And there were two of whom alone
This story may relate,
Who, on a stone where moss had grown,
In silent sorrow sate.
And one of them had beauty rare—
A death-like beauty—palely fair,—
A radiance which alone was given
By the approaching light of heaven.
In times gone by, what cause of fear,
What dreadful cause had brought her here,
Her kindly friend would often ask;
And now with accents sweet though trembling,
And dying flute notes all resembling,
She hath commenced her painful task.

"There's nothing in my simple tale
Of wild or high romance;—
Even from the cradle to the veil
Needs but a moment's glance;
I scarce can call to mind my sire,
Who passed from earth away
In life's bright morning ere the fire
Of youth had ceased to sway.
My mother,—oh! her gentle form
Comes up before me now,—
An eye with bright affection warm
Beams from that placid brow!
As girlhood grew beneath her glance
I scarcely noted Time's advance:—
Oh swiftly flew the hours away—
'Twas all one bright long summer-day!
I lack the language to express
Our soft and quiet happiness,
Which, like the peace in realms above,
Made life all loveliness and love!

"A change with my young cousin came.
I felt that life was not the same:
The earth more bright and rosy grew,
The flowers and stars were changed in hue!
Beheld with him each sylvan scene
Assumed a brighter, livelier green—
My own heart's deeper glow was thrown O'er objects dim when viewed alone!

"But summoned by the trump of fame
To gain in holy wars a name
My lover left my side:
Yet ere he went, in words of flame,
He swore he would return to claim,
With honor decked, his bride!
Beneath an oak by moonbeams lighted,
The vows were said—our troth was plighted;—

And we shall meet, oh never, never,
Till we unite in Heaven forever !

"And then, the bitterest woe of all—
My gentle Mother passed from earth :—
Oh never did the spoiler call
From this dark world, so much of worth !
And then low whispered rumors came,
That on a glorious field of fame,
Breathing my name with latest breath,
My lover too had met his death :
From that dark hour I heard no more
Of the dull world's dissonant roar.
All joy forever from me flown,
I stood upon the earth, alone !
I knew 'twas true,—it could not be
That other fate should fall to me,—
'Twas all confirmed ;—there came a page,
Who near him in the battle's rage,
Beheld his fall :—aught, need I say
Of what has happened since that day ?—
I have beneath yon bending sky
No more to do—except to die !"

She ceased ; and now the nightwinds sweep
Along the couch, but not of sleep,
Where she hath lain her down to weep—
May God, her gentle spirit keep !

III.

He hath come, he hath come
To his desolate home,
And the terrible tale is told !
The brave young knight hath heard it all,
And well may that dark tale appal
His heart, however stout and bold :—
And like a fire-wheeled chariot rolled
Over a meadow green and gay,
So hath that story forced its way,
With searching and consuming power,
Over a heart whose brightest flower
Of hope hath perished in that hour !

He heard, that when on battle-field,
Amid the gleam of spear and shield,
He prostrate lay upon the earth
By chance of broken saddle-girth,
His fall was spied by one who fled—
The luckless page, who deemed him dead !
What boots it more ? Who does not know
The rest of that dark tale of woe ;—
How soon the Lady of his love
Was wedded with THE ONE above ;—
How, at the altar, she had given
Her heart forever up to Heaven ?
And he who but on yesterday
Was filled with visions blithe and gay—
Who deemed the world with joy divine
Was brimming like a cup of wine ;—
Who thought, that to the glorious light
Of morning there could come no night ;—
Within whose breast there was no room
For even the shadow of a care,
Turns from his once bright happy home
Filled with the darkness of despair !

O'er many a stream and hill and dale
A wanderer was he,
Until within a pleasant vale,
Under a spreading tree,
He rested, musing on his lot
And musing on the past :

His life,—it seemed an ebon-spot
On Time's fair surface cast.
And as the young knight mournful sat,
Under the ancient oak,
The blackness of his bitter fate
On memory's vision broke !
He thought upon the days of old,—
Of innocence and truth,—
When love, like heaven-born music, rolled
Upon his blooming youth :
When life was like a lady fair,
Who for a festal dresses,
With gems on forehead, rich and rare,
And rose wreaths in her tresses !—
When first upon his vision came
The brightest one on earth,
And in his bosom, thoughts of flame
And fond desires had birth ;—
When, from each leaf and star and flower
He inspiration caught,—
And stream and wood and vine-clad bower
Love's rosy lesson taught !
And then he thought upon the blight
Over his lot that fell,
When hurried to the crusade-fight
From her he loved so well :—
Upon the hopeful journey home
With thronging fancies blessed,
Of joy beneath his native dome,
Caressing and caressed :—
And of the dark and dreadful tale
Still ringing in his ear—
Well may the knight within the vale
Shed many a bitter tear !
He vowed a wanderer he would go
For ever through the earth—
He vowed his bosom ne'er would know
One throb of joy or mirth ;—
He vowed his heart of hearts was given
For ever up to her,
The gentle Lady-bride of Heaven—
The woeful worshipper !
He swore by everything on high,
By all that glowed above,
By earth and air, by sea and sky
He never more could love !
But hark ! amid his vows for life,
Why, from his moss-grown seat,
Like war-horse roused to sudden strife,
Starts he upon his feet !

'Tis a strain of music swelling
On the breeze that murmurs through
The green and tangled tree tops telling
All that music strain can do :—
Love, with every breathing blended,
Through the wildwood sweeps along ;
Like a whisper, heaven-descended,
Uttered by the angel throng !—
Now it rolls o'er plain and mountain,
Mingling with the evening breeze,—
Mingling with the bubbling fountain,
Mingling with the murmuring trees !

The knight advanced and on his een
There flashed a sight like fairy scene.
Over the meadow's green expanse
A throng of laughing damsels dance.
Joyous were they, as flinging back
Their tresses brown or gold or black,
Trolling a merry roundelay,
They weave their wildering steps away !

The mountains with a laughter ring,
Like wildest bird-notes in the Spring :—
And under evening's gentle beam
Beauty and Music reign supreme !

And one was fairest of the fair,
And brightest of the bright,
Whose flashing eye and raven hair
Were stolen from the night :
A Southern sun had burnt upon
Her cheek of purest white,
The golden roses that are won
In climes of living light :
Her limbs that scarce were hid from ken
By the aerial dress she wore,
Flashed out upon the gazers then
As flashed the new made stars before
The vision of the first of men
Who wandered Earth's green regions o'er !
She seemed to all in that gay throng,
Who might one glance to her devote,
A bright embodiment of song—
A living moving music-note !
The knight gazed on her with surprise
And drank deep love-draughts from her eyes !
AT ! He—the woestruck knight who even now
Was breathing many a deep and heartfelt vow—
Oaths which were winged for heaven so very late
They scarce are noted in the book of fate,—
Deep protestations of undying truth
To the lost Lady of his love-lit youth ;—
Forgetting her whose virgin-beauty's bloom
Withers within a dark and living tomb ;
Forgetting all,—with accents soft and sweet
Is kneeling at a stranger-beauty's feet !
No matter if his suit be lost or sped
Still hath the past, with all its memory fled !
Ye, who the moral of my tale would scan,
Read here the history of THE FAITH OF MAN.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE FINE ARTS ON THE MORAL SENSIBILITIES.

BY REV. J. N. DANFORTH, ALEXANDRIA, D. C.

In constructing the being called man, and in providing for his felicity, it has pleased the Creator to prepare two distinct, general sources from which that felicity is derived.

The first exists within the breast of man himself ; the other is found in the vast variety of the external world. Nor are these sources of pleasurable emotion altogether independent of each other. On the contrary, there is between them a correspondence so wise and perfect, as to show a manifest design by their combined energy to make men happy.

To illustrate my meaning : The soul of man is endowed with a faculty to which we give the name of Taste. By the rhetorician, Taste is defined to be "the power of receiving pleasure from the beauties of nature and art." Whenever, therefore, this power is exercised on its appropriate object, the result is mental felicity. One mind is so constituted, that it derives its greatest pleasure from the study of poetry ; another from the deductions and demonstrations of mathematical science. So absorbed, indeed, have some minds been in their admiration of the exact sciences, that scarcely any thing, within the empire of thought, could give them pleasure but the strictest demonstration. Hence, a celebrated mathematician is said to have exclaimed, after having toiled through Paradise Lost, "What does it all prove?" On the other hand, when the Pythagorean proposition in Euclid was discovered by its author, he ran through the streets of his city in an ecstasy of delight, crying, "I have found it, I have found it."

To others again, the productions of the pencil or chisel convey a paramount pleasure, while they awaken within the soul deep and inexpressible emotions. The organ of communication in these cases is the eye, through which, also, the soul admires the beauty of architectural creations and proportions. But the art of music, "the concord of sweet sounds" demands another organ, which we call the ear, through which it pours its raptures into the same soul. Hence the blind, whose visual organ cannot perceive the external beauties either of nature or of art, and to whom, therefore, all these sources of pleasure are sealed, turn with redoubled relish to those objects which communicate with the soul through the organ of the ear. And it is highly probable, that this compensation is so complete in its nature and so beneficent in its influence, as entirely to supply a deficiency, which is commonly considered an irretrievable calamity.

The highest order of influence is that produced by Eloquence, which seems to combine the excellencies of the arts already mentioned. Thus eloquence involves the very soul of poetry, as is evident from the breathing thoughts and burning words of the ancient bards and prophets, who swayed the minds of their countrymen with a power never surpassed in the age of the most accomplished orators. Poet and Prophet were in fact interchangeable terms among the ancients, and these men were the accredited public speakers of their assemblies. At the feasts and games they rehearsed their own productions to their delighted fellow-citizens, and when occasion required, stimulated them with all the energy of song to deeds of martial valor. The epic poem existed prior to the oration. Homer, the prince of poets, lived some hundreds of years before Pericles the father of Oratory. Moses, the occasional poet, as well as the commissioned lawgiver of the Hebrews, composed heroic, or triumphal songs in his native language at the very time (1490 B. C.) Cadmus was introducing the alphabet into Greece, or six centuries before the poems of Homer were known in Greece. Very justly, therefore, does Campbell, the author of the Pleasures of Hope, in his Lectures on Poetry, observe : "The earliest place in the history of poetry is thus due to the Hebrew muse. * * Indeed, the more we contemplate the Old Testament, the more we shall be struck by the solitary grandeur in which it stands as an historical monument amid the waste of time." It is from these ancient treasures, sacred and secular, that the materials of the most sublime and effective eloquence have been drawn. So completely is the spirit of poetry and of eloquence intermingled in the compositions of the Hebrew Prophets, that the critics are undecided whether to class them as Orators or Poets.

In comparing the art of eloquence with the art of painting, it may be observed, that aside from those qualities, which are peculiar to the former, it is itself a kind of moral painting, which, disdaining the mere locality of the canvass, instantly wings its flight through every region of nature and of art, summoning at pleasure whatever it needs to produce an impression on the soul. And that impression is not, as in a picture, the result of slow and labored strokes of the pencil, but of the mighty action of mind in its boldest conceptions and its warmest enthusiasm. The calm contemplation of a mere copy, however beautiful—of a moveless scene, however brilliant, cannot, in the nature of things, so rouse the sleeping emotions of the soul, as the living, intelligent and embodied genius of human eloquence, carrying the soul captive by its moral power, and encircling the whole man with its irresistible enchantments. All painting must necessarily be descriptive. Even that which is imaginative seeks original forms out of which to construct its combinations. But description is only one attribute of eloquence. Direct persuasion is its great object. It is, indeed, defined to be "the art of persuasion." But though indirect persuasion may be predicated of some of the productions of the pencil, it is only an incidental result, not a part of the main design. For instance, the object of those historical paintings, which adorn the National Rotundo, is national glory. But incidentally they are adapted to persuade the rising youth of our country to the adoption of principles of pure patriotism and to the performance of deeds of heroic devotion. The object of that splendid specimen of sculptured marble, which reposes under the same dome, is to honor him, who was "first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Nor can a thoughtful American youth contemplate it without some stirring emotions; without some nascent purpose of soul, like this illustrious prototype, to deserve well of his country in whatever sphere he may be placed. If such then be the effect of these speechless works of art upon the patriotic heart; if even the mute painting and the voiceless marble can be so eloquent; if they can illustrate the renown of past generations, and inspire generations to come with the spirit of high endeavor, to what achievements may not a living, speaking eloquence aspire? The statue of Demosthenes might charm the beholder, but what would he think of Demosthenes himself, especially could he hear the indignant tones of his voice denouncing the atrocities of the king of Macedon?

When the comparison is instituted between eloquence and music, the result to which we come is more doubtful, supposing the standard by which we measure that result to be the beautiful rather than the useful. The emotions awakened in the human soul, by strains of soft or sublime music, cannot be surpassed in depth and power by any feeling of which the soul is capable when under the influence of any of the Fine Arts. It is an influence which reaches its finest chords and awakens its most exquisite sensibilities. The fable of Orpheus calling from the dead his beloved Eurydice by the irresistible power of music, however destitute of literal truth, furnishes a striking tribute from antiquity to the charms of music. It is, in truth, one of those arts which is founded in nature, if, indeed, it does not boast a higher birth—in heaven itself. There was melody in the groves of Eden, while the world was yet in its infancy and man in his purity. Thus Milton represents our first parent in his apostrophe to the glorious works of God as saying:

"Fountains, and ye that warble, as ye flow,
Melodious murmurs, warbling, tune his praise.
Join voices, all ye living souls; ye birds,
That singing up to heaven's gate ascend,
Bear on your wings and in your notes his praise.
Witness, if I be silent, morn or even,
To hill or valley, fountain or fresh shade,
Made vocal by my song, and taught his praise."

If man could not be silent in the midst of the works of God, much less could those pure spirits, who dwelt more immediately in the presence of the Great King, and beheld his glory unobstructed by a veil of flesh. Hence we are informed, that the "morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy." This art, then, is of noble birth, and like the sister arts, should never be desecrated to unworthy and unhallowed purposes. The sanctity of their origin should be their safeguard against perversion. Music may be called the bride of poetry, for they were wedded in Paradise, and have continued for the most part to live harmoniously together through all the revolutions of time, the decay of empires and the sepulture of the human race. Nor can they ever be divorced so long as the passions of the soul shall demand expression. For every emotion of joy or grief, of love or indignation, there is an appropriate sign, which takes the form of a modulated sound, and these sounds in the process of the application of art to nature are so arranged and proportioned as to produce the most powerful impressions on the mind through the ear. Even instrumental music can be traced as far back as any art whatever, not connected with the pressing necessities of life. Ancient history informs us that the "first poets sang their own verses, and hence the beginning of what we call versification, or words arranged in a more artful order than prose, so as to be suited to some tune or melody." The scale or alphabet of music is more wonderful than even the alphabet of language, for while the latter consists of arbitrary signs, the former is an immutable production of Nature. Music, then, was made for the heart of man, and although we cannot say with Shakspeare, that he who has no soul for it is "fit for treason, stratagem and spoils;" though this great master of nature, in inditing so bitter and sweeping a censure, overstepped the limits of truth and probability, yet we may well wonder at the man, whose sensibilities are never moved under so charming an influence. Eloquence claims to include this art within its ample domain, so far as the energy of emphasis, the melody of sound, and the harmony of periods are concerned. That wonderful instrument, the living voice, is essential to the highest achievements of both. Conception, adaptation, accent, emphasis and expression, all are common to both. Inspiration once said to one of the eloquent prophets who had addressed the people: "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but do them not." The superiority of eloquence as a practical and manly art is seen at the bar, in the forum, in the legislative assembly; those great theatres for the transaction of civil affairs, where music would be a strange and unwelcome guest, as bringing nothing useful with her, but being rather a hindrance and detriment to the commonwealth.

The science of ARCHITECTURE, which is of later origin than most of the arts already mentioned, as being a production of civilized life, does, nevertheless, like other arts of Design, come down to us from classical antiquity. The history of the arts has been classified into four luminous periods. The first is the era of Alexander, Pericles, Aristotle, Apelles, Phidias, when in a rough and martial age, eloquence, philosophy, painting, sculpture and architecture each found a genius which each could immortalize. The second era is that of the Cæsars, when poetry and history rose to the very point of culmination. This period embraces the Augustan age. The third is that which followed the capture of Constantinople by the successor of Mohammed, Mohammed II. Italy became now the refuge of the fine arts, and under the fostering care of the Medici, whatever was rescued from the barbarity of the Turks and the Goths was advanced to a degree of eminent perfection. It was the golden age of painting and sculpture, as the brilliant names of Michael Angelo, Raphael, Titian and Corregio testify, while the beauties of architecture were reproduced in that land of classic models under the genius of Palladio,

"Who bade the lofty column rise,
Its summit pointing to the skies."

The last age is that succeeding the reformation, when along with the invention of the art of printing and the mariner's compass, the mind of man shook off its slumbers, and, stimulated by the discoveries of the past and the expectations of the future, commenced a new career of improvement. The discovery of a new world occurring at this period, in the order of an infinitely wise Providence, gave an impulse to the mind of the old world, which nothing could resist. Experimental philosophy burst forth upon the intellect of civilized nations with the power of intuitive demonstration, and reason and revelation were enthroned amid the ruins of scholastic absurdities. Men were eloquent because every faculty of the mind was awakened to extraordinary activity. The brightest period of British eloquence, embracing the names of Chatham, Burke, Pitt and Fox, which has just past, belongs to this epoch. Indeed, not only have the fine arts been most successfully cultivated during the last three hundred years, but never in the history of the human mind, has genuine science made such sensible and important progress. And as all art is founded in science, the advancement of the one insures the improvement of the other.

In analyzing more particularly the influence of these arts on the sensibilities of man, let us recur to the most ancient among them—poetry. This is not merely the language of the imagination, as it has sometimes been defined. It often lies deep in the heart of the poet himself, and then it is that it awakens the most profound emotion in the hearts of others. To illustrate this: Let any one compare the poetry of Akenside with that of Burns; while the former glows with animated beauty, occasionally rising to a stirring eloquence, the latter seizes the fibres of the heart, perhaps in a single line, and they tremble with emotion. The genius of Akenside may dazzle the imagination by its coruscations, but that of Burns electrifies the heart. The one may be compared to an artificial fountain, throwing up by hydrostatic pressure its beautiful jets; the other to a natural fountain in the hill side gushing out with translucent purity from its secret recesses. The former might well sing of the Pleasures of the Imagination, for he was the poet of the imagination; the latter of the simplicities and sanctities of Home, for he is the poet of the heart, and thither the heart turns amid all its wanderings and its wounds. There it would rest at last. "Let me die among my kindred," exclaims the Orientalist. Home!

"How dark this world would be
If when deceived and wounded here
We could not fly to thee!"

It is for this reason that Cowper, whose muse is so conversant with the "business and bosoms" of men, has secured so triumphant a place in the af-sections of all the lovers of true poetry, while Pope, however brilliant in poetic conception, and perfect in the harmony of numbers, must consent to enjoy his regal dignity, an object of admiration, rather than of affection in his exalted sphere. Burns said that the muse of his country found him as Elijah did Elisha at the plough, and threw her mantle of inspiration over him. If, obedient to the mandate of his mistress, the poet abandoned the plough for an elevated field of fame, the freshness and the fragrance of his rural associations still clung around him, and he delighted to write poetry to the mountain-daisy, which he had upturned with the ploughshare; that "wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower," as he calls it, whose fate he seemed to consider emblematic of his own:

"There in thy scanty mantle clad
Thy snowy bosom sunward spread,
Thou lifts thy unassuming head
In humble guise,
But now the share upturns thy bed
And low thou lies!"

"Such is the fate of simple bard
On life's rough ocean luckless starved."

But he learned many a useful lesson at the domestic fireside and altar, which, had he remembered and practised, would have saved him that agony of feeling, which he himself describes in those fine verses entitled, "Man was made to mourn."

"Many and sharp the numerous ills
Inwoven with our frame,
More pointed still we make ourselves
Regret, remorse and shame."

From the poisoned cup of self-indulgence he drank pain and sorrow till the agony of his soul became chronic, and the dignity of genius bowed beneath the sway of a base and despotic passion. The stream of poetic feeling was tainted too early and deeply in his young manhood to admit of clarification, and by his own confession, there was more than one line written, which "dying he would wish to blot." When, however, he burst away from the spell of temptation, abandoned for a season his boon companions and exchanged the roar of the bar-room for the tranquil seclusion of home and homeborn associations, then his genius, plucking away every foul adhesion, and pluming its wings for a serener flight, would achieve something worthy of his own spreading fame, and of the deeply religious feeling of his beloved country. Thus, in that most celebrated of his productions, the "Cotter's Saturday Night," which in fact is a painting of a family scene—his own father's home being the original, he proceeds in this strain:

"Oh Scotia! my dear, my native soil!
For whom my warmest wish to heaven is sent,
Long may thy hardy sons of rustic toil
Be blest with health, and peace and sweet content,
And oh, may heaven their simple lives prevent
From luxury's contagion, weak and vile!
Then, how'er crowns and coronets be rent,

A virtuous populace may rise the while
And stand a wall of fire around their much lov'd isle."

Here are patriotic sentiments strongly engrafted on domestic sympathies, and the heart of Scotland leaps for joy at the sound of this music. Crowns and coronets may glitter with hereditary lustre, but here is a patent of nobility from the author of mind, a diadem of beauty, the lustre of which does not fade. This dominion of genius is most truly imperial, because of its essential strength, and that strength arises from the influence which falls upon the heart.

If now we contemplate the sister arts in the same relation, we shall be struck with similar results. Although the field of the painter is comparatively limited, yet in that field the triumph of the art has been wonderful. If it be one of the attributes of genius to diffuse its energies far and wide, it is a not less important attribute to concentrate its powers within a small compass, and to execute so condensed a view of a great moral subject, as to produce a proportionate impression on the susceptibilities of the soul.

It is here that the power of the pictorial art is confessedly preëminent. The poet, availing himself of the succession of time and place, can select and combine from all the circumstances of the past, and thus at will pass through the present to the future, and if necessary even retrace the glowing path of his imagination. But the painter, compelled to seize one moment of time and one local position, summons all his powers to the mighty effort, and bestows on that point the whole strength of his genius. He may have studied for years a design which is to occupy but a few square feet of canvass. But he paints for immortality, and deep must be the studies, patient the toil, exhaustless the perseverance of such a mind. He aims not merely to please the eye. That could be done by the simple process of fine coloring. He seeks to stir the deep sea of human sensibility. He desires to reach the most retired and secret fountains of feeling in man, and hence he must commune for days and nights with nature herself in her multiplied forms and in her beautiful developments. Some minds are more affected by natural scenery than by any other source of moral influence. To such the rich landscapes of Titian would convey a most refined and delicate pleasure. For besides the impression produced by a view of the charms of nature, there would be the emotion of admiration for the triumph of genius in transferring, as by some magical art, the features of still life to the canvass. It is thus, that a combination of moral causes has a tendency to increase the power of intellectual enjoyment. What then must have been the pleasures of Michael Angelo, who was not only the first of painters, but eminent also as a sculptor and an architect, and even as a poet, distinguished by the power of his imagination. Who can measure the power of such a mind to impart and receive pleasure? When the eminent painters of modern times would display the highest perfection of the art, they seem by the very instinct of genius to select the most elevated and impressive subjects, and these subjects they could find no where but in the Scriptures of Divine Inspiration. The same is true of the great masters of music, who have delighted the world with their productions. Haydn sought the idea of his Creation, Handel of his Messiah, Beethoven of his Mount of Olives in the sources of holy inspiration. Of the vast influence of their works upon the mind of the world, it is unnecessary to speak. It was under the promptings of a similar spirit, that Milton, that great moral painter, that architect of the most sublime poem in existence, invoked the aid of the spirit of God at the very threshold of his immortal work, and intending "no middle flight," sought to imbibe his inspiration at "Siloa's brook, that flowed fast by the oracle of God." It must hence result, that the more widely Christianity extends her empire in the earth, shaping the purposes and sanctifying the sensibilities of men, the more certainly will their taste seek its gratification in such works, rather than in those, which abound in the machinery of gods and demons, or of elves, witches and fairies, and especially rather than in those, which pander to the passions, debauch the imagination and corrupt the heart.

The names of Raphael, Rubens, Van Dyke, Paul Veronese, Salvator Rosa, Leonardo da Vinci, are familiar in the history of painting. If you inquire which are the most successful and the most celebrated of their productions; what subjects did they choose, on which to spend the force of their genius, the reply is: THE THEMES OF INSPIRATION: The preaching of Paul at Athens; the Death of John the Baptist; the Judgment of Solomon; Saul at the tomb of Samuel; the Miracles of Christ; the Transfiguration; the Crucifixion; the Resurrection; the Descent from the Cross; the Last Supper; the Last Judgment. Were these men attracted solely by the moral beauty and the essential grandeur of their themes, or did they not also with a kind of prophetic vision anticipate the day, when, in consequence of the supremacy of Christianity over the mind of posterity, their own bright and sublime creations would so harmonize with the spirit of that illustrious age, as to secure to their fame an amaranthine freshness to the end of time? Did they not, in addressing their works of art to the religious sensibilities of man, expect to find in them responses of the deepest tone and of the most undoubted perpetuity? Now, though the colors should fade from their canvass, other master spirits will arise, to imitate their example, perhaps to surpass their achievements, and while they reform that which is vicious in point of morals, will add purity to the profession, grace to the art, and grandeur to its results. The Roman and Grecian, the Florentine and Venetian schools will then have passed away, to be succeeded by that last and noblest, the CHRISTIAN SCHOOL.

In adverting to the influence of architecture on the mind, three things are to be considered. Comprehensiveness of design, beauty of proportion and sublimity of expression. These qualities are essential to the highest success of the art. When combined, they excite some of the strongest sentiments of the mind, and especially when viewed in connection with antiquity, though in broken forms, they become invested with so many interesting associations and awaken so many powerful recollections as at times almost to overwhelm the mind. Thus the temple of Theseus at Athens, so remarkably preserved, though built ten years after the battle of Marathon, presents not merely a specimen of the material sublime, but connects itself with the history of that wonderful people, who reared its magnificent columns, which have weathered the storms of two thousand years. It is thus that architecture, amid the ruins of time, furnishes here and there a sublime and comprehensive symbol of the history of the past; and the grandeur of the human intellect transmits its own imperishable evidence to the latest posterity. Poetry has not withheld its tribute from the sister art. The author of the "Seasons," not insensible to any of the forms of beauty, whether in the visible world or in the empire of the imagination, thus speaks:

"First unadorned
And nobly plain the manly Doric rose,
The Ionic then with decent matron grace
Her airy pillar heaved; luxuriant last
The rich Corinthian spread her leafy wreath."

Any form of art that could thus be described, must be emblematic, and emblems most strongly affect the imagination. Here, then, is another source of sentiment in the department of architectural design.

But the assigned limits of this paper do not permit me to pursue this train of thought. In reviewing those arts, at which we have glanced on the present occasion, we see prepared on the one hand the beautiful images of poetry—the rich colors of painting—the moral sublimities of eloquence—the soft melody of music—the silent eloquence of sculpture—the impressive designs of architecture—and on the other, certain mental susceptibilities, by which the influence emanating from these arts is enjoyed. There are faculties in men, each one of which meets some creation of immortal genius by a law as certain as that which adapts light to the eye, or sound to the ear. Why then should the human intellect ever slumber, or why should the mind ever be at a loss for sources of rational pleasure? What expectations may not be indulged with reference to the future?

OUR COUNTRY is young in years, but where is there such a land to excite human intellect? Her reminiscences are indeed brief, but brilliant. Her promise is great and animating. Look at her giant mountains—her broad rivers that rush sublimely to the ocean—her beautiful lakes, each one a mimic sea—her deep, untrodden forests, so luxuriantly vast, so wildly grand—her widespread scenery, varied with every tint of beauty, that ever fell from Nature's pencil—how much is here to awaken the genius of poetry and of painting! Contemplate her institutions—their origin with the people—conquered by the people in a conflict, a parallel to which history does not furnish—secured by a power that resides within themselves—chartered by their own authority—the very nature of the American government demands the utmost freedom of thought and latitude of discussion on all subjects, and this is the condition of the highest eloquence. With the advancing refinement of society, all the sister arts will advance, each occupying its appropriate niche in the great temple of science, and all combining to instruct the mind and soften the manners of a stern and enterprising people. Go on then, my beloved country, encourage every rising genius. Multiply your institutes of science and your halls of literature. Let there be an alliance of nations to foster the arts and to forget arms. Let the sword of war continue to sleep in its scabbard, and the trump of battle no more rouse the wrath of contending hosts, nor the tramp of hostile squadrons shake the ensanguined plain, but may the general strife be, who shall most successfully cultivate the arts of peace, and promote the happiness of universal man.

GIVE ME A TALISMAN OF LOVE.

Give me a Talisman of Love!
 Let it be graven with light,
 And hidden characters that move
 The spirit in its might.
 Give it a pow'r to chain
 The fancy, in its upward range
 For gems of thought,
 To wean the soul again
 From its resistless thirst for change
 That life has brought.
 Give me a Talisman of Love!
 Let it be wrought when Day
 Embraces Evening—and the dove
 Hies to her nest away.
 Then, as by tuneful streams
 I tread in the far sunny land
 To which I go;
 The form in all my dreams,
 Born of that Talisman, will stand
 By me—and low
 Sweet echoings of th' oft touch'd lyre
 Will brood my thoughts among,—
 And incense on the altar fire
 Of memory be flung.

A PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF EDWARD MORELAND.

A TALE OF WASHINGTON CITY.

"The course of true love, never did run smooth."

It is both pleasing and melancholy to indulge occasionally in the reminiscences of youth—to fall back upon those days when the imagination waned in all the luxury of anticipated happiness and joy, and

"Hope, enchanted, smiled and waved her golden hair."

The cares and sorrows of after life are deepened by the contrast, and time mellows the past and arrays it in the beautiful couleur de rose. Though "man never is, but always to be blest," I have always found a melancholy pleasure in retracing the years that have passed away and are buried in the gulf of time. My heart was blighted by early sorrow, which for years withered its energies and gave a gloomy tinge to my feelings—yet I now look back upon the event, with emotions, which partake more of pleasing sadness than pain. I proceeded to narrate the melancholy incident of my early life to which I have alluded.

One evening, in the summer of 1792, I was journeying from Baltimore, then comparatively a village, to Georgetown, to become an inmate in the dwelling of a relative, who had invited me to come and live with him, in consequence of the recent death of my only surviving parent. I was about eighteen years of age, dreamy, sensitive and melancholy. I paused on the spot which had been cleared for the foundation of the capitol, a structure now viewed with wonder and admiration for its magnificence and beauty by every American. The infant metropolis of our vast republic had been laid out; but it was still in all the wildness of nature. Dense forests covered the space which is now overspread with fine edifices, or laid out in cultivated fields. A winding road, cut through the woods, led through the lower part of the new city to Georgetown. A romantic stream, then termed Goose Creek, flowed between its woody banks from its source to the Potomac, and a few stones afforded a passage where the water was shallow, to such as travelled on foot. The picturesque beauty of this city at that period, was such as to lead me to take frequent strolls through its "deep shades and awful solitudes," and to wander amid the cool groves, and over the small farms scattered here and there within its limits. On one of these occasions, I had taken a direction north-west of the hill, or elevation, on which the capitol now stands, and followed the Tiber towards its source, amusing myself as I went with my gun, though not the proper season for game. The feathered tribe was numerous, and I was more anxious to obtain specimens for a small collection I was forming, than for the mere pleasure such sport would afford me. Being fatigued with my walk, I threw myself on the bank of the Tiber, beneath the shade of a large oak that cast its ample branches over the stream. The spot was clear of underwood for some distance around me; the mocking bird warbled her "wood notes wild" among the thick foliage of the trees—

"Now soft, now full, now melancholy slow,
With dying cadence, thrill'd the tone of woe."

The stream murmured over its pebbly bosom at my feet; the partridge repeated its plaintive note from the dead branch of a tree a few paces off, and the whole scene was eminently beautiful and tranquillizing. I recall it now, after the lapse of nearly half a century, with emotions I cannot describe, especially when I look upon the very spot on which I then reposed. Alas! how changed! How has the march of improvement disfigured the face of nature, and rendered what was once picturesque and beautiful, a solitary waste. While indulging in a delicious reverie, I thought I heard a strange and unusual sound not far from me, which recalled my wandering thoughts. I rose, and upon looking in the direction whence the sound proceeded, I beheld a fairy vision, such as my wildest dreams had never pictured, standing, like a marble statue, in mute and motionless terror, at a short distance in my rear. I instantly discovered the cause. An enormous rattle snake, with head erect, his forked and fiery tongue vibrating with the quickness of lightning, and his eyes emitting almost living sparks, was in the act of making a fatal spring upon a beautiful girl, who seemed to be under a species of fascination, and to be fixed immovably to the earth. Not a moment was to be lost. I was near enough to render her the assistance she needed. My gun was, fortunately, charged with large shot, and the whole contents were deposited in the head and body of the deadly serpent. It writhed for a moment and then fell dead before me. The lovely creature I had thus providentially relieved, seemed to be sinking to the earth in a swoon. I hastily caught her in my arms as she sank, bore her to the stream and bathed her temples in its waters. She revived, looked at me for a few moments in mute surprise and apparent pleasure; thanked me for my kind interposition, and invited me to her home, which, she said, was close at hand. Her voice was gentle, soft and musical; a blush suffused her cheek as she spoke and she seemed to shrink from the intensity of my enraptured gaze. I had never seen a being so beautiful. She had burst upon me like a splendid vision and I felt, for the first time, the overwhelming power and influence of that passion, which none can resist, and but few can control.

Emma Marlow was about sixteen years of age. Her form was airy and delicate like that of a sylph. Her hair was a rich dark auburn and hung in loose and natural ringlets over her shoulders; her nose and forehead were of the Grecian mould; her eye, "darkly, deeply, beautifully blue," and her complexion was fair, brilliant and tinged with the hue of the rose. She lived in a neat little farm-house not far from the place where I first saw her. On either side were fields of grain, in the rear a small kitchen-garden and orchard of various kinds of fruit, and in front was a yard enclosed with rude pailings white-washed, and a stile, instead of a gate, served for an entrance to the house. Two magnificent black oaks spread out their leafy branches before the door, and roses and other flowering shrubs decorated the line of fence and the borders of the yard. Emma's father received me, I thought, coldly, though she had told him the cause of my visit. He was an Englishman who had removed to the little farm he cultivated some eight or nine years before, and led a life of total seclusion. He was morose and apparently unhappy, and had brought Emma up in the same seclusion from the world. Mrs. Marlow was, however, much more kind and affectionate; had been better educated and had taken great pains to instruct her daughter, their only child, in all the branches of knowledge she understood. Emma was indeed a simple child of nature. She had scarcely ever seen a human being but her parents—was wholly ignorant of the world and lived in a region of her own creation. Her thoughts were pure, innocent and holy as those of an angel, and her heart was all tenderness and affection. After remaining a short time, I asked to be permitted to renew my visit, and the assent of Marlow was reluctantly yielded. I felt, I scarcely knew why, a strong aversion to this man; but the passion which ruled me, in some degree overcame my repugnance to him. It was not long before I called again, and was received by the sweet Emma with the most unaffected demonstrations of pleasure and delight. She was too unsophisticated to disguise her feelings, and I was exquisitely happy to find I had made a favorable impression on her young and innocent heart; and that the glowing and ardent love she had inspired, was likely to be reciprocated. I was almost constantly with her; I felt wretched when I was not near her, and though the distance we lived apart was considerable, scarcely a day passed over me that I did not openly, or by stealth, contrive to see her, and to breathe out the deep affections of my heart. The beautiful girl soon told me of her love, for she could conceal nothing, and we seemed to inhale the very atmosphere of paradise. How exquisite were those moments of my life! My frequent absence from home was at last noticed by my uncle, and learning the cause, he expressed great regret and some indignation at my conduct, and insisted upon my devoting myself immediately to the study of some profession, and abandoning all idea of connecting myself, at so early an age, with one so obscure, unknown and indigent as she on whom I had so imprudently placed my affections. This was a severe blow, and one I had not anticipated. I had been so long accustomed to my own will, under my too indulgent parent, that I did not dream of a check of this sort, and I bore it with great impatience; but I, nevertheless, did not like to offend the only relative that was left to me; and, when I reflected too on my dependent condition, I began to feel that, situated as I was, it would indeed be madness to involve myself and the object of my affections in poverty and want. Marlow had also, I learnt, prohibited my visits to his daughter and would not allow me to see her. To prevent our intercourse, he compelled her to remain shut up in her room, and we were thus debarred the happiness of each other's society for several weeks. It is impossible to describe the wretchedness I endured during this interval. I in vain attempted to pursue the studies marked out for me in the profession I had chosen. Emma's image was constantly before me—she engrossed my whole thoughts, and study was impossible. I became moody, desponding and abstracted. I haunted her neighborhood like a troubled spirit. The consciousness of being near her, possessed a charm, I could not resist. I stretched myself on the banks of the stream which flowed near her residence and would gaze for hours on her humble dwelling. Emma was, I afterwards learnt, equally miserable. She became gloomy and dejected. Her lively and animated laugh was no longer heard, and she seemed to give herself up to the influence of despair. Marlow at last became uneasy. He had had several other children, but all had died save the lovely being on whom all my hopes of happiness here were centred. He was fearful that she, too, might be taken from him, and he began to relax in the rigor of his treatment to her. He, therefore, permitted her to stroll about the garden and orchard and wander along the banks of the stream I have mentioned. I had erected a small bower on the borders of this stream, soon after we became acquainted, where we were wont to meet. It was a rude and temporary structure, covered with the trumpet flower and native grape-vine, which I had trained around it and the fruit of which, in season, hung in clusters from its branches. One day I took my accustomed walk in the faint hope that I might once again behold the sole object of my thoughts. I almost instinctively repaired to the bower I have described, and what was my rapture when I beheld the beautiful girl, seated on the rustic bench I had formed, with her head reclining on her hand and gazing pensively on the rippling waters of the Tiber. "Emma, dearest Emma," I cried, rushing into the bower. "Do I again behold you?" She raised her head, uttered a scream of joy and fell into my arms. I pressed her convulsively to my bosom, and imprinted one long and burning kiss upon her beauteous lips.

Great God! what a moment of bliss was that! and how distinctly and vividly memory now recalls it to my mind. I told her of all I had suffered during our separation, which seemed an age; of the impossibility of existing without her, and, in the madness of the moment, entreated her to become mine. "Edward," she said, gazing on me with a look of melancholy tenderness, "you know my heart, how much—how deeply I love you; but I am under the control of my parents, I cannot, must not disobey nor anger them. My father, I fear, will never consent to our union, and I cannot do any thing to offend or make him unhappy. Edward, I am miserable—most miserable. The only blissful moments of my short life, have been those I have spent near you. I felt a new existence when I first became acquainted with you, and I thought that nothing would be able to interrupt the happiness I enjoyed; but I was deceived—our long separation and the wretchedness I have endured have made me know that this world is not one in which hearts like ours can expect to enjoy the happiness for which they were formed"—

"My dear Emma," said I, interrupting her, "it pains me to find you indulging such gloomy thoughts and presentiments. We are both young—very young, and there are yet long days of happiness in store for us. The obstacles now in our way cannot always remain, and we shall—we must yet enjoy long years of happiness together." Her long lashes were moistened with tears; she gazed fondly and tenderly into my eyes; her dark auburn tresses, parted on her pale forehead, hung loosely over her shoulders and a roseate tinge colored her cheeks. Her vermilion lips were partly open and displayed a row of pearly teeth, and as I looked upon this beautiful being, I felt as if gazing upon the exquisite loveliness of an angel. She was indeed

"All that youthful poets fancy when they love."

"Would to heaven, Edward," she said, "that it may be so; but I feel a strange presentiment of evil I cannot account for. I have thought of you by day and dreamt of you by night, and oh! how joyous have sometimes been those dreams. I would awake to the misery of knowing you were not near me and that I might not see you again. One night I was melancholy and feverish, and my dreams were wild and painful. I thought we were walking together along the paths we have so often trodden in delightful converse, when, all at once, I heard the report of a gun and felt a sudden pain in my heart. You caught me in your arms, but I was dead. Again I thought I was stretched upon the bed of sickness; you stood over me and wept, and I wept to see you weep—suddenly you disappeared—I was in great agony; but soon, I thought the heavens opened and I saw angels descending, who surrounded my bed and bore me gently up—ward to the sky. I felt as if they were bearing me from you forever; I called upon you to follow me, and in my misery awoke. Dear Edward, it was but a dream, and I was so happy," and she rested her head upon my bosom. A sudden peal of thunder startled me from this dream of happiness, and I perceived that the heavens were overcast with dark and lurid clouds, and that a heavy storm was rapidly approaching. I hurried Emma home, but the storm burst upon us before we had time to reach it and we were both thoroughly drenched with rain. Mrs. Marlow invited me in and was very anxious about the safety of her daughter. Marlow was confined to his bed by sickness, and as the violence of the storm did not seem likely to subside, I was requested to remain during the night. Marlow became worse,—I proposed to sit up with him and render him such assistance as was in my power. Mrs. Marlow was alarmed and readily acceded to my request. All night he was restless and delirious and spoke incoherently of Emma, of persons in England, of his children he had lost and of me; muttered something about just punishment, and of returning to England at all risks and taking Emma with him; seemed to think he was conversing with some nobleman, whom he appeared to be reprimanding for something he had done. All this was mysterious and incomprehensible to me, but it struck me as indicating some mystery connected with Emma's birth, which I was resolved to inquire into. Towards morning the delirium left him and he sank into a sleep which lasted for several hours. When he awoke he was much better and appeared to be grateful for the attentions I had shown him. I urged upon him the necessity of calling in a physician, to which he reluctantly consented. The remedies of the doctor, I had employed to attend him, proved efficacious, and in a few days he was convalescent. I was now constant in my visits, and Emma and I were permitted to enjoy each other's society without restraint. She had, however, taken cold from her exposure to the late storm, and its consequences began to alarm me. The usual remedies were resorted to, but the fever was not subdued for some weeks, when she was again able to accompany me to our former haunts and to take our usual rambles in the neighborhood. But I observed that she was troubled with an occasional cough, which, however, I flattered myself was temporary and would soon leave her.

One day, while seated together on the banks of the Potomac, whither we had wandered for exercise, Emma broke out into an eloquent eulogy on the splendid scenery around us. "This is a beautiful world, Edward," she said, "and few, very few, I should think, would be willing to leave it, especially while young. How rich and gorgeous is the coloring of yon cloud, and how very smooth and glassy is the surface of the river which reflects it back, with the beautiful landscape along its banks, and yet how soon it will all vanish. Does it not resemble in its changes the course of this life? I had a sweet little brother once, about six years old. He loved me tenderly and I loved him with equal ardor. I thought him a very wonderful boy: he was so sensible, so affectionate and tender. We were always together. He would gather the prettiest wild flowers he could find and lay them in my lap, delighted to be able to please me. His little heart was the seat of tenderness and sensibility. He seemed to dote on inanimate nature, and he would sit by himself and listen to the moanings of the wind, or gaze at a beautiful flower for hours at a time. He had a favorite mocking bird, that he had taken while young and raised with great care. It was fed from his hand, and when its first wild mellifluous notes were heard, he rushed into my room, with rapture beaming on his dear little countenance, to lead me to its rude cage and hear it sing. He had given it my name, and cherished it with the tenderest regard. Poor boy! his fine bird, on which his little heart was set, was killed by father, because he had, in his anxiety to attend to his bird, which he feared was sick, neglected to do something he had ordered him to do. He wept bitterly for hours, and seemed as if his heart would break. I sympathized with my sweet little brother and our tears were poured out together. But young as I am, dear Edward, I have felt the stroke of misfortune and suffered deeply. Henry was punished cruelly for giving way to the gentle feelings of his nature, but for what father called his obstinacy. The sweet boy never raised his head afterwards, but became dispirited, moping and sad, and in a few weeks, was struck down by a fatal disease, which carried him to his grave. In his last moments, while lying speechless on his little bed, he beckoned me to come near him; a tear glistened in his soft blue eye, he held up his little mouth to be kissed—smiled a faint smile, raised his hands towards heaven and expired—my God—my God." Emma could say no more, but sobbed aloud and wept for a long time without interruption. "Edward," she said, after she had recovered some degree of composure, for I would not attempt to check her tears; "you see that I have had my sorrows like others, and often while gazing upon the bright cold moon as she moves silently and slowly along the azure depths of heaven, I think of this hapless and beloved boy, and feel as if I should like to be with him, a pure and spotless disembodied spirit, floating in the ethereal realms of the blessed." There was a pathos in her tones exquisitely touching and plaintive, and I could not resist the feelings it inspired. "Dearest Emma," said I, "those thoughts are too gloomy and distressing. You are too young and our present happiness is too real to allow them to intrude upon your mind, or to be indulged at all."

The next day the ceremony of laying the corner stone of the magnificent structure, now occupied by the legislature of the nation, was to take place. Great preparations had been made for the occasion. The illustrious father of his country was to be present and officiate at the ceremony. The Masonic brethren, the volunteer companies and citizens of the district were to form a procession, and many of the inhabitants of the adjoining counties of Maryland and Virginia attended from curiosity. I prevailed upon Emma to be present. The day was bright and glorious, and we took our stand where the procession, as well as the ceremony could be seen to advantage. Emma was charmed with the spectacle. Brought up as she had been, it was not only novel, but surprising and delightful to her, and she could scarcely restrain her feelings of admiration and astonishment. General Washington was seen, "proudly eminent," amidst the throng of human beings around him. He was, as usual, calm, composed and dignified. All eyes were fixed upon him with admiration and gratitude. An officer of middle age, who, I afterwards learnt, had served with him during the war and whom he highly esteemed, stood near him. I was struck with the noble expression of his countenance. He appeared to be about thirty-six years of age, with a form of great beauty and a face which, though marked with the lines of latent grief, was noble, manly and impressive. Our position rendered us visible to General Washington and the officer who accompanied him. I observed that his eye rested frequently upon Emma, and he appeared to be inquiring of those near him who she was. In a short time he approached the place where we stood, and catching a full view of Emma's face, he started back with some surprise and exclaimed—"Good heavens, how perfect is the likeness." Emma became alarmed and begged me to return. I was about to comply with her wishes, when the gentleman, observing our movement, hastened to overtake us, and begging our pardon for his apparent rudeness, asked to be informed of my companion's name and residence, assigning as a reason for the inquiry, the extraordinary likeness she bore to a once dear and beloved friend of his, now no more. He seemed disappointed when he learnt who she was and where she dwelt, and withdrew, after again apologizing for his curiosity. We remained till we saw the corner-stone laid and the interesting ceremony concluded. This incident made a strong impression upon my mind and excited Emma's surprise. It formed the topic of conversation as we returned, and when we arrived, I mentioned it to Marlow, who treated it lightly, but commanded his daughter never to go out again to be exposed to similar rudeness without his permission. After a while, he reverted to the subject, made several inquiries as to the appearance, countenance, apparent age, &c. of the stranger, and when told, said that it was very extraordinary, and that he could not account for it. The next day, as usual, I was proceeding to the abode of her who engrossed my every thought, when I was startled by the sound of a horse rushing furiously past me, without his rider. Fearing that some serious accident had occurred, I proceeded rapidly in the direction from which the horse had come, and after a few minutes walk, heard the groans of some one evidently in much pain. I repaired to the spot and found the officer I had seen the day before with Gen. Washington, stretched upon the ground, so much injured as to be unable to move. He still, however, retained his senses, but was in great pain. It appeared that the horse he had ridden, and to which he was not accustomed, had suddenly started at something he had seen, while the rider's mind was absorbed in thought, had thrown him from the saddle, in the stirrup of which one of his feet had become entangled, and had dragged him, in that state, a considerable distance, till his foot was released. I hastened to Marlow's, near whose house the accident had occurred, to obtain assistance and permission to carry the stranger there, till he was in a condition to move. Marlow made no objection, and aided by a negro man whom he employed on his farm, I bore him on a litter to the house. The physician who had attended Marlow was sent for, and it was found that the officer's shoulder was dislocated, and that he was, otherwise, so much bruised and injured by the accident as to disable him from leaving the house for some days. Marlow, though convalescent, was still confined to his room. I remarked that his conduct to me had undergone a perceptible change. He was no longer morose and sulky when I visited him, but kind and conciliatory in his manner, and permitted me to be as often with Emma as I pleased. Of course I did not neglect to avail myself of so favorable a change. My studies were, therefore, but little attended to, and my uncle was so much occupied in some new pursuit, that my absence was not often noticed. I did not fear that he would long withhold his assent to my union with the innocent and beautiful being on whom I had placed my affections, when he had seen and become acquainted with her mild, gentle and affectionate character. In a few days the stranger had recovered sufficiently to sit up, and one day, while Emma and I were seated in the little room which served as a parlor, he suddenly entered, and when he saw her, expressed the same surprise he had shown when he first beheld her on the occasion I have mentioned. He approached and took a seat near us, and spoke to Emma. He said that the interest her very strong resemblance to the lady he had once known had excited, led him to seek out her residence for the purpose of making some inquiries of her father, and that in doing this, he had met with the accident which has been described. "I have felt for you," he continued, "an unaccountable regard and affection, and beg that you will not be offended with me for the warm interest I have taken in you." Emma assured him that, on the contrary, she was very much gratified with his notice; and her fine countenance expressed what she felt. She had warmly sympathized in his sufferings—and there was something so sincere and affectionate in his manner that she could not resist the feeling of tenderness which had sprung up in her heart. He seemed to be delighted at this assurance, and the charming naivete and unsophisticated outpourings of her innocent mind. While thus engaged in conversation, Marlow entered the room. He had just left his chamber and had, therefore, never seen his guest before, and as soon as his eye fell upon his countenance, he started back suddenly with evident astonishment. The stranger, the moment he saw him, exclaimed—"Good God! can it be possible? Are you not the Marlow I once knew years ago, as the game-keeper of Lord Willoughby, or do my eyes deceive me?" "No! you are right. I am that unfortunate man. The will of heaven must be obeyed—the decrees of destiny will be fulfilled. Mr. Darwin, I have done you wrong, and have been unfortunate ever since I assented to the act. Thank God! it is in my power to make you some reparation. Sir, you see before you your child. Emma, behold your true father." Emma sprang from her seat and rushed into the arms of her father, who was powerfully agitated by the mingled feelings of surprise and joy. The scene was deeply affecting, and the explanations which followed elucidated the apparent mystery.

Col. Darwin was the son of a poor curate in England, who officiated in the parish church near which the estate of Lord Willoughby was situated and in which his family worshipped. The youngest daughter of this nobleman was a frequent attendant at the church where young Darwin also worshipped. He was in his nineteenth year, and possessed of great personal beauty, and she about seventeen years of age, when he first saw her. Eleanor Morton was extremely lovely and fascinating, and all who beheld her admired and loved. It was Mr. Darwin's good fortune, by his prepossessing appearance and known high character, to interest her attention and it was not long before a deep rooted attachment sprang up in the hearts of both.

"Each was to each a dearer self."

And their love seemed to acquire strength from the difficulties and impediments which the difference of rank threw in their way. They contrived, notwithstanding, to meet often clandestinely, for what will love not overcome? And Eleanor Morton finally consented to be privately married to the man, though poor and humble, on whom her young and ardent affections had been bestowed. Lord Willoughby was at last made acquainted with their secret intercourse and attachment through some unknown channel, and his rage knew no bounds. He resorted to the most cruel expedients to destroy this connection and wielded the power which his rank and wealth gave him without remorse to accomplish his object. His daughter was immediately sent to a distant relative, in a remote part of England, and with instructions to be strictly watched and guarded, and he caused young Darwin to be seized, pinioned and forcibly carried to Portsmouth and put on board a British man-of-war, as an impressed seaman. The commander of this ship was a cousin of his oppressor and was made acquainted with the offence of the youth thus placed in his power. The ship sailed the next day, and young Darwin was compelled to submit to all manner of hardships, indignities and ill-treatment. He frequently endeavored to make his escape, and after several months detention, was so fortunate as to succeed and effect a landing on the shores of America, destitute and penniless. The American Congress had just issued the famous Declaration of Independence. Darwin was so indignant at the treatment he had received, and so disgusted with a government which could tolerate, or permit the outrage he had suffered to be perpetrated, that he entered at once into the patriotic feelings of the Colonists and embarked in their glorious struggle, with a determination to sink or swim with them. He remained true to the cause he had espoused; soon distinguished himself by his bravery and good conduct and rose rapidly from the condition of a private to the rank of a Colonel, and was highly beloved and esteemed by his commander-in-chief and all his military associates. Not knowing where to address his wife, if he had had an opportunity, which the war, by prohibiting all intercourse between the two nations, prevented, he found it useless to write, and when, after the restoration of peace, he did inquire, he learnt to his misery, that she no longer existed. His wife, in the mean time, gave birth to a daughter, and, to destroy all evidence of the ill-fated connection she had formed, Lord Willoughby caused it, while still an infant, to be put into the hands of his game-keeper, Marlow, whom he was about to discharge from his service for malconduct, and bribed him, with a large sum of money, to carry his infant grand-daughter to France, bring her up as his own child and never suffer her to know her relationship to his family. Marlow had been married but a few months before, and the magnitude of the sum he was to receive overcame all his scruples. He removed to France, where he remained till the close of the revolutionary war, when he came to America. He rigidly and faithfully adhered to his engagement, till the loss of all his children by premature death, produced some "compunctious visit-ings of nature," and led him to write secretly to the unhappy mother of Emma and inform her of the existence of her child. His wife, too, had often urged upon him the propriety of this step; but whether his letters had ever reached their place of destination he had not learnt. The unexpected appearance of Darwin, whom he believed to be long dead, at once determined him to keep the secret no longer, though he had formed a strong attachment to Emma. Then, the father and daughter, by a wonderful interposition of Providence, were once more brought together, and the happiness this union produced was indescribable. Col. Darwin was delighted with her charming naïveté, modesty and innocence and her extreme loveliness, which recalled to his memory the beauty of her mother, from whom he had been so cruelly torn. He was not displeased with our mutual attachment, but thought that Emma was yet too young to enter into the marriage state. I was of course permitted to continue my visits; but alas! my visits and all else were of no avail. Poor Emma had been struck by that fatal and insidious disease which carries so many of the young and lovely of this world to an early grave. The cup of happiness which the tender father had, after years of suffering, begun to taste, was soon to be dashed from his lips, and the beautiful being to whom he had given life, and whom we both so much loved, was fast hastening to the cold and narrow bed prepared for all the dwellers on earth, and, like the fragile flower of summer, was passing away to be seen no more. It would be utterly useless to attempt to describe my feelings as I watched the rapid progress of the fatal disease. Oh! how intensely I prayed for her restoration, and how earnestly and fervently I offered up my supplications to the throne of mercy, to spare her to us, but for a few years longer. It was long before I could admit the terrible truth and believe that she so young—so beautiful—was to be snatched away, at the very moment she began to feel the joys of life; and the happiness of a young and ardent attachment. But it was not so with this beautiful creature, she felt the conviction that her continuance here would be but short, and that a separation from all she loved would soon take place. Day after day I watched over her, ministered to the alleviation of her sufferings, spoke to her of days of health and happiness yet to come—kissed her pale brow and wept in agony to see that all was vain. She looked like a seraph, and when a smile irradiated her countenance, she resembled an angel of light. Her father's misery, it was painful to witness, and Marlow and his wife were both deeply grieved and afflicted. Col. Darwin could not tear himself away; day passed after day and still he remained to watch the progress of that disease which was to take from him so dear and inestimable a treasure. Mutual sympathy bound us strongly together, and he loved me because I loved his pure and beautiful child. But I will not dwell upon this scene of misery. One evening I was seated in Emma's chamber with her father who could not, like myself, bear her out of his sight. It was a rich autumnal evening. The sun was just sinking behind the elevated ridge that surrounds the metropolis and gives it the appearance of a natural amphitheatre; the clouds were burnished with the richest golden tints, and the whole western sky was arrayed in the most splendid and gorgeous colors. Emma asked me to assist her to the window, that she might once more look upon the beautiful scene on which she had so often gazed. I bore her to the window, sat down by her side and held her in my arms. She looked for some time in silence on the scene. Her soft blue eye was turned towards heaven, in adoration and silent prayer—a tear stole down her pallid cheek, which was tinged with the hectic flush of her disease, the beautiful hue of deceptive loveliness, and never before had she appeared so interesting and beautiful. She looked like a being of a better and purer world, and I gazed on her with uncontrollable tenderness, admiration and sorrow. "Dearest Edward," she said in a soft, feeble and plaintive tone, "I feel that I shall not be long with you. The sweet dream of life is nearly over, and I am fast hastening to that world where the weary find rest and where we and all that we love on earth shall meet again in undying bliss. I have been like a frail and tender flower that buds in the morning and perishes in a few hours. Short has been my existence, and till lately, I cannot say that it has been very happy. I have been cut off in the first dawn of youth, and in the enjoyment of that happiness which a warm and tender attachment, when returned, cannot fail to bestow. But I do not murmur. It is the will of Him who made me and who placed me here to obey and suffer, and I submit. You will sometimes think of me, dear Edward, when I am gone, and strew flowers over my humble grave: I have loved you, oh! I cannot say how tenderly"—she heaved a convulsive sigh, raised her eyes towards heaven, her head sank upon my bosom and she was no more.

I have little more to add. For years I continued in a state of despondency and misery. Time has alleviated my sorrow, but memory will still recur, with painful accuracy to this melancholy event of my long life. Emma was buried in the rural grave-yard attached to the Rock Creek Church, not far from Washington.

"Embalmed with tears I saw her body laid
In the cold grave, by Friendship's hands convey'd—
I saw her dear remains the earth surround,
And prostrate bathed the consecrated ground.
Angel of light! thy image long shall last,
And gild the lovely visions of the past;
Long as the powers of pensive mem'ry rove,
No time shall wither from my heart thy love—

Long as through life's divergent paths I stroll
And rove from clime to clime, from pole to pole—
Still in the haunts of men, or silvan wild,
Will mem'ry linger where my Emma smiled."

The last letters written by Col. Darwin and Marlow had reached the hands of Mrs. Darwin, whose father had died a few months before, and she hastened to rejoin her long lost, but still beloved husband in America, and the daughter whose death she had mourned so many years. She had remained true to her first unpropitious love, and though frequently urged to marry, and though she knew not that her husband lived, she had firmly adhered to her resolution to live and die the wife of no other. She arrived a few weeks after the lamented death of her daughter. Colonel and Mrs. Darwin, accompanied by Marlow and his wife, who determined to follow their fortunes, removed to the west, where they settled, and where, as a reward for their long sufferings and afflicting loss, they were blessed with a beautiful progeny—and spent their days in the enjoyment of domestic tranquillity and happiness.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

A WORD TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER.

The Messenger has long had two standing rules, founded in such strong expediency as to amount almost to necessity.

1. When a discontinuance is ordered, all arrearages must be paid, or the order will not be heeded.

2. If a discontinuance is not ordered before the January No. is published, the subscriber is set down for another year.

These rules have been published for several months among the "CONDITIONS," for the express object of giving notice to all. Still, orders to stop are received, without the arrearages being paid; some have given notice since the January No. was sent to them; and some few have refused the January, No. though sent, and returned it. Is this fair and liberal, when they have our printed "conditions?" They have the whole year to make up their minds and to give notice, as we require. Yet they suffer the proprietor to lay his plans with the expectation that they are subscribers. He sends them his work. They refuse it. He loses it; or if sent back, it is defaced and often ruined by its double transmission, and then necessarily marked with the subscriber's name. All this causes trouble, inconvenience and loss to the Proprietor, when all the fault and neglect are on the part of the patron. It is known that the January No. is always mailed the first of the month; and discontinuances should not only be started, but received before the No. is issued. Again, a few who gave notice too late last year and continued to take the work, suppose that the old notice stood over to the next year. In such case, how are we to know but that the notice is waived altogether, as it often is, and the subscriber become so pleased with the work that he would not give it up? A new notice must be given. To those who have not paid and those who have given notice too late, the Messenger will be sent, and as they had fair warning and we have committed no fault, they will not hesitate to pay for it.

We tender a hearty welcome to the new subscribers, who are coming in and whose letters contain such flattering notices of the Messenger. There is room for them and their friends, and no effort shall be spared to make the Messenger more and more worthy their high encomiums.

COLLEGE CONVENTION OF VIRGINIA.

A convention of the Colleges of Virginia recently assembled in this City. Their proceedings were conducted so silently, that we hardly knew any thing of them, before their deliberations were closed. Seven institutions in the State were represented; and those who had deemed it expedient to conduct all the preliminaries in silence and comparative secrecy, to avoid the chagrin of an open failure, had their hearts greatly encouraged by the flattering results. There are now in this State nine colleges besides the university. The venerable William & Mary, (under no particular sect;) Hampden Sidney, of which the Richmond Medical College is a branch, and Washington College (Presbyterian); Randolph Macon, Emory and Henry and Bethany (Methodist); the Richmond College (Baptist) and Rector College. Besides these, the Catholics have an Institution of the Collegiate order, in the vicinity of this City, which was not represented. The Rev. Henry Ruffner, D. D., President of Washington College, presided over the Convention, and the memorial presented to the legislature is from the pen of the talented President of Randolph Macon, Landon C. Garland, Esq. The University was not invited to unite in the Convention, because she was already endowed; and the principal object of the Convention was to memorialise the Legislature in favor of the Colleges of the State, and to solicit a donation out of the Literary fund of some twelve thousand dollars per annum, to be divided amongst them all. The Literary fund has now an annual surplus of a larger amount: the sum actually appropriated to the use of Common Schools is not expended and an average balance of seven thousand dollars is annually left in the treasury. The total available capital of the Literary fund is $1,496,486.51. Its annual increase is about $13,000; its annual revenue about $89,000.

At one time the annual surplus of the Literary fund above sixty thousand dollars was to be appropriated to Colleges and Academies; but during the existence of the Law, its provisions were never carried out, and it has since been repealed. Its existence, however, in past time shows the interest then taken in the Noble cause of Liberal Education, and furnishes an example worthy of the imitation of the present Legislature. Indeed, does not the fact of such a law having existed for several years without the beneficiaries under it receiving any of its fruits, furnish ground for an appeal even to justice as well as liberality? The University receives $15,000 annually, which should never be less; the Military Institute at Lexington $1,500; and the remaining eight colleges ask for $12,000 to be distributed amongst them. This is not even in proportion to the alms that a generous man in moderate circumstances gives those who seek his charity. The Legislators may hesitate to appropriate any money to such purposes for fear of raising the taxes. What patriot, what true friend of the people, would not, if necessary, be willing to go before his constituents with the cry of "Education and an increase of the taxes" upon his lips? Yes, if necessary increase the taxes; or reduce the expenses of the State and give the amount saved to the colleges. But in the present instance, no increase of taxes is required. The funds are already raised and now sought to be applied to the purpose, for which the law in time past designed them. The people of this dear old Commonwealth are awakening to a sense of the importance of Education. A year or two since, we attended for several days an Education Convention in this City. Its zeal was noble, its efforts most laudable and its discussions animating. It did much to arouse the attention of the people to the interests of Education; and the startling facts disclosed by the last census appeal strongly to every patriotic mind. We enlist ourselves boldly and unreservedly, forever, in the cause of Education and covet influence to cast it into its scale. What can it be to jeopard the most cherished political position in defence of so mighty and beneficent an agent? Should defeat come and receding favor leave your bark, the advancing tide of intelligence will take it up and bear it successfully on. If one's country be not destined to advance, it checks the efforts of the patriot. If it be, though he may anticipate the progress of improvement and be doomed to disappointment, his day of honor will come and be the more bright from the foresight which he displayed. Efforts laid out in prospective good thus make an unbounded return into the bosom.

Whilst upon this subject we will advert to an able document submitted by the Governor to the Legislature; written by Major Francis H. Smith, Principal of the Virginia Military Institute. The great difficulty in Popular Education is procuring suitable teachers. This difficulty must be overcome by the establishment of Normal Schools for the preparation of teachers for the Common Schools. If the State will grant the appropriations asked, the Colleges offer to educate gratis annually sixty three students, to be selected in such way as the State may prescribe. These young men may then be required to engage in teaching for a certain number of years, as the State Cadets at Lexington now are; and in this way the long felt deficiency of competent teachers may be supplied. This benefit of itself will be nearly worth the whole appropriation. The gifted sons of the poor will thus be raised up ornaments and blessings to their State and Country.

The defects of the present system of Common Schools are pointed out by Major Smith and the remedy proposed. His principal proposition is novel and striking;—That such Counties as wish Common Schools established, shall raise three fifths of the amount and the State shall then furnish the remaining two fifths, as she now does, to her banks and other corporations. We are not prepared to decide upon the merits of this Scheme; but it is worthy of due consideration. Were the cause of Education confined to Virginia, its importance and our own ardent feelings on the subject would have led us to say thus much, and even more, were it useful. But every State in the Union and especially every Southern and Western State is vitally interested in it. The North has already done her part. But the other portions of the Union are yet in the infancy of Educational Enterprise. Still that infant is a Hercules who is crushing or removing every obstacle. The University of Nashville has recently added a Law and a Medical Department; and the reports of exhibitions and commencements from every State show that the friends of learning are "up and doing." How our hearts warmed towards an eloquent vindicator of the Institutions of learning, in one of our Southern Legislatures, from the demagogical assaults of one who denounced them as designed for the benefit of the rich at the expense of the poor. We read the speech with deepest pleasure, and think the Colleges of Alabama (we believe it was) should present the author with a medal, or vote of thanks. Every man whose heart is at all educated along with his mind is a blessing to the poor around him; their truest friend and safest counsellor. We bid all the friends of Learning God speed. For Virginia, we hope the day is near when a moral and intellectual atmosphere will be spread through her whole extent as pure and invigorating as the air that fans the blue summits of her mountains.

MR. EVERETT AND PRINCE ALBERT.

Some time since, the University of Oxford, in testimony of his well known attainments, conferred upon our Minister to the Court of St. James, the distinguished degree of D. C. L.; "Doctor of Civil Law." The students present on the occasion manifested decided discontent at the honor thus conferred, because the recipient was a dissenter. Mr. Everett afterwards, however, received every acknowledgment for this disgraceful conduct. Since then, the queen, in her visits and pilgrimages, has honored Cambridge with her presence. Whilst there, by her order, that University conferred the degree of D. C. L. upon Prince Albert. Now, we really admire the spirit and principle of her Majesty in providing handsomely for her Consort, and in conferring upon him every title to the honor and respect of her subjects over whom her choice has elevated him. But all this appears, in truth, far more creditable to the Donor than to the Princely recipient. Such a relative position, in any other condition of life, would be strongly remarked. The exalted rank of royalty can not alter its intrinsic character. Morally, which of the above instances presents the grandest and most enviable spectacle? The ideas of the sternest republicans are affected and impressed somewhat by the splendor and high-wrought associations that cluster around Majesty. Thus, when a royal favorite comes forward to receive distinguished honors, the regard of the Great, the attendant pomp and circumstance, unless the object of it be palpably unworthy, lend much dignity and importance to the occasion. But blind favoritism, where it has the power to bestow them, may squander the rewards due to Excellence. Far beyond all this is the consideration due to the Man, who, left free to the untrammelled tendencies of Society, makes for himself a just claim to what he can never obtain as a mere gracious boon. Who has ever heard of the Learning of Prince Albert? Princes may be and have been eminently learned. If so, honor them for it, though they are Princes; but not because they are Princes, or the spouses of Queens. Mr. Everett, by the mere force of ability and learning, drew from strangers, prejudiced and inaccessible, this tribute to his genius; and the objections and murmurs which he encountered only exalt his merits. Still higher do the objections since raised and the opinions of the three Eminent Counsel, who have pronounced his degree "null and void," elevate him. Let the unsought honor be cancelled; the evidence which it furnishes, can never be destroyed. Mr. Everett may lose some legal rights or privileges which the degree when valid confers; but must ever appear more worthy of the distinction than the Prince Consort of a people whose laws measure Literary honors and qualifications for office by standards purely religious. We do not here vindicate dissent, for we do not intend to introduce such topics; but the illustration was too striking not to be adduced to show the superiority of intrinsic excellence and self wrought Honor, above the dignity of mere station and the favor of Queens.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE, JOHN RANDOLPH, &c.

The National Intelligencer of the 27th of Jan. contains a deeply interesting and animating account of the progress and prospects of the "National Institute," at Washington. The proceedings of the last meeting are prefaced by some beautiful remarks of the Secretary, Joseph R. Ingersoll, Esq., in which he portrays the advantages and glory of such an Institution and urges its claims to the patronage and aid of the Federal Government. His and Mr. Woodbury's views place the right and propriety of Congress fostering it upon high and impregnable grounds. The Institute, though so young, has accomplished a vast deal and is already attracting the attention of the learned at home and abroad. It can not compare as yet with similar foundations in Europe; but with the liberal aid of an Enlightened Government, it may ere long rank with the noblest Literary and Scientific Establishments of any country. The British Association has expended since its establishment £83,000, about $410,000 in Scientific investigations. A meeting of the learned in this Country will be held in April next, in Washington, under the auspices of the National Institute. The Association of American Geologists and Naturalists and other Scientific and Literary bodies will attend; and an address will be delivered by Hon. Senator Walker. It will be a noble gathering, we trust, worthy of the cause and the occasion. Hon. John Quincy Adams has consented to deliver the annual address before the Institute. * * * * The Biography and speeches of John Randolph of Roanoke of which we have spoken, by a fellow congressman from New-York, will soon be published by William Robinson of New-York. We trust that the Work will become the subject. The Virginian who is engaged in a similar task will have an opportunity of learning and supplying the congressman's defects. Jacob Harvey of New-York has been entertaining the readers of the New Mirror with some lively and graphic sketches of the distinguished Orator. In portraying some of his eccentricities, some have thought that Mr. Harvey presented him in too unamiable a light. Certainly the writer had no such intention. The friend and companion of Mr. Randolph, he had an opportunity of studying his character, and noting his thoughts; and he reveres his memory too much to make the least assault upon it, directly or indirectly. A friend requests us to unite in a call for a just and suitable memoir of Mr. Randolph. We hope that the works in progress will meet his wishes. Many private papers have been furnished by Mr. R.'s relatives to the Virginia Editor, whose work, therefore, will be full and authentic. We are requested to solicit information and materials for the "Memoir" from any who may be able and willing to furnish them. All communications on the subject can be addressed to the Editor of the Messenger. * * * * A letter from the West informs us, that the Harpers will soon issue a new novel, exhibiting true pictures of the manners and condition of early Western Society, entitled "Young Kate."

The author was formerly of Virginia and is a gentleman of taste and talent.

CHEAP PUBLICATIONS.

It does not seem to have occurred to any one actually to doubt the cheapness of much that comes to us under this ad captandum garb. It has long been an established fact, that the lowest priced is not always the cheapest; and much that goes about with the sweet name of "Cheap Literature" would be excessively dear if a high bounty were attached to it. How many, to save a little money, have bought demoralization, licentiousness and falsehood; have encouraged speculations and extortions that they are wont severely to condemn. To all such we commend the following pointed extract from the Long Island Star, Edited by Wm. Oland Bourne, a contributor to the Messenger.

"The great law of nature, which requires an equality of interest, cannot be violated with less impunity than any other law, and, if it be, its penalty will come along with it. The commercial spirit, as we have termed it, effects this, and brings with its operations a fearful penalty.

"The demand for cheap books—the competition in furnishing cheap—cheaper—cheapest—is effected at the cost of an amount of evil which is more than equal to the advantages which ensue. A steamer arrives—two or three publishers receive a copy of a new work—the commercial spirit impels them to seize the moment for its publication, and the low price at which it is sold obliges them to give low wages; yet the necessity of laying it before the public on the instant, requires Sabbath-labor, night-labor, and injury to the mind, morals and health of a hundred men and boys, and young women, who are obliged to ply their fingers unremittently in folding and stitching an edition of a work which runs through from fifteen to forty thousand copies from a single press. This out of the way, read, thrown aside, the appetite makes its demand again, and is again satisfied—and while the public are reading what they call CHEAP LITERATURE, if its price was footed up in Sabbaths violated, the consequent moral injury, the pain and unceasing toil, the wearing out, the miserable compensation the laborers earn, the social unhappiness and evils, and deprivation of all that makes a moral creature comfortable and happy—they would think that after all 'it costs as much as it comes to!' and yet 'the people do not think!'

"When these results are seen, and young men are obliged to resort to unlawful means of procuring subsistence, and young women are obliged to sacrifice their honor, is there not a greater price paid for the cheapness, than if the means of useful, happy and dignified labor were meted out to them."

But there is a still more direct view of the question. The republication of many standard works neatly bound, was done very cheaply before the era of "Cheap Literature" commenced. Since then, however, those works have been thrown off in numbers, unbound, often from stereotype plates, at very little cost. These, no doubt, constitute the most wholesome portion of the so called Cheap Literature; and the mere fever of the thing has given them a most extensive circulation. But in many cases, the entire number costs as much, or more, in proportion, than the older issues. They must be bound for preservation, and even for convenient use. Many numbers are lost, or injured, and must be replaced; a loss, to which those at a distance from the binder are particularly exposed. In proportion, too, the binding is more expensive, than when it is done by the regular publisher. In this way, many have paid more for works in No.'s, than they could have bought the same editions for, in handsome form, from the book stores. Directly and indirectly, morally and economically, we do sincerely doubt, and in a great degree totally deny, the benefits and cheapness of CHEAP PUBLICATIONS."

Notices of New Works.

[COMMUNICATED.]

MEXICO AS IT WAS, AND AS IT IS. By BRANTZ MAYER, late U. S. Secretary of Legation to that country. New York, 1844. J. Winchester, 8 vo. pp. 360.

We have scarcely time, at this moment, to do more than call the attention of our readers to the very interesting and valuable work before us. At a future day, we promise them and ourselves, the pleasure of dwelling more at large upon its contents, in connexion with the other important publications, relating to Mexican life and history, which have recently issued from the press.

The Republic of Mexico has been, as our readers well know, any thing but a favorite, of late years, with the good people of this country. The Texas question and some other matters of unadjusted difficulty have not left our judgments in that state of perfect equilibrium, which impartiality demands. We have heard but one side of the story, and have believed it to be true, because the other side has not reached us. In this state of our minds, it is particularly important that we should call to our aid the testimony of intelligent and impartial witnesses. If it is worth while to know any thing of our sister nation and neighbor, it is certainly worth while to know the truth. It is, moreover, especially important, that, at the present moment, we should possess ourselves, fully, of all possible, accurate information, in relation to a country, whose revolted province, not less than herself, is intimately associated with one of the most important political measures, in which the interests of the South has ever been at stake. We refer, of course, to the annexation of Texas to the Union, and the increase of the influence of Great Britain in Mexico herself. Every item of information, political, social or statistical, which goes to enlighten our citizens, as to the real character, power, resources and tendencies of the people, whose action may so deeply involve our whole Southern population, should be deemed an actual, beneficial service rendered to our country.

It is with a view to this, even more than to the admirable entertainment which is afforded every where, by the graphic pages of Mr. Mayer, that we commend his book to the especial perusal of our readers. Mr. M. has long been known as a graceful and accomplished writer, whose taste has been refined by travel and cultivation, while his previous opportunities of enlarged observation have rendered his means of comparison and accurate judgment particularly extensive. Introduced, by his personal character and official position, into the most distinguished circles of Mexican refinement and intelligence, he has been enabled to do that justice to the real worth of the nation, which no traveller, with similar advantages, has ever rendered. The external peculiarities of the Mexican people—as well as their in-door life—their amusements, politics, religious ceremonials and observances, are sketched with all the skill, which a keen eye, an enlightened taste, unflinching humor and a graphic pen, have enabled him to exercise. For the beauties of nature, so prodigally scattered over the whole surface of the Republic, Mr. Mayer has displayed equal fondness—having preserved many of them by his pencil, for the admiration of his reader, and having warmed his eloquent descriptions, with the inspiration of both poet and painter. Sufficiently an antiquarian to find pleasure among the ruins of a mighty but departed civilization, he has likewise, with commendable and accurate industry, delineated a large number of the principal Indian monuments which will be found among the numerous illustrations of his volume. Those of our readers who have directed their attention to this subject, as treated in the elaborate history of Mr. Prescott, will find the plates and descriptions of Mr. Mayer to afford a most interesting accompaniment to their investigations. The latter part of the work is confined to historical, political and statistical history. Mr. Mayer appears to have labored zealously in the collection and collation of the mass of facts, which he has given, for the first time, to the world—and he has presented an accumulation of materials which, together with his profound and able reflections, the statesmen of our country will find of no small importance in the formation of sound conclusions, upon our future political bearing towards Mexico.

What has gratified us as much as anything in Mr. Mayer's book, is the total absence of that carping and censorious spirit, which is apt to accompany travellers from prosperous and highly cultivated nations, to those of humbler position. Racy as is his narrative throughout—redolent of wit and gayety, and sparkling and amusing incident—we nowhere find that truth has yielded to the love of caricature—or that the ambition to be brilliant has weakened the control of kind and liberal feelings. To us, this is by no means the smallest recommendation that a literary traveller can bring. It proves good sense, not less than right feeling, and it convinces us, whenever we see its existence clearly, as in the work before us, that reliance can be placed on what is stated as fact, and that attention is due to what is given as deduction. How few the books of modern travels are, of which this much can be said—let the experience of our own travel-ridden people teach them.

But, in conclusion, we commend Mr. Mayer again to our readers. We have given them our reasons for so doing, and we are the more happy to have been able to go so far, inasmuch as Mr. M. is a native and citizen of Baltimore, and may fairly be claimed, so far as talent can be sectional, as an ornament to the community of the South.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT, by Charles Dickens, Esq. Harper and Brothers, New York; Lea and Blanchard, Philadelphia; Drinker and Morris, Richmond, Va.

What has become of "Charles Dickens, Esq.?" We scarcely ever hear a word of him now. But it is a pity that he should be entirely forgotten and we come generously to snatch his name from oblivion. We have not, as yet, been induced to take any farther notice of Chuzzlewit, than to publish its funny title, and to brand the infamous plagiarism of which Dickens was guilty towards Joseph C. Neal of Philadelphia. Our reason for passing him by was to show the contempt we feel, and to pursue the course of indifference which a just pride should suggest. On this subject the last North American Review has the following very appropriate remarks. "The folly we yearly practise, of flying into a passion, with some inferior English writer, who caricatures our faults, and tells dull jokes about his tour through the land, has only the effect to exalt an insignificant scribbler into notoriety, and give a nominal value to his recorded impertinence. If the mind and heart of the country had its due expression; if its life had taken form in a literature worthy of itself, we should pay little regard to the childish tattle of the pert coxcomb, who was discontented with our taverns, or the execrations of some bluff sea-captain who was shocked with our manners."  "If Bishop Berkeley, when he visited Malebranche, had paid exclusive attention to the habitation, raiment and manners of the man, and neglected the conversation of the metaphysician, and, when he returned to England, had entertained Pope, Swift, Gay and Arbuthnot with satirical descriptions of the 'complement extern' of his eccentric host, he would have acted just as wisely as many an English tourist, with whose malicious pleasantry on our habits of chewing, spitting and eating, we are silly enough to quarrel. To the United States, in reference to the pop-gun shots of foreign tourists, might be addressed the warning which Peter Plymley thundered against Bonaparte, in reference to the Anti-Jacobin jests of Canning: Tremble, oh! thou land of many spitters and voters, 'for a pleasant man has come out against thee, and thou shalt be laid low by a joker of jokes, and he shall talk his pleasant talk to thee, and thou shalt be no more!'"

The opinions of Americans as to Dickens' last effort is unanimous and requires no expression from us. We have, indeed, a right to complain that he does us injustice in not exhibiting that talent and genius in his caricatures, for which we had given him credit. Any critique from us would not only be superfluous but would appear to proceed from national pique. As this motive can not be ascribed to his own countrymen and that he may not be entirely forgotten, this side the Atlantic, we have concluded to give our readers, the following critique from the December No. of the Westminster Review; a work which might be expected above all others to deal kindly with the author.

"Martin Chuzzlewit," says the Reviewer, "is a 'failure' compared with the former tales of Charles Dickens. We should scarcely say that 'Martin Chuzzlewit' displays no originality of talent; but the whole novel, as far as it has yet proceeded, is founded upon a mistake,—the mistake of supposing that a tale can be perfectly successful without the impersonation of a single character worthy of, or capable of exciting the reader's sympathy. In 'Martin Chuzzlewit' we are introduced to a world of knaves and fools, destitute of any one quality that could command respect. The best of them, Tom Pinch, excites only contempt or compassion for the mental imbecility which renders him the blind dupe of a hypocrite. Mark Tapley, a reminiscence of Sam Weller in 'Pickwick,' and of Brother Jack in Swift's 'Tale of a Tub,'—one who courts misery for the merit of braving it, and of showing that under the most adverse circumstances he can be jolly when other people are sad, is too unreal a conception for serious interest. The heroine is a young lady who has nothing to say except a few words at parting with her lover, whom she meets clandestinely by assignation in St. James' Park: and that lover is an egotist, and a greenhorn. Martin Chuzzlewit, the elder, is the old gentleman of the melodrama, rich, obstinate, and suspicious; and the rest of the personages described, the Jonases—the Todgeruses—Tiggs—the boy—the undertaker, and the nurses, are all of the lowest school of coarse cockney vulgarity. We may admit that some of these characters, although overdrawn, might serve as foils to happier delineations; but the picture has no relief. It has all the dark shades of Rembrandt without a touch of light; we contemplate human nature in 'Martin Chuzzlewit' only under an aspect which inspires loathing, and we can scarcely believe that we are reading the work of a writer once remarkable for a keen perception of the poetry of human life; one who had shown us God's image reflected back from the haunts of poverty, and to whom belongs the rare merit of such creations as Little Nell, Dolly Varden, Dick Nubbles, Miss La Creevy, and those scarcely less-to-be-forgotten favorites of the public, Richard Swiveller and the Marchioness.

"But perhaps the greatest fault of 'Martin Chuzzlewit' is an unjust and ungenerous attack upon the people of the United States, in the shape of a broad and bitter caricature. That a vast continent like America, somewhat twice the extent of Europe, should contain in its maritime cities a body of scoundrels and swindlers is not very strange: were none to be found there, considering how many have been sent from our own shores, the fact would be much more extraordinary; but strange it is and new and unaccountable, that such an observer as Mr. Dickens, travelling from Dan to Beersheba, should find all barren of goodness, and discover no other facts worth signaling in a country, the rapid growth of which is without a parallel, than the knaveries of land-jobbers, and the abuses of a press conducted often by English editors.

"What a false idea of American shrewdness and sagacity as shown in their choice of eligible sites for new townships, one of which, in twenty years from the time of its foundation, (Cincinnati,) contained a population of thirty thousand inhabitants, is given by Mr. Dickens, in his description of a new settlement in a swamp, which its land-marking originators had denominated Eden!

"But a more serious fault in the work is the ungrateful return (for ungrateful it must appear in the eyes of every American) for the enthusiastic reception Mr. Dickens met with in the United States,—in an extravagant satire of their hoo-baiting propensities. Martin, with no other recommendation than that of being a dupe, who, with the unconsciousness of a Peter Simple, is about to bury himself in a spot from which no one had returned alive, has his levée thronged from curiosity by the whole population from morning till night. We wonder it did not occur to Mr. Dickens that this satire might tell against himself. Was he only a Martin Chuzzlewit to the people of America, when they crowded to do him homage? But in truth his claims to the distinction were of a higher character, and it might have occurred to Mr. Dickens that the universal recognition of those claims was a fact not less honorable to the Americans than to himself. The universality of his reputation in the United States said something for an universality of education of which he would in vain look for similar evidence nearer home. In what part of England, Scotland, Ireland, or Wales, would Mr. Dickens count an equal number of readers and admirers, relatively to the whole population, than he found in every city, town, and village of the United States? We are sorry Mr. Dickens has adopted this course; for it rarely under any circumstances, and in his case least of all, is expedient for an author to seek materials for satire in other countries than his own. The good sought to be effected by it commonly fails, for even when the satire is perfectly just, it is received as only the offspring of national antipathies, which it never fails to increase; and we are not surprised to see from the American Journals that Mr. Dickens' attacks are treated as the mere ebullition of spleen consequent upon his want of success in obtaining an International Law of copyright: his present writings will certainly not promote that very desirable and important object. We make these remarks more in sorrow than in anger—sorrow that they appear to us needed; but we really have felt angry at our monthly disappointments of pleasure from Mr. Dickens' last publication. We trust the source of much former gratification is not yet exhausted."

We were present at the supper, which Dickens was teased into accepting in Richmond. The worthy President on that occasion took leave, as he was so much older, to warn Box against reclining upon his laurels. Dickens replied in a feeling speech, assured us that he would remember the caution and that the admiration of Americans would be his stimulus. He has not, properly speaking, reclined upon his laurels; but his course has been even more fatal to his reputation. His charm is gone. His pictures of pure and humble life, of virtuous hearts will lack the glow of sincerity and lose all their former attraction, for his own heart is wrong.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS. By Charlotte Elizabeth. pp. 357, 8 vo.

THE WRONGS OF WOMAN. The Little Pin Headers, by the same, pp. 115, 12 mo. John S. Taylor & Co., New-York. Joseph Gill, Richmond.

Personal Recollection is an interesting autobiography of its remarkable authoress. At the solicitation of her friends, and to prevent falling into unjust hands hereafter, she details her own history. We certainly do not admire mock modesty, and have more faith, than most persons, in one's capacity to know and judge himself; but a contempt for mock modesty may run into unnecessary boldness and, at least indirect, glorification. Charlotte Elizabeth, however, is so open in the matter and writes so fluently and independently, that the reader will not feel very harshly towards her, though he may think the autobiography of a living writer rather out of the way. She has opinions of her own and dares maintain them. Indeed she often writes not only like a man; but like one engaged in Public affairs. She says herself, that her writings have been objected to as too political; but that this could not have been otherwise from the discussions she so often heard in her father's house, by many eminent men, and among whom was the celebrated Doctor Parr. The manner in which she was allowed to mingle in their society; and the interest she took in their conversations must have tended to invigorate and stimulate her mind. She sometimes indulges in considerable asperity of language; indeed her expressions are generally strong. She denounces O'Connell as a murderer of the Irish, and says she was so disgusted with him, the only time she ever saw him, that she withdrew from all connection with the anti-slavery association of which he was a member. Still she exhibits the intensest devotion to Ireland, which her letters from Ireland also evince.

At another time she says she "had been learning to prize her native land in a disgusting region of all that is most directly opposed to liberty, civil or religious; to honorable feeling, just conduct, honest principle, or practical decency. In short, she had been in Portugal." Her recollections are vivid and graphically described. She is a bold and an enthusiastic writer and has done good; but, as a woman, we can not make her a favorite. We certainly admire her patriotism, her zeal and her absorbing nationality.

As to the other little work, we can not see why it should be styled particularly "The Wrongs of Woman." Little Joe excites our sympathies even more than his devoted sister; and men and boys are as much oppressed and exhausted by Factory employments as women and girls. The unkind step-mother of the principal "little pin headers" introduced drove her husband from his home; and this and other incidents remind us strongly of the wrongs of man. Still it presents some vivid and true pictures of the merciless exactions and oppressions practiced under the manufacturing system of England. But the whole is not as forcible as her own Helen Fleetwood nor as some papers founded on the same facts and disclosures that have appeared in the Messenger. England, with oppressed, starving and murdered HEATHEN children in her own bosom, heeds not their groans, nor the appeals of the philanthropists; but stretches out her powerful hand to enlighten China, to Christianise and guard India and to liberate the contented, because well fed, well treated and, compared with many of her own operatives, the well instructed, negroes of the United States. How animating the contrast in our own Factories! Where in all England is there a "Lowell Offering." This we suppose might appropriately be styled "the RIGHTS of woman."

HARPER'S ILLUMINATED AND NEW PICTORIAL BIBLE.
No. 1. New-York, 1844.

Drinker and Morris have sent us the 1st No. of this Work. Its Splendor and Beauty filled us with admiration, and we thought the highest credit due to the enterprise and taste of the Publishers. We have since seen a sort of protest against the publication, by some clergymen of New Jersey, who not only object to the principle of illustrating the Inspired Volume; but pronounce many of the illustrations to be obscene. The fine arts can not be better employed than in illustrating and impressing the Word of God. The nature and wants of the human mind render this highly beneficial; whilst the cultivated taste and the sense of the beautiful are gratified by the representations. There can be no doubt, then, as to the propriety and advantage of the plan of this costly Work; but all depends upon the execution, the purity, the appropriateness and expressiveness of the artist's designs. Without proof to the contrary, we strongly incline towards the Work; from the known principles and habits of the publishers. It is certainly a disadvantage attendant upon serial publications that one may, in their progress, become dissatisfied. The only security is the character of the publishers; and we feel disposed to rely upon that of Harper and Brothers and Mr. Chapman, who would not forfeit the reputation they now enjoy, by offending against modesty. There will inevitably be blemishes in the work. In the No. before us we would like to change some of the illustrations, which are badly chosen and worse executed. But we do not doubt, that its merits will far outweigh its defects and it will stand a monument of American skill, taste and liberality. The entire Work will contain sixteen hundred historical engravings; more than fourteen hundred of which are from original designs by J. G. Chapman, the author of the National painting at Washington, the Baptism of Pocahontas, and an artist of some celebrity. The illuminations are brilliant and Mr. Adams, the Engraver, has displayed great proficiency in his beautiful art. The whole will be completed in about fifty No.'s at twenty-five cents each.

D' AUBIGNÉ'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION. Abridged by the Rev. Edward Dalton. Second American Edition. New York, John S. Taylor & Co., 1843. Joseph Gill, Richmond.

The original work of D' Aubigné is among the most interesting of modern times. Its subject is the most important; his characters the most remarkable and conspicuous and the execution in many respects inimitable. It possesses a great deal of Dramatic power; and contains much of the most curious and engaging biography in the world. Luther, Melancthon, Zwingle, Erasmus, Spalatin, Myconius and a number of others possess uncommon interest. We have been engaged, at intervals, in reading the entire work; but absorbing as it generally is, its length is appalling to many readers, and some of its disquisitions, however important to the theologian and controversialist, are certainly tedious. The narrative itself is often exceedingly prolix; and the repetitions numerous and useless. All these faults appeal in favor of an abridgement. The one before us seems to be designed for youth, whose tastes and capacity might neither induce nor enable them to wade through the Extended History. Mr. Dalton has, as far as possible, retained the language of the author, thereby preserving, in some degree, the qualities of style and enthusiasm which lend such charms to the original. Every one should examine the History of the Great Reformation; and laying aside its Sectarian tendencies, no one presents it in more attractive form than D' Aubigné.

IRELAND. Dublin, the Shannon, Limerick, Cork and the Kilkenny Races, the Round Towers, the Lakes of Killarney, the County of Wicklow, O'Connell and the Repeal Association; Belfast and the Giant's Causeway. By J. G. Kohl, New-York. Harper & Brothers; Drinker and Morris, Richmond, 1844. pp. 115, 8vo.

LETTERS FROM IRELAND, 1837. By Charlotte Elizabeth. John S. Taylor, New-York, 1843. Joseph Gill, Richmond.

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE. Leonard Scott, & Co., New-York. Joseph Gill, Richmond.

No country surpasses Ireland in Historic and Intellectual interest. Her deeds and her eminent Poets, Philosophers and Orators have embalmed her forever. Whatever may befall her and however long it may continue, there is a vitality in her associations that can not be destroyed; but will, like the seed buried three thousand years with the mummy, spring up and flourish. We do not, as at present informed, anticipate any immediate benefit from the agitation of Repeal in Ireland; but the Emerald Isle will be brought prominently before the world—Her associations will be rekindled; Her History read; Her territory explored. In this way the vast centralising tendency towards England will be checked, and more of nationality be imparted to her. How long has England shorn Ireland of all her glory, claiming and enjoying the splendor of all her genius, besides exhausting her substance and expending her resources! The English majority must first have their sentiments gradually changed towards Ireland, before she can derive any of those benefits, which are hoped for in vain from an immediate repeal of the Union. Ireland should have a powerful Literary Organ; one that could force its Irish principles into England. Such a work would widely circulate in this Country. The republication of the Dublin University Magazine is to be suspended. We are not sorry for it. It is not very able and it is not Irish enough in its tone to render the Country the service it needs. Charlotte Elizabeth well says, "when Englishmen learn to view Ireland as she is, the first great step will be achieved towards making her what she ought to be."

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, for January, 1844.

This able Review makes a bold and admirable entrance upon a new year. The first article is upon Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America. He uses Mr. Griswold fairly and kindly, for his excessive amiability and charity in admitting so many writers amongst the poets of America and giving such numerous evidences of their claims. When a Compiler or Editor undertakes to discriminate, he should be required to do so; and his judgments are fair subject of criticism. It is impossible to deduce what was the standard of admission to the Grand Entrée. But for the absence of some names, we might infer it was the fact of having scribbled some verses in America. Even then, would not one or two specimens have sufficed for some who are honored with pages? As a Collection of American Poetry it is too limited and exclusive as to authors and productions; as a Selection, which it was intended to be, it lacks discrimination. The labors and difficulties of the work, however, must have been very great; and we are exceedingly obliged for a book which puts at our disposal a great deal of whose existence we would otherwise have been ignorant.

The Reviewer despatches Judge Haliburton of Nova Scotia, somewhat to our taste. The Judge is probably worthy of his notice; but "The Attaché" and "Change for American notes" certainly are not. Who would deal with coin small enough to change Dickens' "notes"? We should have to borrow from the Savages some of their worthless representatives of value and subdivide them infinitesimally.

The Review of Prescott's Mexico is labored; but interesting. It justly extols the splendid work; but wants arrangement; and for the space it occupies gives too little information about the Conquest. You know all about the book; but not about its absorbing subject. This may have proceeded partly from the recent appearance of the article on Cortés' Despatches. The other articles we can not now specify—The one on State debts is very seasonable.

THE STUDY OF THE LIFE OF WOMAN. By Madame Necker De Saussure, of Geneva. Translated from the French. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1844. Drinker & Morris, Richmond. pp. 288, 8vo.

This interesting work is after the order of "the Education of Mothers," to which the authoress refers, with merited praise. But the present work goes a step farther, and presents a novel idea in educating those who may not be mothers. There is much philosophy as well as philanthropy in the suggestions.

"The business of teaching is adapted to women, and were it not for the immense inconvenience and danger of exciting expectations that might never be fulfilled, it would be in preparing them to be mothers, that we should best succeed in forming their characters and their minds. Morality, intelligence, sensibility, all the faculties would be developed under the auspices of this hope; but who would dare to brave the dreadful grief caused by the feeling of having failed in the object of life, that grief which in married women without children, is carried sometimes to a deplorable excess? That would then be a happy discovery which should enable us to propose to young girls the career of teachers, without presenting to their minds the idea of becoming mothers. What could be better imagined than to engage them in teaching the children of the poor? The perspective of instruction, either in teaching one's self, or in overlooking those so employed, is perhaps the most favorable of any to the acquisition of solid information. It obliges the individual, to comprehend principles which are too often neglected in the education of women. The different degrees of advancement in young girls will be found to correspond with the kinds of instruction they may be expected to bestow. They may choose elementary books, translate them from other languages if necessary, and prepare useful reading of every kind."

The various humane and charitable institutions would afford an excellent opportunity, for carrying out this principle. It is very obvious that important movements in public sentiment are taking place in favor of woman. Her position in the more civilized nations, is as high as needs be; for she commands and sways. But seeing that her position is thus elevated and her power thus controlling, it becomes our duty, pride and interest, to consider how she may best be fitted to adorn her station and to wield for good her towering influence. As long as the guiding principle, of confining her to the private circle is adhered to, we will rejoice at the efforts to elevate her in purity and knowledge. Our authoress does adhere to this, and opens a rich mine of thought and suggestion, tending to the improvement and blessing of every stage of existence. The work is exceedingly systematic, and combines the most beautiful and sweeping generalization with the commonest details of domestic concern. And then the spirit of true religion sanctifies its philosophy, and breathes its perfume over every page. We would recommend to mothers and trainers of girls to bind it up with "The Education of Mothers," and to use them as a manual.

REMARKS ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Henry Lord Brougham, F. R. S. Member of the National Institute of France, and of the Royal Academy of Naples. Containing the concluding Series of Statesmen who flourished in the time of George III. Philadelphia, Lea and Blanchard. Drinker and Morris, Richmond.

The French Revolution has engaged the pens of some of England's greatest Statesmen, from Burke to Lord Brougham. In the present day, the writers who have taken it in hand, might be supposed to have exhausted the subject; but it will ever continue to be most fruitful and to give rise to the greatest extremes of opinion and deduction. An Englishman elevated by Majesty, to the titles of the realm, must be liberalised indeed, to think even soberly of this grand melodrama. As a general rule, we think it will appear, that those who have been elevated to rank, in England, from comparative obscurity, have been Tories, and especially will this be shown by the History of the Lord Chancellors. We observe that such a Work is now in progress from a very distinguished source. Lord Brougham may not always have been very consistent; but now, he is decidedly liberal and enlightened in his principles. This appears conspicuously in the merited castigation he has given Lord Lydenham, in the work before us. Lord S., Governor General of Canada, where he had full opportunity of imbibing prejudices and none of correcting them, was pleased to write some letters to England, betraying as great ignorance and narrow-mindedness, as malignity. Among other things, he pronounces our Political System a "bubble," which he hopes to see burst and does not think he will have to live very long to do so. He seems rather to exult at the idea of a war between us and England; for the "blacks" would soon ravage the Southern States and Canada and Nova Scotia could easily flog the North. How chaste, humane and honorable! How justly Lord Brougham gives him the lash; and how well he shows us that we need never regard such ebullitions of venom and prejudice. Such thoughts are not those of the Liberal minded English; and those who can at all appreciate our conclusive answers to the slanders heaped upon us, are also themselves prepared to make our defence. The volume also contains a sketch of Thomas Jefferson. These sketches are among the most entertaining and instructive productions of the times.

INTROITS: OR, ANTE-COMMUNION PSALMS, for the Sundays and Holy-days throughout the year.

Introibo ad altare DEI;
— ad DEUM, qui lætificat juventutem meam.
Philadelphia, Lindsay and Blakeston, 1844.

In the prayer book, printed in 1549, in the reign of King Edward VIth, there were particular psalms appointed to be said or sung, whilst the priest was entering the chancel to perform the ante-communion service. These psalms were appropriated to each Sunday and holy day, and from the place they occupied in the Church service, were called Introits. This work contains versifications of them. Many of them, we can not commend; but others contain all the beauty of the psalms, and the sweetness and melody of true poetry. What a beautiful image the following lines present!

"Till at last, in Autumn brown,
Rich with fruit of Christian worth,
As some full tree, I bow me down
To lay my burden on the earth;—
Leafless in the wintry grave,
Hopeful in thy Spring to wave!"

We have marked many places, which struck us as beautiful; but must forbear to quote them. Such publications should be regarded in two aspects, the one Literary, the other religious. The Messenger wishes to view them in both lights. Religion can never be safely separated from any thing, however secular; and especially, should it be infused into the Literature, the poetry of a people. It is often enforced under the terms morality and virtue. But there is no good reason for any such indirection, however innocent. If any thing be worth praising and vindicating, call it by its proper name and do it boldly. The work before us is very neatly printed, and issued and dedicated to the Bishop of Maryland. J. W. Randolph has it for sale.

NEW MAGAZINES.

We have received a number of a new periodical published at Mobile. It is an Octavo of 48 pages, issued monthly at three dollars per annum.

The Students of the University of North Carolina have issued a prospectus of a monthly, to be conducted by them and the professors; on the plan of the Yale Literary and the Collegian lately sent forth from our own University.

We rejoice to see such manifestations of a literary spirit beaming forth in the South.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW is published in the City of New York, by Saxton and Miles, the agents for the Southern Literary Messenger. It has just reached its second volume and is edited by an association of Literary gentlemen. It supplies a hiatus in our periodical publications, in being issued every two months. We often get tired waiting for a quarterly, and monthlies are necessarily devoted to lighter literature. This Review will rank between these two classes and partake of the character of both. The Northern journals highly commend it. Each No. will contain one hundred pages octavo; the subscription is three dollars per annum, in advance.

PRESCOTT'S HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO, &c. Harper & Brothers, New York. Drinker & Morris, Richmond.

The second and third volumes of this admirable History arrived soon after the issue of our last number. They fully sustain the commendation we then bestowed. As we can indulge our disposition to enter somewhat at length into the subject, we have little more to add. We hope soon to lay before our readers an article worthy of the work, from the pen of an excellent writer and ripe Spanish scholar. In the notice which he has kindly made of Mr. Mayer's last work, it will be observed that he promises soon to take a review of the whole subject connected with Mexico. In the mean time, let all who can, read Prescott's History, and their minds will glow with some of that fervor towards American Literature, which we shall constantly endeavor to infuse into these pages.

COUNSELS OF THE AGED TO THE YOUNG. By A. Alexander, D. D.

SELF-EDUCATION. By Tryon Edwards.

CHRISTIANÆ MILITIE VIATICUM; OR THE CHRISTIAN'S POCKET COMPANION.

A PATTERN FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS, &c. By J. A. James.

THE WAY TO SAFETY. Lectures to Young Men. By L. E. Lathrop, D. D.

These small, but beautiful and useful works, for all classes of youth and for manhood also, are published by John S. Taylor & Co., New-York, and sold in this City by Joseph Gill. They present some of the most important subjects that can engage the mind in a most attractive and impressive form, and enforced with the eloquence and ability of most polished moral writers.

THE COMPLETE CONFECTIONER, PASTRY-COOK AND BAKER, &c., &c., &c. With additions and alterations, by Parkinson, practical confectioner of Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Lea and Blanchard, 1844. Drinker & Morris, Richmond.

This is the work of which we have already spoken. Parkinson is known to every body who knows Philadelphia and this book will enable any one to make all the delicious things that have given fame to Parkinson's. Every housewife should have it.

SILLIMAN'S JOURNAL OF SCIENCE AND ARTS. Jan. 1844.

We again welcome this excellent Journal. It is full of learned contributions. We observe that the Editors still call for aid and we second their appeal. One of the few, and about the foremost representative of American Science and Arts, never should it suffer for want of proper encouragement.

IPHIGENIA AT TAURIS. A DRAMATIC POEM.

IN FIVE ACTS.

(Translated from the German of Goëthe.)

ACT IV—SCENE 1.

Iphegenia. Whene'er the Gods propose to vex a child of Earth

With wild perplexity, passing from Joy to Pain,
Again from Pain to Joy, in rapid hurried change,
Shaking his soul with doubt: Then ever, near at hand,
Or on some distant shore, they for his hour of need
Will raise him up a friend, of calm, collected mind.
Oh! may the blessing of the Gods still rest
On Pylades, and all he undertakes.
He is the young man's arm in battle's hour;
In council, the sagacious eye of age.
His tranquil soul its holy calm preserving,
Resting in imperturbable repose,
Out of its deep resources, still affords
To the harassed and wretched, aid and counsel.
While from my brother's arms I strove in vain
To disengage myself, but gazed on him,
And gazed again, and could not sound the depth
Of my own happiness, nor feel our danger,
He wisely tore me from him. Now they go
Down to the Sea, to carry out their plan,
For there their vessel, in a cove concealed
With their companions, waits the appointed signal.
Wise words they put into my mouth, and taught me
What answer to the King I shall return,
When he shall send to urge the sacrifice.
I see I must be guided like a child,
Unpractised in concealment as I am,
And all unskilled to win my point by craft.
Aias for falsehood! It has not the power,
Like Truth, to free the bosom of its load.
Instead of cheerful confidence, it fills
The breast that forges it with anxious care;
A misdirected shaft, by power divine,
Turned back to fall upon the shooter's head.
Care upon care bewilders me. Perhaps
The Fury, on the unconsecrated shore,
Again attacks my brother. They may be Discovered! Is not that the armed tread
Of soldiers? Is not this the messenger
Who from the King with hurried steps approaches?
How my heart beats, and how my soul is troubled,
That I must look upon the face of one,
Whom I must meet with falsehood on my lips.

SCENE 2.

Iphegenia. Arcas.

Arcas. Priestess, accelerate the sacrifice.
The King is waiting, and the crowd expects it.
Iphegenia. My duty and thy nod should be obeyed,
But unexpected hindrance intervenes
Between me and my task.
Arcas. What can that be,
Which countervails the mandate of the King?
Iphegenia. 'Tis accident, of which we are not master.

Arcas. Tell me, that I at once to him may bear
The tidings. On the death of these two men
He has decided.

Iphegenia. As yet, the Gods have not.
The guilt of kindred blood, shed by his hand,
Rests on the eldest. Him, the Furies chase,
The Evil seized him even in the Temple,
And the pure place his presence has profaned.
Now, with my virgins, to the Sea I hasten,
Whose waves, by a mysterious rite, shall wash
Pollution from the image of the Goddess.
Take care, that none disturb our mute procession.

Arcas. I will announce this hindrance to the King.
Defer thy holy work till he permits it.

Iphegenia. The Priestess only must decide on that.

Arcas. So rare a case the King should also know.

Iphegenia. His counsel or command can make no change.

Arcas. The great should be consulted, were it but For form.

Iphegenia. Press not for what I must deny.

Arcas. Deny not what is right and profitable.

Iphegenia. Make no delay then, for I cannot wait.

Arcas. Soon to the Camp, the tidings I will bear,
And quickly with his word return to thee.
Oh! could I bear him yet another message,
That would dispel our troubles. Thou hast not Observed the counsel of thy faithful friend.

Iphegenia. What I could do, with pleasure I have done.

Arcas. It is not yet too late to change thy mind.

Iphegenia. The power to change is not in ourselves.

Arcas. What is but hard, you call impossible.

Iphegenia. Thy wish misleads thee to believe it possible.

Arcas. Dost thou with such composure dare the worst?

Iphegenia. My trust is in the power of the Gods.

Arcas. It is their wont to save by human means.

Iphegenia. Their will is law. On that all things depend.

Arcas. I tell thee all depends upon thyself.

The anger of the King alone endangers
The Strangers lives: for long disuse has weaned
The army from the bloody sacrifice.
Many, whose adverse fate to foreign shores
Has borne them, have been made to feel how God-like
The face which, on the stranger in strange lands,
Looks with a friendly eye. O! turn not from us
What thou canst give. End what thou hast begun:
For no where does the mildness, which, from heaven,
In human shape, comes down, establish sooner
A Kingdom for herself, than where a People
New—full of life—bold—strong—but sad and savage,
Left to itself in anxious apprehension,
Endures this load of life.

Iphegenia. Oh! do not shake
My soul, which to thy will thou canst not sway.

Arcas. While there is time to profit by advice
We urge it, and enforce it by persuasion.

Iphegenia. You do but vex yourself, and give me pain,
Both to no purpose. Therefore say no more.

Arcas. Pain is a friend, that oft advises well.
I call on that to advocate my cause.

Iphegenia. I feel its power to afflict my soul:
But it cannot extinguish my disgust.

Arcas. Can benefits conferred by noble hands
Disgust a candid mind?

Iphegenia. Yes; if the giver,

However noble, seeks unworthily,
To win myself, and not my gratitude.

Arcas. Let inclination fail, and then excuses
Are never wanting. I shall tell the Prince
All that has happened. Oh! couldst thou remember
How noble, since thy first appearance here,
His conduct to this day has been to thee. [EXIT.]

Iphigenia. [Alone.] An ill-timed terror seizes me, inspired
By this man's words, turning my frightened heart
Back in my bosom. As the swelling flood
Pours its wild torrent o'er the rocks that lie
Concealed beneath the sand, one stream of joy
Had covered all my soul, and in my arms
I grasped the impossible. Again a cloud
Seemed softly to enfold itself around me,
Lifting me from the earth, and rocking me
Into the slumber, which the gracious Goddess
Cast round my temples, when she seized and saved me.
My heart, with all its energy, had grasped
My brother, and the counsels of his friend
Alone I heeded, while my soul was fixed
Wholly on their salvation. Like the Sailor,
Who turns his bark upon a desert Isle,
So Tauris lay behind me. Now, the voice
Of this good man awakens me again,
Reminding me, that here too I leave men.
Be calm my soul! Begin not now to waver
And doubt. The firm soil of this safe retreat,
Thou now must leave, and on the ship of life,
The waves again must rock thee, sad and fearful,
The world, and e'en thyself, alike misjudging.

SCENE 3.

Iphigenia. Pylades.

Pylades. Where is she? Let me bring the joyous news
Of our deliverance.

Iphigenia. Thou seest me here,
Laden with care and full of expectation
Of the sure consolation that you promise.

Pylades. Thy brother is restored. In cheerful talk
We wandered on the rocks, and to the sands
Of the unconsecrated shore. The grove
Unconsciously we left behind, and beautiful,
And yet more beautiful, the joyous light
Of youth flamed up, and played around his head.
His full eye beamed with courage and with hope,
And his free heart, surrendered to delight,
Exulted in the thought of rescuing thee,
His kind deliverer, and myself.

Iphigenia. May blessings
Rest on thy head, and never may the lips,
Which speak such tidings, utter the sad tones
Of grief and anguish.

Pylades. I bring more than this.
Joy comes not singly, but with kingly pomp
Attended. We have found our friends. Their ship
In a rock-girdled cove they have concealed,
And there they sat in moody expectation.
With joyful shouts they hailed thy brother's coming:
In earnest tones they press for our departure;
Each hand impatient longs to grasp the oar;
And, present to their wish, a whispering wind
Came borne on gentle pinions from the land.
Then lose no time, but lead me to the temple.
At once admit me to the sanctuary
And suffer me, with reverent hand, to seize
The object of our wishes. I myself
On practised shoulders will bear off the Goddess. [He goes towards the temple, and finding she does not follow he turns back.]

Oh! how I long to bear the precious burthen!
You stand and tarry!—Tell me!—You are silent,
And seem perplexed. Does then some new misfortune Oppose our happiness? Hast thou despatched
A well-concerted message to the King.

Iphigenia. I have, my friend. But still thou wilt rebuke me.

Indeed, the sight of thee reproaches me.
The royal messenger appeared, and I Spoke as you taught me. He appeared surprised
And earnestly insisted that the King
Should be informed of the unusual rite,
That we might know his pleasure. Now I wait
For his return.

Pylades. Wo! Wo! Danger again
Hovers around our heads. Why didst thou not Enshroud thyself in priestly privilege?

Iphigenia. For no such purpose have I ever used it.

Pylades. Pure soul! Then both thyself and us thou wilt
At once destroy. Why did I not foresee
This exigency, and instruct thee how
To baffle his demand?

Iphigenia. Blame me alone.
The fault is all my own. I feel it keenly;
But I could not deny the earnest prayer
Of one who urged by reason, what my heart
Acknowledged as his right.

Pylades. The tempest thickens:

But we must not despond, nor hastily
Betray ourselves by inconsiderate rashness.
Quietly wait the messenger's return,
And, be the answer what it may, stand firm:
For to the Priestess properly belongs
(Not to the King) the ordering of such rites;
And if he should demand to see the stranger
Afflicted with insanity, refuse it,
As if we both were prisoners in the temple.
But give us room, that we the sacred treasure
May snatch from this unworthy savage people,
And fly with speed. Apollo sends good omens,
And, like a God, at once fulfils his promise.
While the condition is yet unperformed,
Orestes is restored and healed. With him
Waft us, auspicious breezes, to the Isle,
The rock bound habitation of the God,
Thence to Mycenæ, which may then once more
Renew her splendors. Then the household Gods,
Out of the ashes of the extinguished hearth,
May lift their heads again, and cheerful fires
Once more illume their dwellings. Then thy hand
Shall scatter incense from the golden censer.
'Tis thine to bring back life and happiness
Across that threshold—to redeem the curse,
And with the blossoms of fresh hope to crown
Thy brother's lordly brow.

Iphigenia. Dear friend, thy words
Shed light upon my soul, and like the flower
That ever looks upon the sun, it turns
The genial consolation to inhale.
How precious to the lone desponding heart,
The cheering influence of a present friend,
Whose words are full of hope. In the shut breast
Thought ripens not, and resolution droops,
Till friendship's light matures them.

Pylades. Fare thee well!
I hasten now to satisfy our friends,
Who wait impatient. I shall soon return,
And 'mid the rocks and bushes I will lurk,
Waiting a sign from thee. What dost thou think of!
A shade of sadness o'er thine open brow
Suddenly steals.

Iphigenia. Forgive me. As light clouds
Before the sun, anxiety and care
Float o'er my soul.

Pylades. Fear nothing. Fear and Danger
Are fast allies, and seldom found apart.

Iphigenia. The thought is not ignoble, which would warn me
Not craftily to cheat and rob the King
Who made himself to me a second father.

Pylades. It is from him who would destroy thy brother
Thou flyest.

Iphigenia. He is still my benefactor.

Pylades. To yield to stern necessity, is not To be ingrate.

Iphigenia. 'Tis still ingratitude.
Necessity may palliate the act.

Pylades. And justify thee before Gods and men.

Iphigenia. But not to my own heart.

Pylades. Is there no pride
In so much strictness?

Iphigenia. I cannot reason it,
I only feel.

Pylades. Feel justly to thyself—
Thou must revere thyself.

Iphigenia. There is no joy
Except to hearts self-conscious of no stain.

Pylades. Here, in the Temple, it is well enough
To be thus strict. Life teaches more indulgence
To others and ourselves. Thou'lt learn this soon.
So intricate and complex are the ties
That bind our race together, that no man
Lives for himself alone, or in his commerce
With others can preserve himself unspotted.
Nor should we sit in judgment on ourselves.
Each man's first duty is to find the path
Appointed for him, and in that to walk.
What we have done we cannot estimate
And rarely know the worth of what we do.

Iphigenia. Almost to thy opinion thou persuadest me.

Pylades. What needs persuasion where thou hast no choice?

To save thyself, thy brother and thy friend,
There's but one way. Then wherefore hesitate.

Iphigenia. O! let me stay. For even thou couldst not Deliberately do such wrong to one
Whose generous confidences had bound thee to him.

Pylades. If we should perish here, the stern reproach
Of thy own heart will drive thee to despair.
Misfortune must indeed be new to thee,
Since, to escape such horrors, thou wilt not Give so much as one disingenuous word.

Iphigenia. O! that I had a Man's heart in my breast—
Self-fortified against each pleading voice,
Nor to be driven from a bold design.

Pylades. In vain dost thou refuse. The iron hand
Of stern necessity compels. Her nod
Is law supreme, which e'en the God's obey.
Sister of Fate, she holds her silent rule
Deaf to remonstrance, and thou too must bear
What she imposes. I will soon return,
And from thy holy hands receive the seal
Of our deliverance.

Iphigenia. I must obey,
For I too plainly see my pressing danger.
But oh! my fate affrights me more and more.
And must I too renounce that secret hope,
Whose beauteous light has charmed my solitude?
Shall this curse rule forever, and this people
Still grovel on unblest? All things decay.
The fairest fortunes and the strength of life
Must fail at last, and why not then this curse?

[EXIT.]

And have I vainly hoped, that, rescued here,
And from the fate of all my race preserved,
I might, at length, with unstained heart and hand,
Make expiation of my house's crimes?
My brother to my arms is scarce restored,
Scarce rescued by a sudden miracle
From dire calamity—the long wished sail
Scarcely appears to bear me to the port
Of Futherland, when stern necessity,
With iron hand, a double crime requires.
The sacred honored image, to my care
Committed, I must steal, and cheat the man
To whom I owe my life, and all its hopes.
Gods of Olympus! grant that in my breast
This deep disgust may not engender hate,
Such as the old Titanic Gods once cherished,
To tear with vulture-claws this tender bosom.
Save me! and save your image in my soul.

The long forgotten song rings in my ears,
Gladly forgotten. 'Tis the Parca's song;
The horrid strain they sung, as Tantalus
Fell from the golden chair. They suffered with him.
Fierce was their breast, and terrible their song,
I well remember it, as, in my infancy,
My nurse to me and to my sister sang it.
"Before the Gods let mortals tremble!
Strong are their eternal hands.
Through all the earth they work their pleasure.
He they favor most should fear.
Chairs are placed at golden tables
On cliffs and clouds. When strifes arise,
Down fall the guests, disgraced and humbled.
Low they lie in night's abyss,
And, bound in darkness, wait their sentence;
But still, around the golden board,
The everlasting feast goes on.

"Striding on from hill to mountain,
From the crannies of the deep
They snuff the sighs of stifled Titans,
That, like the scent of sacrifice,
Rising in a savory vapor,
Floats like a feathery cloud around them.
The rulers turn the eye of blessing
From whole races. In the grandson
They detest the speaking features
Of the grandsire they once loved."

So sang the Parca. Plunged in darkness,
The exile listened from his cave.
The old man thinks upon his children,
And in silence shakes his head.

MOUNT ARARAT AND THE THREE CHURCHES.

The public sympathy having been greatly excited by the massacre, lately perpetrated on the Christian Missionaries in Armenia, some authentic notices of the country, in which this outrage was committed, may not be unacceptable at this time.

The region, in which these Missionaries had commenced their labors, is, in many respects, one of the most interesting portions of the globe. It was there, that Xerxes, Alexander, Lucullus, Pompey, Mithridates and Antony, contended for the Empire of the world, and that the contest was finally decided in favor of the West against the East. Through this region, passed the caravans, destined to exchange the products of one vast portion of the globe with the other; it was there, that, in the opinion of St. Jerom, Bishop Huet, and many other learned theologians, Mount Ararat, on which the ark found a resting-place, was situated, and that Adam and Eve were created. With such claims, not only to attention, but veneration, this remote region is but little known, being out of the range of the great caravans of tourists, or only visited by those who construct romances from the materials they collect, and who, in general, pay little attention to the past history of the countries they visit. We must, therefore, look to Chardin, Theranot, Tournefort, and some others of the old-fashioned class of travellers, from whose works, the information, now about to be laid before the reader, is principally derived. More than a century has, it is true, elapsed, since these travellers existed, but the hackneyed classical quotation, Tempora mutantur et nos Mutamur in illis, will not apply to the people of the East. The times have indeed changed, but men have not changed with them. The contrast between the New and Old World, especially the Eastern portion, is a subject worthy the most curious inquiry. The manners, habits, dress, and modes of living, in the latter, have undergone little change, since the days of the Scripture Patriarchs, while those of the former are perpetually fluctuating. The history of Asia, since the age of the Bible, presents a succession of tremendous political revolutions; but with the single exception of the Mahometan conquest, they were accompanied by few permanent changes of religion, manners, customs, habits, and character. Even the powerful influence of religion, cannot change these; and nothing, we think, is more certain, than that a system of Faith, not founded on the existing state of the human intellect, and closely assimilated to the manners, habits, customs and character of the people, can never be successfully propagated among them, except by the sword of conquest. But be this as it may, the inhabitants of Asia, may be likened to the Spanish Pillared Dollar, which, though it circulates everywhere, among Christians, Jews, Mahometans and Pagans, still bears its own original impress, and is always the same. A description of the people, drawn up a hundred, or a thousand years ago, will be equally applicable now. Eternal despotism, has stamped its unchangeable features on them, like the Legend of the Dollar, and until that wears away, they will continue as they have been for thousands of years.

The country of Paradise and Mount Ararat, was within the limits of Ancient Media. In process of time, it formed a part of Armenia, and was successively conquered by the Persians, by Mithridates, by the Romans, the Gauls, or Galatians, and the Turks. It is now, however, included within the limits of Persia, and forms the frontier of that Kingdom, and the dominions of the Grand Signior. Sir John Chardin passed through it, in his way to Persia, in 1670. "I left Paris," he says, "the 17th of August, 1671, to return to Persia, where the late King had, by letters patent, made me his merchant, and ordered me to procure many jewels of value, his Majesty having drawn with his own hand, the models by which he would have them set." Passing through Mingrelia and Georgia, he entered Armenia, and proceeded to the city of Iri- van, or Erivan, as it is spelt by Tournefort. He thus describes the state of the roads and weather, on the 4th day of March, and his account corresponds with those of others, who unite in representing the climate as very severe.

"The travelling in these snows, is attended with pain and danger, from the rays of the sun, which, falling upon it, give it an insupportable brightness, that is very prejudicial to the sight, notwithstanding all the precautions we could take, by following the example of the natives, in putting a thin black or green handkerchief before our eyes, which only serves to lessen the evil. When we met with peasants, it was necessary to dispute, who should enter the snow, for the track is so narrow, that two horses cannot pass by each other upon it. When the numbers are equal, they usually come to blows, otherwise, the weakest yield. They unload the horses, and make them enter the snow, in which they sink up to their bellies, and thus stand to give a passage to the others. To this, all whom we met were obliged, by my conductor, to submit. We passed through several towns and villages, and at night arrived at Iri van.

"Iri van," continues he, "is situated in 41° 15m north latitude, and enjoys a good air; but it is thick and very cold. The winter lasts long, and the snow sometimes falls in April. The country is however fertile, and the wine produced in this neighborhood, is good and cheap. The Armenians have a tradition, that Noah planted the vine at Iri van, and point out the very spot. The Armenians esteem this the most ancient city of the world, and believe that Noah dwelt there both before and after the deluge, when he descended from the mountain, on which the ark rested. They even say, that here was the Terrestrial Paradise.

"At twelve leagues from Iri van, is the celebrated mountain, on which all the people of the country are firmly persuaded, that the ark rested. This mountain is so high and large, that when its air is clear, it does not appear more than two leagues distant. The Armenians even believe, that the ark is still on the summit of the mountain, and say, that a monk, named James, being resolved to see it, or die in the attempt, went half way up the declivity, but could go no further, because, having ascended thus every day, he was, while asleep in the night, carried back to the place whence he set out in the morning. They add, that this continued a long time, till God, being willing to satisfy in part his desires, sent him a piece of the ark by an angel, and ordered him to be told, that all access to the top was forbidden to mankind."

It is by this, and similar absurd legends, that superstition has been propagated among the ignorant, and doubt and unbelief, generated in the minds of the more enlightened. That the ark settled on Mount Ararat, in Armenia, is sufficiently probable, when supported by the traditions of the people from time immemorial; but coupled with this absurd monkish miracle, it is vitiated by the association, and the whole becomes a subject of doubt, if not ridicule to all but the ignorant and vulgar. It has been charged upon Learning, Science and Philosophy, that they have a natural tendency to encourage unbelief; but the imputation is believed to be unfounded. All that they have done, has been to reject those impudent and absurd fables, which artful impostors invented, to subjugate the minds of the ignorant of the dark ages, and which, so far from being associated, or even assimilated with the sublime truths of Holy Writ, are equally at war with the dictates of reason, and the precepts of revelation. These base forgeries, have obscured a thousand truths, and made thousands of doubters, if not downright infidels, since there are bounds to human belief, as well as all the other faculties of the mind. A friend of ours, who cherished a most profound and devoted belief in the miracles recorded in the life and death of the Saviour, and who was led by this sentiment, to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, confessed to me, with deep sorrow and humiliation, that such was the effect produced on his mind, by the swarm of miracles, some of them, both absurd and ridiculous, which the good fathers having charge of the Holy Sepulchre, had interpolated with those hallowed by the testimony of the inspired writers, that he left the sacred precincts with his faith shaken by conflicting doubts, and his reason half distracted by the mixture of truth and falsehood, thus jumbled together in his mind.

The Armenians are Christians, constituting a separate church, and having a patriarch of their own, who resides at Erivan, about twelve leagues from Mount Ararat. Being ignorant and unlettered, and their priests little more enlightened than their flocks, their religion has degenerated into abject superstition, retaining little of the pure simplicity and morality of the primitive church. Indeed, the Christian religion is, emphatically, that of a people comparatively enlightened; its morality is that of a state of civilization, and its principles cannot be comprehended by savages, or barbarians. Hence, whenever mankind decline into a state of ignorance and barbarism, the invariable result will be, a substitution of idle and superstitious observances in the place of rational piety and devotion. Ceremonies will be substituted for morality; crimes be atoned for by fasting, or compounded for by gifts to the church or the priest; and mortifications of the flesh, stand in the room of repentance and amendment. Such is the state of religion among the Armenians, who are at one and the same time, the slaves of the Turks and Persians; the dupes of a gross and abject superstition, begotten by ignorance on the pure and sublime doctrines of the Christian faith. If the Missionaries, who have fallen victims to their zeal in the cause of true religion, had in view the regeneration of these people, they undertook a difficult task, since all experience has demonstrated, that it is much easier to inculcate an entire new system of faith, than to reform an old one. It is probable, they would have succeeded better with the Turks, than the Armenians.

By far the most interesting portion of Armenia, is Mount Ararat, and the village of the Three Churches, a few miles from its base, the former being, according to the universal belief of the inhabitants, the place where the ark finally rested; the latter, the Terrestrial Paradise, where our first parents dwelt before their fall. Although it is impossible, at this distance of time, to designate the spot, certainly the most interesting of any on earth, where Adam and Eve were created, and where events occurred, whose consequences were so momentous to all succeeding generations, still a description, drawn from the reports of eye witnesses, cannot but deserve attention, especially at this moment, when the eyes of the Christian world have been turned to this quarter by the affecting catastrophe, to which we have referred. The description of the garden of Eden, as given by Moses in the second chapter of Genesis, is very brief. He states, that a stream flowed from thence, and separated itself into four channels, the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Pison and the Gihon. This description, it is affirmed by St. Jerom, Bishop Huet, and other learned commentators, applies to no other spot in the known world, and consequently, they coincide with the tradition of the Armenians. Tournefort, who was a learned antiquarian, as well as a great botanist, at first hesitates, but finally seems to accede to their opinion. He quotes Pliny, Polybius, Strabo, Appian, Arrian, Ptolemy, Ammianus Marcellinus and Tozenius, to prove, that two, at least, of these channels are artificial, and that, consequently, they could not have existed at the period Adam and Eve were created.

The most learned commentators on the Book of Genesis, however, nearly all agree, with St. Jerom and Bishop Huet, who was one of the most learned men of his time, in placing the Terrestrial Paradise in this neighborhood, and Tournefort himself makes this acknowledgment:

"If," says he, "we may suppose the Terrestrial Paradise to have been a place of considerable extent, and to have retained some of its beauties, notwithstanding the alterations made in the earth by the flood, and since that time, I don't know a finer spot, to which to assign this wonderful place, than the country of the Three Churches, about twenty French leagues distant from the heads of the Euphrates and Araxes, and nearly as many from the Phasis. The extent of Paradise, must at least reach to the heads of these rivers, and so it will comprehend the ancient Media, and part of Armenia and Iberia. Or, if this be thought too large a compass, it may be confined to part of Iberia and Armenia, that is, from Erzeron to Tefflis; for it cannot be doubted, that the plain of Erzeron must be taken in. As to Palestine, where some would persuade us Paradise lay, to me it seems trifling to attempt to make four rivers of Jordan, which is itself but a brook or rivulet; and besides, the country is very dry and rocky. Our learned men may judge as they please, but as I have never seen a more beautiful country than the Three Churches, I am strongly persuaded, that Adam and Eve were created there."

The village of the Three Churches, is situated in a beautiful plain, and in full view of Mount Ararat. It is called Itchmiadzin, that is, the descent of the only Son, the Saviour having appeared to St. Gregory at this place, according to the tradition of the Armenians. There are four churches instead of three, the principle, or patriarchal church, being placed in the centre of a great court, or square, and consecrated to St. Gregory, the Enlightener, who was the first patriarch under Constantine the great. Among the relics, were an arm of this saint, a finger of St. Peter, two fingers of St. John the Baptist, and a rib of St. James. It is a strong, substantial building, of hewn stone, richly furnished with sacred vessels of silver and gold; the floor covered with splendid carpets, and the altar hung with damask, velvet, and brocade, presented by devout Armenian merchants, who trade to all parts of Europe. There are also presents from Rome, made with a view of conciliating these schismatics, who are said to make themselves merry, with these attempts to seduce them into an acknowledgment of the Papal authority. Tournefort states, that "The Patriarchs have hitherto only amused the Catholic Missionaries; it being no hard matter, to deceive those who are downright and honest in all their designs. The reünion of religions, is a miracle, which the Lord will work when he shall see proper. The hatred of these schismatics, seems irreconcilable, and the patriarchs are obliged to give way, lest the populace should throw off their authority." It is more than probable, however, that the Patriarchs have no wish to reconcile their church with that of Rome, as this would, of course, lead to an abdication of their authority, and an acknowledgment of that of the Pope.

The architect of this church, according to a tradition universally received by the schismatics, as they are termed by M. Tournefort, was the Saviour himself, who drew the plan in presence of St. Gregory, and commanded, that it should be built accordingly, under his superintendence. The same tradition says, that the Saviour, instead of a pencil, made use of a ray of light, while the saint was at prayer, kneeling on a square stone, which is pointed out to strangers. The traveller, who gives this information, somewhat quaintly, if not irreverently, adds, "If the story be true, the Lord has made use of a very singular order of building, for the domes and steeples are in the shape of a funnel turned upside down, with a cross on the top."

All travellers unite in describing the country around the Three Churches, as exceedingly rich and beautiful. It is traversed by numerous streams of the purest water, abounding in the most delicious trout in the world; produces an abundance of grain, rice, cotton, flax, melons, vines, and tobacco, the fields of which latter are of prodigious extent. As this plant, as is agreed on all hands, came originally from the New World, it would be curious to trace its progress into Armenia. The water-melons are described as equal to any in all the Levant, and the best are produced in fields which, after the rains, are covered with chrystalized particles of salt, which crackle under the feet. One of the great drawbacks on the Terrestrial Paradise, is a species of gnats, which appear in great numbers during the evening and at night, and, if we may judge from the description of their music, their propensity to blood-sucking, and the inflammation caused by their sting, are neither more nor less, than downright mosquitoes.

From out the extensive plain of the Three Churches, rises the famous Mount Ararat, consisting of two cones, one of great height, and covered with eternal snows, the other of much less altitude. Before reaching it from the direction of the churches, it is necessary to ford the Araxes, whose current, when swelled by the melting of the snows of Ararat, is so strong and impetuous, that no bridge can withstand it for any length of time. The classical reader will recognize the banks of this river, as the theatre of some of the greatest battles recorded in ancient history.

The ascent of the mountain to the region of perpetual snow, is extremely difficult; beyond, it has been found impracticable by all travellers, who have, as yet, made the attempt, so far as my reading extends. The first region consists of loose sand, which recedes at every step, and which, with the exception of a few junipers and goat-thorns, is destitute of trees or shrubs. Nothing indeed can appear more sad, dreary and desolate, than this mountain, as you approach it from the Three Churches. But the most quaint, picturesque, and lively description, is given by Tournefort, who attempted the ascent, but failed, after encountering labors and privations, which we shall, in part, transcribe, for the information and amusement of the reader.

"From the top of a great abyss," he says. "which is a dreadful hole, if ever there was one.

and which is opposite to the village from whence we came, there continually fall down rocks of a hard blackish stone, which make a terrible noise. There are no living animals but at the bottom, and towards the middle of the mountain. They who occupy the first region, are poor shepherds and scabby flocks, among which one finds some partridges. The second region is possessed by tigers and crows. All the rest of the mountain has been covered with snow ever since the ark rested there, and these snows are overhung half the year with thick clouds. The tigers we saw gave us no small fear, though they were not less than two hundred paces from us, and we were assured they were not used to molest the passengers. They were seeking water to drink, and were, undoubtedly, not hungry to-day. However, we laid ourselves along the sand, and let them pass by very respectfully. They sometimes kill them with a gun, but the chief way of taking them is with traps or nets, by the help of which, they catch young tigers, which they tame, and afterwards lead about through the principal towns of Persia."

"That which is yet more inconvenient and troublesome in this mountain is, that the snow which is melted runs into the abyss by a vast number of channels which one cannot come at, and which are as foul as the waters of a land-flood in the greatest storm. All these sources form the stream which runs by Acourlou, which never becomes clear. They drink mud there all the year; but we found even this mud more delicious than the best wine. It is as cold as ice, and has no muddy taste. Notwithstanding the amazement this frightful solitude cast us into, we endeavored to find the pretended monastery, and inquired whether there were any Religious shut up in the caverns. The notion they have in this country, that the ark rested here, and the veneration we, the Armenians, have for this mountain, have made many imagine, that it must be filled with Religious, and Struys is not the only person, who has told the public so. However, they assured us there was only one forsaken convent at the foot of the gulf, whither they used to send one monk every year from Acourlou, to gather in some sacks of corn which grows in the country about it."

After suffering much from fatigue, want of shelter and water, as well as from apprehension of the tigers they frequently met with, but which are reported by the shepherds never to attack in the day time, Tournefort and his companions were compelled to turn back, without coming at all near the attainment of their object, and what was still more mortifying to the zealous old botanist, without finding any rare plants to repay them for the disappointment. After clambering over a region of loose rocks, on which they were forced to leap from one to another, Tournefort was greatly comforted by discovering a new species of Veronica Telephii, but his satisfaction soon gave way to dismay, when they came to the region of land which, as he expresses it, "lay behind the abyss."

"When," says he, "we endeavored to slide along, half our bodies were buried; and besides, we could not keep the direct way, but were obliged to go to the left to come to the edge of the abyss, of which we had a mind to take a nearer view.

Indeed, it is a most frightful sight, and David might well say, such places show the grandeur of the Lord. One can't but tremble to behold it; and to look down on the horrible precipices, ever so little, will make the head turn round. The noise made by the vast number of crows, who are continually flying from one side to the other, has something in it very frightful. To form any idea of this place, you must imagine one of the highest mountains in the world, opening its bosom, only to show the most horrible spectacle that can be thought of. All the precipices are perpendicular, and the extremities rough and blackish, as if smoke had come out of the sides and smutted them. About six o'clock, after noon, we found ourselves tired out and spent, and were not able to put one foot before the other, but were forced to make a virtue of necessity, and merit the names of Martyrs to Botany.

"We at length observed a place covered with mouse ear, whose declivity seemed to favor our descent, that is to say, the way Noah took to the bottom of the mountain. We ran hither in haste, and then sat down to rest ourselves, and found there more plants, than in all the journey besides. What pleased us quite as well, our guides showed us from thence, but at a great distance, the monastery whither we were to go, to quench our thirst. After resting, we laid ourselves on our backs, and slid down for an hour together upon this green plat, and so passed on very agreeably, and much faster than we could have gone on our legs. The night, and our thirst, were a kind of spur to us, and caused us to make the greater speed. We continued, therefore, to slide in this manner, as long as the way would permit us; and when we met with small flints that hurt our shoulders, we turned and slid upon our bellies, or went backward on all fours. Thus, by degrees, we gained the monastery; but so disordered and fatigued by our manner of travelling, that we were not able to move hand or foot. We found some good company in the monastery, the gates of which are open to every body for want of fastenings." Such is this famous mountain, so closely connected with a subject in which the whole race of both Jews and Christians cannot but feel a deep interest. The difficulty, if not impracticability, of the ascent to the summit, will probably forever preserve the mystery with which it is associated, a circumstance which only makes it the more interesting.

The inhabitants of this region, are, as before stated, not only Christians, but the descendants of some of the most ancient Christians of the world. Baronius states, that they were visited by St. Bartholomew, and St. Thaddeus, who both suffered martyrdom there forty-four years after the crucifixion. It does not appear, however, that Christianity made much progress there, until the reign of the Emperor Decius, when, according to Eusebius, a pious Bishop, named Maruzanes, labored so successfully among the people, that, in the time of Diocletian, there were none but Christians in Armenia. The same author relates, that Maximinian undertook to root out Christianity entirely; but the Armenians took arms in defence of their faith, and this, says Eusebius, was the first war undertaken for religion. It is probable many of them relapsed into Paganism, since it appears that, in the reign of Constantine the Great, St. Gregory called the Illuminator, converted Tiridates, king of Armenia, who published an edict, ordering all his subjects to embrace Christianity.

The Armenians are not considered Catholic, by those of the Western Church, as they reject the supremacy of the Pope, and adopt the Patriarch of the Three Churches as their head. He is unquestionably one of the principal ecclesiastical dignitaries of the world, having according to Tournesfort, who visited Armenia in 1701, jurisdiction over eighty thousand villages, and a revenue of six hundred thousand crowns, which is equivalent to, perhaps, thrice that sum in Europe. But with all this, he is essentially poor, being obliged to pay the capitation tax, to prevent those of his flock, who are unable to pay it, from turning Mahometans, in order to escape the exaction. He is said often to expend all his revenue, and a portion of his savings in this manner. Tournesfort thus describes the Patriarch whom he visited at Erivan.

"This Patriarch is clothed as plainly as the other priests; he lives frugally, and has but few domestics; but is the most considerable prelate in the world, in regard to the authority he has over his nation, which trembles at the least threat of excommunication from him. They say he has fourscore thousand villages which owe him. To keep his place, he is obliged to make many presents to the Governor of Erivan, and the powerful men at court. A man must be a slave to ambition, to buy such a post as this.

"He was formerly the only Patriarch among the Armenians, who had power to make the Holy Christ, or Mieron, from the Greek Myron, a liquid composition, or perfumed oil. He furnished all parts of Persia and Turkey; even the Greeks too bought it with great veneration, and it was commonly said, that a fountain of oil flowed from the Three Churches that watered the whole east. The Patriarch sent to the Archbishops and Bishops of the Armenians to disperse it, and to use it in baptism and extreme unction. But above forty years since, Jacob, a veritable and Armenian Bishop, who resided at Jerusalem, took upon him to erect himself into a Patriarch, under the patronage of the Grand Visier, and refused to take the Mieron from the Patriarch of the Three Churches. As oil is a very cheap commodity in Palestine, and this liquor does not corrupt, he made more than could be used for anointing among all the Armenians of Turkey for many years; and this was the foundation of a great schism among them. The Patriarchs excommunicated each other; he, of the Three Churches, commenced a great suit at the Porte, against him of Jerusalem. The Turks are too wise to decide the question, but content themselves with receiving presents from both parties, as they occasionally revive the suit, and each goes on to sell his oil as well as he can."^e

The Armenians, considering the revolutions they have undergone, the despotism of the Turks, which they have long endured and still endure, are an amiable, well-disposed people. They have long been celebrated over all the East and throughout Europe, for their skill and enterprise in commerce, and have in a great measure, superseded the Jews in managing the pecuniary affairs of the Grand Seignior, as well as his principal officers. Under the government of Persia, and, indeed, in all the Eastern despotisms, there is no middle course between absolute slavery and downright rebellion. The only alternative is submission or resistance. You must be either master or slave. The Armenians have no longer the spirit to resist. They have lost all hope of freedom, and with it, the courage to defend themselves from oppression. Hence, they are the most submissive of all the slaves of the Ottoman Porte. Their country has been, from the remotest period of antiquity, the theatre of most stupendous struggles, and incalculable bloodshed; but the struggle was not, whether they should be free, but who should be their master; and the blood that flowed on their soil, had little or no influence on their freedom or prosperity. Whoever conquered, the yoke was still to be borne; and whether the God of Battles sided with Cyrus or Xerxes, Julian or Saper, Lucullus or Mithridates, Bajazet or Tamerlane, it was all the same to them.

The Armenians are accused of being tainted with what is called the heresies of Eutychius, whose doctrines were condemned by the council of Chalcedon. They consisted, so far as I can comprehend them, in certain metaphysical modifications of the doctrine of the Trinity, and a dissent from the Catholic principle of the Hypostatical Union in the person of the Saviour. These, though involving, as I conceive, no fundamental principle of the Christian faith, have, according to invariable custom, occasioned violent dissensions, ending in a schism productive of all sorts of hatred and uncharitableness among the followers of the Bishop of Rome, and the Patriarch of the Three Churches. It were much to be wished, that the union of churches were as common as their separation; but, as the author I have so frequently quoted, truly, though quaintly says, "This is a miracle the Lord will bring about when he sees fit."

To conclude. The Armenians are by no means blood-thirsty or revengeful. The massacre of the Christian Missionaries, which gave occasion to this article, was neither perpetrated, or instigated by them. It was the work of one of the roving bands of Kurdistan, which infect the whole country from Mount Tauris to Tefflis, committing every species of outrage, beginning with plunder, and ending with cold blooded murder, whenever an adequate ransom is not offered for life. They consist of independent tribes of Barbarians, subject to chiefs, whose authority is very limited; they live in tents, which circumstance always indicates a roving race, and have neither the heroic qualities of our savages, nor the virtues of civilized man.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT LAW.

Views in regard to an extension of the privileges of Copyright in the United States, to the citizens of other countries, in a Letter to the Hon. Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, member of Congress. By the author of "The Yemassee," "The Kinsmen," "Richard Hurdie," "Damsel of Darien," &c.

HON. I. E. HOLMES:

House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR SIR: In my previous letter on the subject of International Copyright, I dwelt, for reasons which were given, somewhat at length, upon the history and remarkable progress of American Literature. I endeavored to show, from memory and the few imperfect documents in my possession, what had been done, in the brief space of twenty years, by native authorship, in almost every department of letters and the arts. It was shown, not only that American writers had secured, to some extent, the affections and admiration of their own countrymen, but that they had, in numerous instances, arrived at highly honorable distinction in foreign lands—that their writings had been numerously republished, their ideas and performances usurped, and that they had, not unfrequently, become authorities in those very regions in which nothing is more customary than the sneer and the sarcasm at the intellectual non-performance of their country. It was shown, that, with little or no countenance at home,—and no protection,—they were rapidly pressing on to a consummation, the effect of which must have been to secure for their country, that position, in moral respects, which it already maintains in politics and commerce:—and through this means, to command for it that proper eminence in all national concerns, to which its peculiar endowments, whether as regards its physical resources or its people, not only entitle it now, but which they must inevitably secure for it in ages yet to come. At the close of that narrative, which the want of leisure, and materials, necessarily rendered inadequate to more than a partial exposition of the subject, I declared the humiliating conviction, that a career so honorable had been completely arrested—that a stop had been put to the achievements of the native intellect; and that a progress, which should be as grateful to the country, as it was creditable to her mind—nay, as it was absolutely essential to her social and moral advance and independence, was about to be fatally endangered, unless timely and becoming measures were adopted by which to secure to her genius, the fair and equal field to which its merits and its necessities alike entitle it.

Before we proceed to inquire as to what these measures should be, it becomes necessary to show, in order to avoid cavil hereafter, why it is, that, without any change in our local law of copyright, there should still have taken place such a change in the condition of American authorship—why, with the law on the subject of copyright precisely the same, in principle, at present, as it was twenty years ago, the native author should have been able then, to achieve successes and to realize profits which are denied him now. The solution of this question, will enable us to conclude the history of domestic Literature, while it may tend to give us some glimpses, as we proceed, of what may be our future remedies. We shall endeavor to pursue the subject from its first beginnings, yet without digressing into such details as would rather fatigue than inform the reader.

In the first place, then, we are not to understand, when regarding the present prostration of American Literature, we speak, in comparative terms of its past successes,—that the native author was ever, at any time, adequately rewarded for his labors. On this subject, the popular mind has been very much abused. The swelling language and exaggerated statements of the journals, has partly led to the misconception, and the vanity of authors themselves, in some instances, has countenanced misrepresentations, with regard to the amount of their compensation, which the policy of the publishers—who desire to appear liberal—has not suffered them to contradict. The history which follows, will not, we apprehend, be liable to contradiction.

With the exception, then, of a few writers, already in possession of the popular ear, American Literature was still, up to the year 1834, very much a business of the amateur. It was only about that period, that it began to assume the aspect of a business. Until that period, and even after, the greater number of domestic books—works of art and fancy being considered, and not those of mere utility—yielded no compensation whatever to their writers. In numerous instances, they were issued at the author's expense. If sufficiently successful to reach a second edition, the publisher might bestow upon the writer a trifling gratuity of one, two or three hundred dollars, for the first. But this was not a frequent event, and in the case of the greater number of these publications, the author himself, most probably, contemplated no higher gratification than that of seeing himself in print. His book had been produced at leisure hours, as a relief from other labors, or while preparing himself for other avocations. It was seldom that his successes were such, as to persuade him to abandon those more ordinary occupations of society, which had been marked out for his pursuit. Where the author was already known as a man of talent, or had already achieved some small successes, he was usually allowed one half of the nett profits on the sale—the publisher incurring all the risks of publication. These risks, however, were commonly very trifling; for, as the edition of such a writer was usually limited to 12 or 1500 copies, and, as the large publishers had numerous agents, scattered throughout every State in the Union, there was no great difficulty in forcing the sale of a sufficient number, to defray the absolute cost of publication. In such cases, the author was the only loser. Where he had already distinguished himself, and was, in some degree, a favorite, his copyright might command a price, ranging from three hundred to three thousand dollars. In one or two instances, only, do we hear of American writers of fiction, realizing as much as five thousand dollars for a single novel. But very few ever received a greater sum (in America) than fifteen hundred, and, as these writers seldom sent forth more than a single work per annum, it may easily be conceived, that the business was never such as to render it over seductive, to those who had the pecuniary returns very much at heart. A similar degree of physical industry, and a far less expenditure of thought and sensibility, would realize for the writer, in the common walks of trade, a much better income. Few, therefore, but the greatly successful, (still speaking comparatively) were found to continue long in the vocation—none, perhaps, but those whom a strong passion for letters, compelled to cling to a pursuit, whose paths, if not often those of pleasantness and peace, were such as were most congenial, in the case of such persons, to the peculiar tastes and talents with which they were endowed. But, in the new impulse given to American Literature,—upon which we dwelt more at large in our previous letter,—where one left the field in disappointment and disgust, a dozen entered upon it in hope and confidence. The exaggerated statements, from time to time, in the newspapers, of the profits of the business, naturally led to this result; and every season sent forth its host of new beginners, for whom the same experience was in reserve. The withdrawal of one swarm of literary motes into another atmosphere, did not leave unoccupied, the feeble sunshine of the publisher's office. His resources, in the shape of song and story, from the stock of new materials always on hand, enabled him to select at pleasure; and his occasionally doing so, while it encouraged the beginner with hopes that were never to be realized, necessarily increased his own reluctance, to bestow any portion of his profits upon the native professional author. The latter was compelled to receive what was given him. He had no alternative. He had no mode of arriving at his own value. The cleemosynary scraps left unconsumed from the foreign table, were all that remained to him: and he had no remedy, no redress, unless by expatriating himself; by renouncing the country which refused to cherish, and seeking the protection of that which did. The American publishers were few in number; the business, in respect to belles-lettres publications, very much a monopoly—the capital employed, of an amount calculated with a constant reference to the fact, that books, throughout a great portion of the Union, were regarded as luxuries, not as necessities—not habitually the food of the million, and, even among the few, regarded as a delicacy. Add to this, that the foreign supply—particularly of works of fiction—to an inexhaustible extent, and very far beyond any demand of the American public, was to be had, of all varieties of character and degrees of merit, at no greater cost than that of types and paper. It was only in regard to the consumption of this foreign supply, that any conflict or competition, ever took place among the American publishers. Ordinarily, even in regard to their appropriations of foreign books, there was a very good conventional understanding between them. They agreed to poach upon different manors. They laid out the particular kinds and classes of books, which they severally preferred to publish. One yielded his capital to the interests of law and medicine, and was admitted to have the exclusive right thenceforth, to all the legal and medical wisdom of Great Britain;—another chose classical Literature, upon which to move his great enterprize,—a third countenanced polemics and theology—others contented themselves with romance, and thus, the whole domain of European letters was thrown open to partition. They laid violent hands, each on his favorite author. One chose Scott; another Bulwer and James; a third Maryatt and D'Israeli; and even the ladies did not always, escape the hands of these literary ravishers—Lady Blessington and Mrs. Hemans,—Letitia Landon and Mrs. Jameson, &c., were compelled to contribute to their triumphs; and, in this way, they amicably distributed the minds of authors, to whom they were unwilling to award a groat! Sometimes, indeed, through the occasional excess, or cupidity of some one of these distributees, the foreign writer was remembered to the tune of one or two hundred pounds. The brief history which will account for this, will also tend to illustrate the wretchedness of a system, which, “to be hated needs but to be seen.”

It happened not unfrequently, that some one of the authors chosen, turned out less profitably than had been expected. The disappointed publisher beheld, with dismay, the failure of his own, and, with mortification, the success of a class of books which he had yielded to his neighbor. Unrestrained by any laws, even those of convention, he avenged himself for this mortification, by pouncing occasionally upon some of the publications, which he had accorded to his rival. In this manner, two, and even three, editions of the same work were forced upon the market. The price of the work was let down, the sales divided, and the profits lost to all parties. Sometimes, again—for cause, or without cause—in his mere mood,—without provocation, and perhaps even without hope of profit, some one of the contracting parties would deliberately play the same game in the case of a volume, which he knew was about to issue from the neighboring press.

The price would be lowered fifty per cent., the market forestalled, and the sale of the better edition effectually baffled. This proceeding would prompt requital in similar fashion; new compromises would follow, and, probably, some new and more grateful arrangement for the distribution of the foreign spoil, which, in a short time, would prove quite as insecure and temporary as the preceding. Finding that they could not always trust one another, they adopted a mode to guard against these collisions, by which, as already hinted, the foreign author was sometimes admitted to a moderate share, in the profits of his own books. Accordingly, they made a private agreement with him, to do that, in his individual case, which they had striven, tooth and nail, to prevent the government from doing, in the case of his fraternity. They formally acknowledged his right to his own property, and bought from him, in order to its exclusive use, a privilege of publication in the United States, precisely such as his publisher had bought from him in Great Britain. The unhappy error of which they were guilty, was, in not seeing that the principle which they acknowledged in his case, was the only one which could legitimate and secure their industry, adopted as a general legal principle, by the government, for the control of the whole subject. The English author had only to provide his American publisher with the printed sheets of his work, prior to its publication in Great Britain, to secure a bonus of one or two hundred pounds. This privilege, however, in our existing law of copyright, conferred no protection. The law of copyright, was fatal to a legal contract between parties able to contract. The only advantage, which this privilege conferred upon the purchaser, was that of sending forth an edition of the work, in advance of any rival, thus supplying the market some few days before his neighbors. But, even this advantage was less real than seeming. Unrestrained by the laws of the land, our publishers too frequently refused to recognize any other laws, whether of country or convention. The work would be pirated, and the public, indifferent to the morals of the proceeding, anticipating the cheaper edition, and already taught to look for it, had only to wait three or five days, necessary for running it through the press, to procure it almost on their own terms.

In a business so thoroughly illegitimate throughout, so insecure, in consequence of the very circumstance which, in the eyes of cupidity, conferred upon it its highest privileges,—what was naturally the fate and condition of the native author? We have seen what were his rewards in the palmiest days of his career. With the exception of the few who derived their chief compensation from the English publishers, the great body of American authors labored con amore. It was their love of letters that maintained them—that reconciled them to short commons, protracted toils and incessant industry. Under these necessities, they toiled in all departments. Their resources were casual. They could not propose to themselves the completion of great tasks; favorite plans of composition, favorite subjects, leading and original schemes for the development of a grand ideal, in verse or prose, were all compelled to yield to the ordinary and frequently slavish requisitions of the market. They were day-laborers in the vineyard, doomed to the most moderate share of the fruits, and liable to be dismissed at the shortest notice. The author, whose work went to the third or fourth edition—whose name rang through the press, and who fancied that its voice was equally the presage of fortune and of fame, was yet confounded to discover that his pecuniary rewards, from his most successful labors, were not often comparable to those of the ordinary accountant—that he was still required to prepare his essay for the magazine, and his story for the annual, if he would avoid the humiliating contingencies of debt. Accordingly, we find the most able and popular writers in America, mixing up various other professions with that of Literature; descending from eminence, which they honored—from living and holiest rites at national altars—to the narrow walks of trade—returning, at moments snatched from more lowly duties, to the service which they loved—placing an occasional chaplet upon shrines in the ministry of which their whole lives should be dedicated. What must be the effect of such a system upon the character of our Literature? To make it fugitive, wanting in form and consistency, in proper elaboration, in grandeur, strength and purpose! What, upon the author? To take from him all high motives to performance, and to fritter away, in slender occasionalities, that genius, to which no time is allowed for contemplation. That, under these circumstances, the author should still continue to write—should still struggle on, in every possible way, with the hope of maintaining his connection with the art, which he is not permitted to adopt as his vocation, proves nothing more than the strong force of a nature, and of endowments, which will not suffer themselves to be entirely suppressed by any fortune!

Nor, could he blame the domestic publisher that the writings of the foreign author were preferred before his own. This was due to the natural operation of the laws. It would be unreasonable to complain, that the publisher should prefer getting his materials free of cost; and with his hands not only full of such material, but of material upon which he already possessed (also free of cost) the best foreign judgment—upon which public opinion had already spoken, and which he, accordingly, put to press secure against any risk of loss—it was something of a favor, that he gave any countenance whatever to the native author. The motives for doing so were usually subordinate. In his natural desire to win, along with the reputation of great enterprise, that of great patriotism—to secure the intellectual aid which could maintain an argument—defend the character of a book unwisely chosen, or, in some similar way, minister to the wants of a house, whose mammoth profits and resources might very well permit, to the most mercenary nature, an occasional departure from the customary concerns of self. Besides, as the native publishers could not entirely, by their indifference, keep down the struggles of a genius whose beginnings were so vigorous, they could not entirely refuse to assist—they were compelled to yield themselves somewhat, to the demands of public opinion and the requisitions of popular taste. It would have been the foulest individual, as well as national reproach, if writers, already known to fame, who had already done the country honor by their talents, should be suffered to labor altogether without a compensation. The gradually increasing claims of American mind forced it upon their attention, and it came to be something of a merit among them, which should display the most imposing list of American authors for whom they were to officiate—the accoucheurs of native Literature—the Murrays, the Colburns and Longmans of the American press. Upon the banners of one were run up the names of Bancroft, Channing and Prescott; another triumphed in the reputation of Cooper, Kennedy and Bird; a third boasted of Bryant, Halleck, Paulding and Willis, and so on through the calendar. There was still another, though inferior, motive, by which the publishers were moved to a consideration of native claims. The very insecurity which attended all their appropriations from the foreign author was an indirect argument in favor of the native. It was a consideration however, which, so long as the publishers still had a tolerable understanding among themselves, could only be felt in a very moderate degree. It could not altogether counteract the imposing fact, that the one was to be paid, the other not; but it led to a greater willingness to listen to the claims of the former, at periods when the British press yielded nothing particularly attractive. But these concessions, as already said, were only made in the case of writers who had already secured the popular affections. Nothing was risked upon the obscure. Hundreds of manuscripts were returned annually, unread,—works, we are bold to say, in half the number of instances, quite equal to one half of the foreign reprints with which the land was glutted. The writers—many from the remote interior,—without names to command a hearing, without friends upon the spot to urge it—mortified by denial, and sensible to an indifference and coldness of reception, which had too frequently the appearance of contempt—buried their hopes in silence, and shrunk from a pursuit, in which, whatever might be their endowments, the laws of their country denied that they should proceed. Indeed, under the existing laws of copyright, the interests of publishers would seem to lie in discouraging as far as possible, the pretensions of the native author. It is their policy, that he should not have a hearing—that there should be no American books as long as the foreign supply is abundant. The reasoning on this point is comprised in a nutshell. There must be some limit to the sale of books in America—the amount of capital employed in the business, must necessarily have its limits. Shall this capital be employed exclusively for the benefit of the publisher, or shall that least necessary of all persons in the making of a book—the author—be admitted to a share? Clearly, when this alternative may be avoided, there is no good policy in incurring it. So long, therefore, as the publisher can procure ample supplies of literary material, free of all cost, it is clearly not his interest to encourage the genius of any writer, whose probable popularity at home, might compel the purchase of his manuscripts, and thus divide and lessen those profits, of which, hitherto, he has enjoyed the entire monopoly.

Thus, in all respects, completely masters of the field—making a trade of, and realizing wealth from, that intellect which they never recompensed—nay, which they sometimes mocked, with an irreverence equally inconsistent with policy and propriety—they are suddenly awakened to the consciousness that a pursuit so very prosperous, and a condition so very comfortable—so legitimate, too,—as their own,—is yet liable to some distressing insecurities. It is not the poor author, alone, whose frequent solicitations for legal protection, was met by their angry and vehement hostility,—that is liable to the vicissitudes of life. Their great wealth, the seeming ease with which it has been acquired—the fact that the fields of British Literature still remain open—a generous pasture in which the supplies are abundant, and poaching upon which is made legitimate by American law—these things have awakened other appetites. Hungry eyes are upon them, keen-witted printers, having little cash, perhaps, but numerous type, and a lamentable fund of audacity, are hankering after their fleshpots. The era of "Cheap Literature" is approaching! When author's brains, free of charge, are convertible into solid dishes for those who have none, there is no good reason why Literature should not be cheap. A revolution is at hand, which finds our publishers totally unprepared, and the progress of which is to leave them totally confounded. Prior to this revolution, it was the common notion, that books could not be issued more cheaply than by the American press. The American editions, up to 1833, were usually monstrous distasteful to the European eye. Fanny Kemble, Fanny Trollope, and other English Fannies, male and female, were loud in their loathing, whenever reference was had to the imperfect type, and the dingy paper of American publications. In comparison with the English, they had certainly good reason for their distaste. The difference of price, however, was not less remarkable. The work which sold in England for a guinea and a half, brought but a dollar, or a dollar and a half, in America. Such were the relative prices of the English and American editions of Bulwer, James, D'Israeli, &c. The greater cost of the English publication, was caused by the copyright charges; by the superior cost and beauty of the paper; by the greater quantity of paper and press-work consumed on each copy; and by the smaller number of copies in each edition. The English work, consisting of three large volumes, averaging 350 pages each, was issued from the American press in two small volumes of 220 each. An American edition was seldom less than 1,250 copies. An English edition, except in the case of very popular authors, was frequently less than 700. The copyright, in all probability, constituted, generally, one of the smallest items by which the difference was made.

Cheap as the American reprint appeared, it was soon discovered that it could be made more so. The great publishers themselves had been the first to conduct to this discovery. Occasionally, as we have seen, with the view to beat down, or to be devil an antagonist, they issued the ordinary two volume book for fifty cents—one third less than the price at which the rival edition was selling. This fact did not escape attention. It was one to invite inquiry. Why was this done occasionally only? How can it be done at all? These were the natural questions; and, in connection with these, circumstances were cooperating, to bring about the great experiment, the progress of which seems to have left native publishers, and authors equally high upon the sands. One of these circumstances was the great pressure of 1836, in the monetary concerns of the country. Literature, as one of the luxuries, in common with the fine arts, generally, was the first to feel this pressure. People sooner dispense with books than with bread, beef, brandy, tobacco, &c. Nay, to these wants, even vanity must yield, and the portrait-painter complain, almost equally with the author. Books, to be sold at such a time, must defer to its necessities; and, it was now remembered, by at least one set of adventurous persons, that mechanical invention, within the last ten years, had materially increased the powers of machinery and the press. As many sheets may now be stricken off in one hour as then consumed the day. The cost of printing had become greatly diminished, and the slight additional cost of stereotyping, necessarily led to the idea of immense editions, ready to meet the demand, without any waste of paper—the publishers relying on the sale of greatly increased numbers, to compensate for the diminished profits on the individual copy. This was a great discovery, which the publishers might have made years before. It was due to concurring circumstances that it was made at all. The necessity of making books cheap, in order to make them necessities, led to other suggestions for lessening the cost. By discarding the showy, but miserable and deceptive binding, in boards and muslin, which constituted, till very lately, the ordinary covering of American books—considerably increasing their cost without any corresponding increase of their durability—the expense of the recent issues was still farther diminished, and a standard of prices established, as we all know, so excessively humble, that no one needs to be informed, “the force of cheapness can no farther go.” Having all the literary materials free of cost, the publisher now, in the preparation of a book, makes allowance only for the parties mechanically interested in its composition. He allows for the type, the ink and the paper-maker; the compositor and the pressman; and a fraction for the news boy and the bookseller. The editor is a subordinate, the author is totally inconsidered. The very person without whom books could not be, is the only person excluded from all share in the profits which they bring. The elements of the book, so far as the appropriating publisher is concerned, are so much rags, lead, ink; and horse, hand, or steam-power. The reader sees, at a glance, why it is that the native author, who could maintain himself with moderate decency in his profession, ten years ago, can no longer do so—the principle of the law of copyright, meanwhile, remaining totally unchanged. That law, we may remark, passingly, contemplated a different state of things entirely—was framed when the country was without the shadow of a Literature, when the subject was any thing but a pressing one, and might very well be adopted among the Esquimaux, as much better answering their purposes than ours.

It will not be amiss to pursue this history, since the statement of facts, in their proper order, is necessarily suggestive of all the philosophy which belongs to them. Had our legislators been put properly in possession of these facts, we should, long before this, have arrived at solid ground in our legislation, to the equal content, I verily believe, of all the interested parties. Had our authors been consulted, as they should have been, in preference to our publishers, our paper-makers and printers, I am persuaded that the true principles would have been attained by which all parties would have been rendered secure, in a business, free from fluctuations, free from reproach and yielding, in common with every legitimate occupation, a fair and profitable return. Nay, more, it may be shown hereafter, that the protection of the native author would not diminish the mass and value of domestic publications—would not in any perceptible degree, increase the cost of his material to the publisher; and, when we consider the great importance to all tradesmen, of having a regular business, secure from vicissitudes, of uniform demand and unintermitted industry, we shall be perfectly safe in assuring the various departments interested in this question, that their several trades must undergo improvement rather than injury, in the improvements of the business of authorship, under proper legislation, in the hands of the native writer. The idea, that the literary taste of a nation should flourish, in the absence of the national author, is one of those monstrous absurdities which nothing but the most simple selfishness could possibly conceive. There can be no literary taste at all in a nation which is without its native writers. The reflection of half a moment, would exhibit this to the most ordinary understanding. Nay, if we look back for thirty years, we shall see that, until the native Literature began to grow, and to display itself, there was no popular taste for books in the country. The consumers were few and far between. Beyond the commercial cities there were no readers. The necessity for books, is unfelt where the intellect is wanting by which they are made. It is the influence and the example of the native intellect that creates a demand for the foreign—that wakens up the subordinate mind around it, and compels it, for its own protection, and in self-defence, to go into the same great armoury of thought, for those weapons, the possession of which, in this or any country, alone, constitutes the claim of the individual to equal place and consideration. It was a great error that our authors were not consulted in reference to this question. They are the true authorities. They alone could have furnished the necessary information, free from prejudice, free from the narrowing suggestions of a merely trading spirit. The very fact that they did not press forward—that they held themselves aloof, almost passive, while all the mechanical agents in book making—alarmed by the application of foreign authors to Congress,—were clamoring in concert, in the ears of our law makers, should have been an argument in favor of their impartiality, was conclusive of that unselfish temper, which, as we read the history of British authors, appears to have been at the bottom of all their misfortunes—the real source of their domestic miseries and privations, not to speak of that unhappy profligacy of life which has so frequently been made their reproach. The vices of authorship, in all countries, may be attributed to the injustice of the public, and are the natural result of inadequate and capricious returns, the inevitable consequences of exquisite sensibilities struggling against poverty, in the pursuit of fame! Byron's line of Sheridan may be applied to the case of thousands:

"What to us seems vice may be but wo!"

We proceed in our narrative!

The first attempts at the republication of books in cheap form, were not, as they should have been, calculated to alarm the book-publishers. They had been accustomed to such plain sailing, to such smooth seas, and prevalent fair winds, that they seem to have foregone, even the most ordinary precautions. They looked for no change of weather; and, though attended by the usual premonitions of revolution, that of cheap publishing took them by surprise. This business may be said to have been begun by the weekly newspapers. These journals were of an anomalous character. They were, in plain terms, magazines of selected miscellaneous literature. Their contents were chiefly derived from the dashing and lively serial stories in the foreign and domestic periodicals, sprinkled with such clever sketches, smart paragraphs, eloquent passages and shocking catastrophies, as could be gleaned from the daily press. They contemplated passengers by car and steamboat, and subscribers in the remote interior. The form of the newspaper naturally suggested itself to the publisher, on account of the greater advantages which it possessed, through the mails, for diffusion over the country. The postage on newspapers was almost nominal; that upon periodicals was heavy,—operating as a prohibition upon the more bulky, in all places at all remote from that of publication. In this, as in other respects, the effect of our legislation has been adverse to the interests of domestic Literature. This preference, growing out of a false and partial view of the superior utility of the newspaper over the periodicals assigned to Literature, has been very detrimental to their claims and usefulness. Why should there be a preference? Why should it be more important to the character of the nation, its safety and success, to give cheaper circulation to the mere passing occurrences, the ordinary scandal, the daily and temporary events of society; and deny it to elaborate works of art—thoughts which have relation to the most noble affections—principles which affect the permanent interests of man; and views of his nature—his future, past and present,—which elevate his aims, and refine his feelings, by studies equally graceful and ingenious. Yield that the newspaper, as it contains matter of mere passing interest, should have more prompt dispatch than the literary journal; and all that can be claimed for the former, over the latter, has been fully conceded. It is not, by this, intended to disparage the claims of the one; it is only insisted that they are not superior to the other. The friends of American letters would ask nothing more, than that they should be admitted to equal public privileges.

The natural result of this preference, unwisely given, as we contend, was to generate numerous miscellanies in newspaper form, and claiming under that name, the contents of which were almost purely literary. With the exception of the book form, which they studiously avoided, they were literary periodicals to all intents and purposes. The Literature which they contained, was either entirely foreign, or gathered from the domestic magazines; the value of which, in this manner, they thus contributed still farther to depreciate. One mammoth sheet contained as many square feet of printed matter, as a monthly magazine; sometimes twice as much. Its weight, in the mail-bags, compared with the average weight of the monthly magazine, (I have weighed them) was quite as great, and, certainly, its utility not greater. The simple preference thus given it by the legislation of the country, was frequently fatal (as how could it be otherwise!) to the regular periodical. On the score of mere postage, as we have seen, it placed it at grievous disadvantage, in the sight of the subscriber, in contrast with the weekly sheet. Its very superiority was one source of the disparagement under which it labored. Printed, usually, on a finer paper, the sheet employed was necessarily smaller, and more numerous sheets supplied the deficiencies of size. But, in the eye of the law, a sheet is a sheet, and the medium octavo was taxed as highly as the mammoth folio, which made a dozen of it. To those, therefore, who were solicitous only for the quantity and cheapness, rather than the quality and beauty of the commodity, the latter necessarily made its way. While the circulation of the former was confined (partly as we have seen by the operations of the laws) to that smaller community, which, regarding individuality and nationality of character as the most material constituents of the magazine, are not unwilling for the attainment of these objects, to incur the additional tax which is so improperly laid upon them. The magazines, under these unequal conditions, seldom long maintain their ground. Every year witnesses the birth and death of numbers; and those which survive, (unless it be such as address themselves particularly to ladies and the fashions) are of stunted size, and sickly growth. They do not thrive, and are seldom able to reward more than a small portion of their contributors. Of course, when they perish, or become infirm, the injury is to the native author. The contents of the magazines are entirely original, and it is by their aid that the contributors, who have in most cases made Literature their profession, are assisted to certain additional sources of livelihood.

But the weekly news sheet did not confine its fatal influence to the magazines. Its next inroad was into the hitherto secure grounds of the book publisher. When, in providing the contents of their mammoth sheets, the proprietors of these journals discovered that they could absorb one half of the contents of a goodly sized English novel, what was to prevent them from furnishing such material to their readers; more particularly, indeed, as the sketch and the story, the essay and the song—borrowed from the magazines, foreign and domestic—all equally failed to supply the capacious pages which they were weekly bound to fill! The next movement was inevitable from their plan. Whole books were thus emptied into their columns; and, changing from the folio to the imperial quarto, or the octavo, they proceeded, while still preserving their privileges, as newspaper publishers, to give to their issues, some of the advantages of the book-form of publication also. The contents of the folio, after having answered its purposes in one form and under one name, were forced into another, with another name; and, passing from stage to stage, with singular celerity, these innovators upon the ancient order of book-things, stood up at length, entirely unmasked, the leaders of a revolution—the audacious competitors, with the venerable trade, for some portion of its hitherto undivided spoils.

This revolution in publishing,—fatal to the old monopoly, and injurious in the last degree to the small profits of native authorship,—was yet not wholly without its advantages. It opened the eyes of the public to the fact, that the cost of printing might be greatly lessened. It opened the eyes of the publishers themselves, to the more important fact that they are henceforth to contemplate thousands, instead of hundreds of readers—that their editions might be fifteen thousand just as easily as fifteen hundred copies. True, such a change in their trade would necessarily increase their labors, compel more diligence and activity, and that too without proportionably increasing their profits; but every business is improved and compensated, whatever be the temporary inconvenience, loss and difficulty, by an increasing body of consumers. To the author, it mattered nothing, whatever might be the diminution of price in the individual copy of his writings, if the whole number sold were so proportionately increased as to prevent any deficiencies in the grand result. Nay, for that matter, the change in the system, if unaccompanied by pecuniary loss, was, to him, of positive benefit. It increased his circulation—made him acquainted with, and necessary to, the affections of a new class of readers; and gave him better securities for the future, than he had ever possessed before; since the fame that is nourished in the cottage of the peasant, is more likely to be of permanent growth in a land, than that which has its origin in the palace of the peer! This fact, however startling it may appear to that really vulgar understanding which affects to despise the popular judgment in matters of taste and literature, is nevertheless sufficiently confirmed by history. It is, besides, a fact, for which there are good reasons in philosophy, which would be out of place enumerated here. But these opinions contemplate rather the future, than the present business of Literature in this country,—when the commotions of the revolution which we have just described shall have subsided—

when the elements shall have cooled down, and the new world (I design no pun) of letters among us, shall have assumed some form and consistency. The discoveries which have been made, if likely to be of service to all parties, hereafter, are not yet so to the author, and scarcely to the publisher. It requires a considerable modification of the existing system to make it permanently beneficial to any. In respect to the author, it is particularly fatal. It makes no provision for him, considers him not in any of its calculations, and leaves him totally out of enumeration, among its necessary agents. If the compensation made him, as a writer, before the great change was effected in the business—before the price of a book was reduced from one dollar and fifty, to twenty-five cents—were barely adequate to his absolute necessities—it is absolutely nothing now. Let a few facts suffice. The old, well-known authors of the country, have almost ceased to publish. Their writings are almost entirely confined to the magazines. Their compensation, in some instances, is totally derived from the English press. When they apply to an American publisher, the answer is, "our hands are full—our capital is totally employed." This answer is not always a civil one; and, we are told, on good authority, that one of our most distinguished writers, one of those, indeed, who may claim to be the father of our Literature,—was treated by one of our publishing houses, to which he proposed his manuscript, with such insulting levity, as to drive him from its doors in indignation. Another writes me—a gentleman in the first rank of American letters—"were I ten years younger, I should leave the country for ever." A third, a poet who deservedly stands at the head of our metrical Literature, and who has contributed, perhaps more than any other writer in that department in our country, to confer upon Americans whatever reputation they enjoy,—has been compelled to become his own publisher; and this too, at a time when his previous volumes are announced by the press as in their fourth and fifth editions. If these instances relate to our very first authors—to those who enjoy (for Americans) the highest European fame,—what may be expected of the fortunes of those who occupy an inferior position? We may learn from a farther statement of unquestionable facts.

Thus then, we are told by some of the cheap publishers themselves, that, for such a volume as they retail at one shilling, they have paid the author from twenty to fifty dollars. We hear of one instance where a highly popular writer was compelled to accept, for a two volume book which could not have cost him less than four months of assiduous application, and which might well, from its merit and elaborateness, have employed him six,—the paltry sum of one hundred and fifty dollars. Other instances are given of similar sacrifices of time, industry and talent. It is something, indeed, in the present condition of things, that the publisher is willing to pay at all. He certainly need not do so, unless he pleases—not just now, at all events. Circumstances, indeed, are working to make him pay in the end; but that time is not yet; and it argues a degree of liberality, for which due credit should be given, when we find him willing to anticipate the approaching necessity. Still, the amount thus appropriated is very insignificant. Compared with the number of European works reprinted, the original publications of the American press are few, and these, with few exceptions, are usually of a length and character, which sufficiently prove that the time consumed in their preparation has been calculated with a nice reference to the contemplated amount of compensation. Suppose a Literature to be produced, at all, under such circumstances—suppose authorship to be really influenced by rewards such as above—and what must be its character? Where the writer is not even sure of constant employment, at whatever wages, what must be the effect, not merely upon his spirit and his strength, but his moral nature? Writing, simply, to supply a stimulant, not to enforce a thought, or a doctrine, or a fancy; toiling only for the amusement of his readers—his appeal is necessarily made to the most casual moods of a nation—its worst passions, its most miserable caprices; and, sinking into such an instrument, his genius becomes abased, his talent alone remains useful, but staling soon (as it must) upon the popular taste, he is made to give way to other and less hacknied tributaries! What is the corresponding effect upon the nation, when its intellectual sovereigns, sunk into such slavish dependency, fail to preserve their superiority over the time,—giving it the tone and direction which they alone, by natural endowment, are properly authorized to give!

How servile is the task to please alone!

The fault is not with the publisher. He is the creature of the system, of which the author is the victim. He cannot well afford to pay adequately for his materials. In the illegitimate character of the business, as now pursued,—in which the principal object of "the trade" seems to be to break one another down,—the price of books has been reduced to a standard quite too low to yield any adequate returns. Not only is it impossible for the publisher to compensate his author, but it is doubtful whether, at the end of the chapter, he can possibly save himself. We have the assurances of one very large publishing house, that, during one year of experiment, their cheap issues had failed to pay expenses. Why, under these circumstances; (assuming this to be the experience of the greater number) the system should still be persevered in, is a matter that will probably be explained hereafter. Several of the smaller publishers have abandoned the field entirely, and others, in all probability, will soon do so. Indeed, the miserable state of uncertainty and insecurity in which the business is involved at present—which has silenced nearly all the known professional authors of the country, and paralyzed the enterprise of the more wealthy publishers, conclusively proves the necessity for doing something, by which to give consistency and character to a most important interest, to deprive cupidity of some of its motives to perverseness, and to place the merely trading concerns of Literature—even without any reference to the rights of authors—in a regular and healthy condition—free to uniform exertions of industry and to adequate and not extravagant returns.

When the innovators in the publishing business first displayed their hands, and the eyes of the too confident veterans of the trade were opened to their danger, the latter, very naturally, fell into some of the usual errors of cupidity. Vexed at an event which they unwisely determined to treat as an impertinence, they proceeded to punish the new comers, for trespassing upon a province to which long and undisputed occupancy seemed to give them a prescriptive and exclusive right. Instead, therefore, of examining the whole subject deliberately, and with the calmness of philosophers, and asking themselves whether the time had not come, when a wholesome reduction might be made in prices which they themselves had already, and repeatedly shown were much too high, they fell into a frame of mind which is characteristic of all persons, who, like Jeshurun, in Scripture, have been accustomed to uninterrupted successes. "They waxed fat and kicked!" Without devoting any thought to the inquiry, by which they could have ascertained whether the thing was not now irrevocable, they proceeded to make war upon the movement, which they should rather have endeavored to direct. Their plan was very simple. It consisted in this single proposition. "These cheap publishers have no capital—we have—we will destroy them at their own weapons. We will break them down." This seemed an easy business. It would have been, had there not been a vital life in the system which they feared, which preserved it from overthrow. The time had come for cheap publications, and the necessity of the thing was against them. Had it not been for this necessity, they must have succeeded. They held peculiar advantages for the contest. In addition to their great capital, which they kept busily employed in the republication of the current Literature of great Britain, they owned a large amount of property in stereotyped-plates, from which thousands of works could be issued, at little cost, and at a moment's warning. These works were of all sorts, and of all degrees of merit—religious, historical, philosophical, romantic and poetic. Many of them were of classical and standard value, and of certain, though gradual sale. Most of them had already served their turn, the original editions having already satisfied that demand which followed their first publication at old-time charges. But the new system was one, that converted luxuries into necessities—that tempted people to buy and read, who had never bought or read before—that made Literature a need and not a delicacy: and, in flinging the works of thought and imagination, almost "without money and without price," in the paths of poverty and labor, have opened up resources of taste, study and innocent recreation, in some of the darkest and remotest regions of the land. I am not among those who see in the moral character of the books thus published, any particular signs of that moral deterioration, which has been rather loudly charged upon them. I do not perceive, that the cheap issues from the press are at all inferior to what they were before the change in prices. The writings of Paul de Kock, and a few others—which I never allow myself to read—are admitted as exceptions; but these works were published among us long ago, and are not the results of the cheap system of publication. Such works are to be found, at all times, in all countries, to smutch the garments of their Literature. It is very possible, that the number has been somewhat increased in correspondence with the general increase in all manner of publications; but I suspect they bear no higher relative proportion to the works of decency, than they have borne at all other periods. So far as my observation extends, the cheap publishers have sent forth very few but good books. Many of their issues have been very useful. Some of them, such as Froissart's Chronicles, for example, were particularly well-chosen, and could not have been supplied to the great body of our people, by any other system. Indeed, there is no proper reason, why these publications should not be the very best. What should hinder it? The publishers have surely sufficient privileges of appropriation, they are certainly not scrupulous upon what they lay hands, and may just as well take possession of the best, as the vilest materials of the European market. If, with these privileges before them, they choose the latter, the shame and the sin are quite as much with those who purchase, as with those who print.

In carrying out their purpose of breaking down their new and audacious competitors, the old publishers put their issues at charges still lower than their rivals; thus, not only increasing the evils of which they complained—forcing prices still lower than the innovators had done—but increasing the difficulty of any return to more reasonable standards. The effect of such a competition was equally instantaneous and wonderful. Able to secure for twenty-five or fifty cents, the volume which was originally beyond their reach at one, two, or three dollars—the number of purchasers was multiplied twenty fold—the circulating libraries were destroyed at a blow, and a passion for books—for owning books and making collections—was awakened in homes and territories, in which such passions had never prevailed before. This is one of the great merits of the cheap mouvements. It provoked a passion, which it will fail to satisfy. It brought out slumbering tastes and appetites; has given a new impetus to the intellectual energies of the nation, and opened a door to the progress of studies and inquiries, which will not close in a hurry. More! It has gained for the native author—it may be not in our day—a mighty audience, which he will hereafter lead in triumph, to the noblest conquests of art, and science, and imagination!

To the superior advantages of large capital and numerous works, already stereotyped, possessed by the old publishers, the innovators could oppose the new and current publications—a privilege, however, which they necessarily shared with their rivals; and the farther privilege which they possessed, by reason of their publishing in periodical form, and with smaller type, of transmitting their publications at less expense by mail. To these, they added considerable tact and talent, and the manner in which they bore themselves in the conflict, proves their courage and conduct, if it establishes for them the possession of no higher virtues. The “war of the publishers,” as it has been called, which followed, is sufficiently notorious. We need not say to the public, that it has been a mere contest of selfishness throughout, disgraced, too, by a species of ruthlessness and blackguardism, which would inevitably bring shame and opprobrium upon any more legitimate business. To revile and to disparage one another, in print, has been the ordinary character of their advertisements—to denounce each other as guilty of falsehood and unfair dealing, was the burden of their speech; and of their common estimate of what should be expected from one another,—these choosers of our Literature, in religion, philosophy, morals, taste, fancy and imagination, have had charges of burglary and arson insinuated against them, when the motive to these crimes consisted in no higher object than the attainment of a copy of a new work, which it was desirable to pirate. True, this charge was only insinuated—not established—not thought to be established; but, what must we think of the moral sense, where such things are even thought, much less insinuated? Where suspicion has become so prurient from looseness of principle, that such suggestions can rise to the mind in connection with one’s competitor in the ordinary walks of trade. Would such a charge have been made, or such a crime supposed to be of probable, or even possible commission with such a motive, if the publisher had not been accustomed to the appropriation of the books of foreign authors—if they had not been accustomed, in the language of the vulgar jeat, to “stealing the materials of which their brooms were made?” It is such looseness of principle, as such anecdotes indicate, which has brought upon the American name the imputation of universal dishonesty. In this case, the moral evil is the legitimate fruit of our laws, which have tacitly said to our publishers, you are at liberty to appropriate the writings of all people but our own; as the laws of Moses conferred upon the Hebrews a special privilege of usury in their dealings with foreigners. We, under the Christian dispensation, seem evidently to prefer this old law as our model, to that which was brought by Christ: “Do unto others as you would that they should do to you!”

Instead of pursuing this course, which is little else than a sort of social brigandage, and presents an anomaly in trade, which must be equally astonishing and disgusting to those in all other kinds of business, our old publishers, with a little patient reflection, and higher views of propriety, might have chalked out for themselves a path of more simplicity and safety. They should have called the authors to the consultation. But they had too little sympathy with authors. They had rejected, with great clamor, and signs of exceeding horror, every suggestion of a copyright law, by which (as every laborer, who was worthy, should have had his proportion of the hire) the business would have been at once legitimated. With the usual blindness of selfishness, they incurred its usual risks, and, unwilling to yield any portion of their spoils, endangered the safety of the whole. They should have seen, at a glance, that, even if successful in breaking down their present opponents, they were yet liable to the invasion of new swarms, the moment they should endeavor to regain former prices; for the privilege, which the American publisher possesses, of procuring his materials free of charge, are rather anomalous in the history of trade—having no analogies in any other business, and holding out therefore great temptations in the eyes of hungering adventurers. Every year would have brought into the field new competitors, and no capital could possibly hold out against the continual conflict. The war would be one, never ending, still beginning; and the issue of the protracted struggle, must be to exhaust their accumulated capital, without rendering the business any whit more secure from innovation. Such, had the publishers been willing to reflect, must have been the result of any thought given to the subject. But, as we have said before, they labored under the infirmities of Jeshurun. They had laughed at, and defied the authors; should they now be baffled by the printers—for the cheap book publishing is really due to the printers—who, having the labor at their fingers-ends, and the writings for nothing, had nobody to pay but the paper-makers. The old publishers felt nothing but the provocation of the intrusion; they were quite too angry and too proud for argument. Had this not been the case—had they been willing to think, and man-fully to approach the subject, they would have come to some such conclusions as the following: They would have said—"We have enjoyed this monopoly a very long time; we have grown strong and wealthy upon it: what more natural than that others should desire to partake! It is fortunate for us, that they did not feel this new appetite before." If they had approached the subject in this temper, the next conclusion would have been inevitable. "They have reduced prices! cannot prices be reduced?" That should have been the first inquiry; and where would it have led them? Necessarily, to the new basis of trade with which the cheap publishers had made them acquainted, namely, that such a reduction of prices had multiplied the number of consumers ten fold, and must continue to multiply them. The bare suggestion of this important fact, would, in any more legitimate business—in any other pursuit, less distinguished by recklessness and trespass,—have led at once to the propriety of totally remodelling the business, adapting it to the new condition of things, and, in this way, disarming it, as well as they might, of its awkward and unpleasant necessities. They should then have gone into a patient inquiry as to the character of the new consumers—the sort of books most likely to suit them, and the minimum cost at which such books could be prepared and sold. This inquiry might have resulted in the discovery which we think it likely will yet be made of two very distinct classes of purchasers; the one, solicitous only of the printed matter—satisfied to have it, if cheap, in any readable form and condition; the other, less indifferent to externals, and willing to pay something more for a large, clear type, and tolerably fine paper. This matter might very easily be managed by striking off two editions from the same face of metal, making the difference entirely to consist in the quality of the paper. The difference in price to the customer might be simply the additional cost of paper, as such an impression would involve no other expense to the publisher. By many, even of the poorer class, the novelty of Cheap Literature being once over—books will be bought with some reference to their fitness for the library. The eye will require to be satisfied as well as the mind, and even where the mind only would seem to be concerned, its pleasantest impressions of an object are derived through the medium of this most jealous sentinel of thought. We are apt to be persuaded of the inferiority of an object, which comes to us in an inferior garment—our tastes, wherever active, insensibly affect our judgments; and, with most persons, the satisfaction of reading an author, however meritorious, is materially diminished, when the eye grows weary in a continual struggle with diminutive type, and dim impressions on thin and dingy paper—already, it appears to us, that the publishers are becoming sensible to this suggestion. We mark considerable improvement in some of their publications, particularly of the Boston press; and if Winchester's "Mysteries of Paris" had been put forth on superior paper, no handsomer book of its class would have ever issued from the American press.

Carrying out their inquiry as to the degree of reduction which might be made in the cost of books to the public, considering the while, the claims of all the mechanical agents in their preparation, it would not be amiss, and would be prudent, to include the author. Suppose then, with some reference to him, a calculation of this sort to be made in the case of any single style of publication—take, for example, a popular novel, 12 mo., of 500 pages, the ordinary form, to which, until recently, the public had been accustomed. We will suppose (and this we think a liberal allowance) that it will cost $500 to stereotype such a work. The paper necessary for 20,000 copies, press-work, folding, stitching and all other expenses, I estimate (though I have no good means, where I am, of arriving at the amount) at $2,500 more. Three thousand dollars, therefore, will be about the whole cost of a publication, which, sold at 25 cents. (now sold, in the case of Mr. Cooper's novels, at twice that amount) will yield $5,000. This, after defraying all expenses, including a fair interest on the publisher's capital, would leave two thousand dollars for division—we will suppose equally—between publisher and author. On such a division as this, the author could live. It will be for men of other professions, law, medicine, &c., to say how well. We have shown, however, in previous passages, that, on the general average, he never got so much even in the best days of American letters. But if, instead of the more expensive form of publication above referred to, we should adopt, for estimate, the cheaper style which now prevails—the octavo, double column, seldom containing more than 100 to 130 pages, and sold in the shops at 25 cents—I am persuaded the profits would be much greater. I have before me at this moment, four of these publications, all from different houses in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. The first—"Self Devotion," issued by Harper & Brothers, contains 125 pages; the second, "Henrietta Temple," from the press of Burgess and Zeiber, Philadelphia, contains 124; the third, "One Hundred Romances of Real Life," published by J. Winchester, contains but 80, but these are much larger pages, and the volume, in all probability, contains quite as much letter press as either of the preceding; while the fourth, and the neatest publication of the whole, "The H— Family," issued by Munroe & Co. of Boston, contains but 76 small octavo pages. We will base our conjectural estimate upon the work, seemingly the most expensive of the four, that of Harper & Brothers. To stereotype such a work will cost, we will say, 300. My own notion is, that less than $900 would be more near the truth. The paper necessary for 20,000 copies, press work, &c., $1,700: total $3,000. It is sold, like the former, at 25 cents, and if the whole edition is sold, the clear profits must be $3,000. The whole edition may not be sold. On this subject, we have no means of arriving at the truth. It is a secret with the publishers; one of whom we have heard say, in the case of a native author, "we dare not tell him how many copies were sold." Our estimate in the present instance, is based upon the language of the advertisements, and of the newspaper editors, who frequently assure us, that the sale very frequently far exceeds that number. Now, to neither of the authors of the four works above mentioned, do the American publishers award a copper. Suppose them to be only half as liberal as they are enterprising, and how easy to have assigned to the writer of the book from $500 to $1000 out of its own profits, without adding a cent to the price of the volume, as offered to the public? Suppose, therefore, that the author should be allowed to enter into the cost of a book, on similar footing with the compositor, the pressman, the paper-maker and the vendor, and do we not see by this calculation—always assuming that it approximates the truth—how absurd is the pretext, how impertinent the clamor, that a concession of copyright to the foreign author is to increase enormously the expense of his production. The price here set down for him is the very sum, which, without any law of copy, the publishers volunteered in the case of favorite English authors. Mr. Bulwer received £200 from Harper & Brothers, for the sheets of his new works in advance of their publication in England, merely to forestall their competitors at home. If such an amount is given for such a purpose, what might they not afford, from their profits, to become, really and legitimately, the exclusive possessors of his copyright? We have seen, by a previous estimate, what were the reasons for the costliness of a London publication—its more open and expensive style of printing, the greater quantity of paper consumed in each copy (frequently over 1000 pages in a popular novel, seldom less)—the superior beauty of the paper, the smallness of the editions, and the cost of copyright. The English work, if printed in America, under a privilege of copyright, must still follow the laws of our market—must be put forth in similar style and similar cost with our own. The publishers have no right to assume English prices for the American dealers, for the very sufficient reason, that it is pecuniarily impossible that our people should pay them. We have no such wealth as in England—no such aristocracy. The annual income of an English nobleman is frequently greater than the whole fortune of our wealthy man. We have no class sufficiently numerous to elevate literature into that luxury which it is in London, and to maintain it, apart from all the tastes and desires of the great body of the people. What can our people pay? What will they pay? They can pay an author according to American standards! They are not unwilling we believe, to do so! they are not unwilling that he, without whom there would be neither printer nor publisher at all, should share on equal terms with printer and publisher, the fruits of his own genius and industry! For a solution of these queries, the legislator must look to himself and to the people, rather than to publishers and paper-makers. Without going out of his own thoughts, he must see, that any charge of the English author for his copyright in this country, much beyond that given to the reputable American, would have the effect of excluding him from publication altogether. The publishers themselves would settle that, even if the common laws of demand and supply did not.

Thus then, with some modifications, stands the case at present with our publishers and authors. These modifications, as they suggest some farther views of the subject, the bearing of which may be seen hereafter, it will be prudent to consider now. It must be very evident to all, unless it be the publishers themselves, that, for the present, they have sounded the very depths of the American appetite for reading. Books are now so very cheap, that all who entertain the smallest desire for them, may, at the smallest sacrifice, command them. They contemplate the very poorest classes, and seeking these, have spread themselves over city and forest, somewhat, we fancy, at the expense of the journal—the literary newspaper—with which they began their own experiments. In this way, they have done something indirectly in behalf of the magazines. These, as affording almost the only field for the exercise of the original mind of the country, have undergone improvement. In this way, their claims upon the public have been increased. In achieving this wide spread circulation for their books, the publishers have been shown that the appetite of the consumer, however ravenous at first, has undergone some amelioration. Purchasers, however numerous, must have their limit. Supposing the United States to contain thirty thousand persons who buy every cheap book that is published—it will be seen, that it is still a physical impossibility that they should, by any process of mastication, consume the very books they buy. In converting books into a necessary, our publishers went a step too far, and it now may reasonably be feared, that they have also done something towards making them a drug. There may be a surfeit of books as well as other good things. Life is not to be given up to reading any more than to play. The first great object of the publisher is to understand his public, so as to adapt their supplies not less to their duties than their wants: to their leisure, not less than their appetites. Certain thousands of books, for inevitable use, such as those required by schools and colleges, must be calculated with reference to the educational habits of the country; the pursuit of science has its wants, which, in like manner, may be fixed in arbitrary numbers; but of the books which appeal to the affections, the sentiments and the tastes of mankind, it is more difficult, yet not less necessary, to determine what should be the supply. These tastes and sentiments fluctuate, are capriciously constituted, and must be watched with patient and philosophic attention. One season finds them thirsting after poetry—the ballad epics of Scott; the passionate fragments of Byron: the lascivious ditties of Moore. Another month, and the passion for the prose romance swallows up all beside. Pursue this idea, and we have a singular study for the psychologist as well as the publisher. Books, appealing to the tastes, and not the necessities of society, are so many delicacies, to be enjoyed when the meal of the day is over. Convert them into the main meal, and they cloy upon the appetite and are discarded with loathing. We fear that some such fate is about to attend the excess of good things thrown before the public like so much offal, in the shape of Cheap Literature. The publisher will find it necessary to improve the style of these publications, increasing, within certain limits, their cost and diminishing their numbers. Even the poor, to whom cheap publications are chiefly addressed, if they do not come to sicken of them, can only buy them with reference to the hour, which they can snatch from daily toils for recreation. Even those who devour books without digestion—the gourmand of the popular novel—a peculiar race, who skip the sentiment for the story, and, under different names, go through the same story every day—even these begin to show signs of flagging in the struggle to keep up with the publishers. Their tastes are becoming more and more delicate—they begin to pick and choose—they no longer buy every thing, and seem to have resolved, among themselves, that, after their present surfeit on this kind of fare, literature should again become a luxury. Books, simply because they are cheap, are not now necessarily sold. That time has gone by. Something more is to be done, in order to provoke the languid and declining appetite. The innovators upon the ancient order of things are the first to show that they feel this necessity. They labored, as we have shown, under certain disadvantages. They had no great capital in the first place, and, in the use of this, upon the current Literature of Great Britain, they could contend only on equal ground with those who controlled much more. That literature being derelict in this country, the privileges of poaching were simply equal,—the longest purse having the advantage. They had no stereotype plates, already cast, of the solid standard works, which, in greater or less number, would always sell. Every book which they issued, was, consequently, at the full cost of all the materials,—except the Literature—the very soul of the whole. It was evident, that something must be done, to equalize the advantages possessed by the capitalists. What is the remedy? The native author is put in requisition. Appropriations are made, in his behalf, of twenty, fifty, nay, one hundred and fifty and two hundred dollars. But even such a degree of liberality as this, can buy but a small amount of authorship. Manuscripts, which are already on hand, may be sold at a sacrifice. Short, hurried stories, the work of a few sittings, may be yielded at fifty, or an hundred dollars; but it is very evident, that few laborers of much intellect, depending at the same time upon their labors for their livings, will long continue at this sort of business. Nay, it will not long be the policy of the publisher to procure his materials from such sources. The public will not buy them. The only mode of obtaining good Literature, will be formed in the regular employment of authors, who, however they may occasionally fail of complete success, yet, even in their very failures, prove the possession of endowments which must generally enable them to succeed.

Still, though obviously the only security for their business, the publishers relent at the necessary outlay for copyright publication. A half measure is adopted, by which it is hoped to realize the desired security, without incurring the cost of an original Literature. Translations from the Swedish and the French become the vogue, and the linguist is employed with the appropriations, which the original writer would reject. But alas! for the calculations of cupidity—generally the most short-sighted of all reasoning animals. With every motive to hostility on the part of the rival publishers, it should have been seen, that such a proceeding would afford no security. Who has not heard of the rival houses of Harper and Winchester—the rival publications of the “Mysteries of Paris,” that work, equally prurient and powerful—equally dangerous and delighting to the young imagination. No sooner has the one translator begun his work—and very good work it is—than another translation is thrown into the market at one fifth the cost of the first. The labors of the original translator are defeated; the work, if not left upon his hands, is at least shorn of its chief profits—possibly may pay expenses in the end, but will scarcely do much more. To balance this proceeding—to pay off the enemy in his own coin, an abridgement is made of the elaborate and valuable, but bigoted history of Mr. Alison. His facts and philosophies are summed up in little—well done, perhaps, though we have not seen the work,—and the sales injured, perhaps, fatally, of one of the most expensive publications of the day,—which, to reward the publishers, as it has been put forth in cheap style, required the largest possible circulation. The motive to these proceedings is mere malice, the fruit of a diseased condition of the mind, under the diseasing influences of the laws. Apart from the simple justice which an International Copyright Law would effect, it would operate the most surprising results in favor of the morals, the magnanimity, nay, the gentility of the trade.

I have now, my dear sir, at considerable length, and at some risk of being considered unnecessarily prolix, endeavored to give you the history and progress of our domestic Literature—the difficulties which it has had to encounter, which still lie in its path, and which have left its authors utterly hopeless of their occupation, unless the body to which you belong, shall bestow upon the subject that patient consideration to which it is entitled, and which you daily accord to all other subjects. In these details, I have endeavored to avoid every expression of partiality. I have arrayed my facts, and declared my opinions, with as little regard to favor as to fear. I have no personal quarrel with the publishers. On the contrary, my intercourse with them, which has been as extensive as that of almost any other American author, has been marked, on their part, with a degree of kindness and respect, which leaves me nothing to complain. In some instances, our personal relations have been particularly intimate and friendly. I should be sorry, that they should ever be disturbed. With regard to my compensation, I may frankly add, that they have treated me with as much liberality as I had any reason to expect. As I never, at any time, placed a high money value on my labors, or regarded this matter with much tenacity, it was, perhaps, easy enough to adjust our pecuniary relations without cavil or difference. My quarrel is with the system, and not with the publishers; with a condition of things of which they are the creatures; and the only reproach to them is, that they have not been as ready to avoid, or to amend it, as was consistent with a high toned liberality, or even—as I have endeavored to show—with their own interests. Had they gone hand in hand with the author, as they should have done, ten years ago, to the doors of Congress, yielding up the point of difference, and disclaiming advantages in their trade, which are possessed by no other,—our relations, at this moment, would have been more active, more agreeable to all parties, more consonant with good policy, and to those dearer interests of conscience, which make one's "bosom's lord sit lightly on his throne."

In a subsequent letter, my dear sir, I proposed to consider the subject of copyright, in reference to its intrinsic and legal merits—its claims, on principle, to the protection, which, as they can, the laws should afford—how grounded on right, and how defended by policy. I do not despair of making these things apparent to every mind, not occupied by self, nor tortured from its propriety by sophism. To you, I fancy, as to many of your associates, they are sufficiently clear already. The facts in the history I have given you, and which the desire to render copious, has probably made tedious,—incontestable as I believe them to be in all essential respects—would seem to conduct inevitably to the only certain remedy for the evils which they declare. The narrative speaks for itself. The facts call for no logician. Conscious of this, I have preferred rather to display them in proper connection to your eye, than to indulge in argument upon them. I leave this for you, and others, numerous enough, and capable enough, in your own body. The venerable Mr. Adams might well illustrate the whole subject, by equal displays of argument and eloquence; and it is only matter of surprise and mortification to the friends of letters, that he has not found it his pleasure to do so. Nor should I forget my friend, Mr. Kennedy, whose own graceful achievements in Literature subject him quite as much to reproach for his forbearance, where its interests are concerned, as for the reluctance which he manifestly exhibits, to appear more frequently in a walk, which no one would better honor than himself.

Recapitulating briefly, we find from the previous letter and the preceding pages, that the genius of our country in the arts, sciences and general literature, has proved itself capable of supplying all the mental food which it requires—that, by reason of the unusual fact, that we speak the same mother tongue with a contemporary nation, the Literature of that nation is poured in upon us, free from any of the usual obstacles which retard or prevent the progress of any other Literature into any other nation—that, in consequence of this fact, the genius of our people is not permitted to do that which the God of nature has appointed it to do—namely, to maintain the mental independence of their race, to preserve them from the moral influence of strangers, frequently pernicious, always opposed, and which, obtaining the final ascendancy in the land, must banish the representatives of the native intellect, and bring the mind of the nation slowly perhaps, but certainly, into foreign subjection. To avert this danger, to preserve themselves from this exile, the writers of the country,—those into whose hands it has fallen to perpetuate, as well as they can, the achievements, the traditions, the characteristics of their people, are almost universally agreed upon a single measure, which is commonly known by the name of an International Copyright Law, to be passed by the Congress of the United States. This law will serve us for consideration hereafter. It will be sufficient, ere I conclude here, to remark, in order, the more certainly to fix attention to this point, that the American lawgiver, having admitted the right of the American author to a certain property in his own books, he stands committed to the foreign author—he stands bound to make a like concession to the author of any book in any other nation. If it be a property in the American, it is, by every law of principle, a property in the Englishman, and to authorize his dispossession of this property in a book, on the part of the American publisher, is just as criminal as to authorize the appropriation of his ox, his ass, or any thing that is his. Where the point is brought to consideration—placed before the national mind, assembled in the highest court of the country, and the justice of the complaint is left unconsidered, the tribunal is subjected to the inevitable reproach, that it would, in like manner, authorize the appropriation of any foreign property, were it in like manner available. The laws of Moses, as I once before had occasion to remark, authorized the Jews to exact usurious interest from the stranger, not from the citizen—we, under the Christian dispensation, go one step farther, and authorize the entire appropriation of the stranger's property. Surely the point is worthy considering—surely the American name is not in such pleasant odour in Europe, that we may fold our hands quiescently, and, with the chuckle of the blindest of all passions, exclaim,—“let them curse, let them scorn as they will—are we not in possession of their goods and chattels.”

With great consideration, I am,

My dear sir, your very obliged,

And obedient servant,

Woodland, Jan. 25, 1844. W. GILMORE SIMMS.

THE VISION OF DRYTHELM.

BY MRS. JANE L. SWIFT.

“The common belief was, in early Saxon times, that there were four places for the departed spirits; as they had it taught them in the famous vision of Drythelm, the hermit of Melrose.”—Churton's Early English Church.

Within a low-roofed, darkened room
Upon a pallet, lay
A form so weakened by disease,
So wasted by decay,
That every breath the sufferer drew
In deep and mortal pain,
Seemed like the death-throe of a heart
That might not pulse again.

The wife and children—they were there
To see the good man die,
And close forever on the world
His glazed and failing eye.
The moment came—the pang was past—
The spirit-light had fled;
And then, with unavailing tears,
They mourned the precious dead.

Through that long night, the widow knelt
Beside her husband's form;
And held the clay-cold hand in hers,
And pressed with kisses warm
The cheek, that ever fondly turned
To her, in days of old—
Alas! that death should blight our love,
Ere that love has grown cold.

She thought upon each kindly word
That from those dear lips fell;
And wept, as memory retraced
The joys remembered well,
That long had clustered round her home,
And made that home so fair—
Too soon, alas! the spoiler came,
And laid her treasure there.

Alone—unwearied—still she kept
Her vigil by his side;
Still, tenderly his corse she watched—
That dead man's early bride.
Ah! none may know her feelings then,
Unless they too have lost
The prop of life's declining years,
The one they cherished most.

The night wore on—a line of gray
Just streaked the eastern sky;
And putting out the shaded lamp,
She turned her aching eyes
Upon the rigid form, that seemed
To her more ghastly pale
In th' uncertain light, that spread
Around its gloomy veil.

She stooped to kiss that marble brow—
“Oh! Drythelm, wake again!
It is thy wife that calls—alas!
That she must call in vain.”
Oh! God! why glare her eye balls so?
Why seems she turned to stone?
The dead arises from his bier,
Unaided, and alone.

No wizard spell that slumber broke—
The trance of death was o'er—
And as he looked upon his wife,
She marked the smile he wore;
Subdued, and deep'ning into awe
As shrouded memories came—
While she could only cling to him,
And call upon his name.

“I've trod the shaded valley
That bounds the spirit-land,
Yet, shrink not from me, loved one,
Mine is not death's cold hand;
I've witnessed sights of horror,
I've tasted heaven's bliss;
Oh, mortal ne'er imagined
A miracle like this.

“When Death the cord was rending
That kept my spirit here,
I saw a guardian angel
In white array appear,
With brow so pure and shining
I could not meet its ray—
He bore me onward—onward—
Upon a trackless way.

“At last I saw before me
A wide and hollow dell;
Its length and breadth were boundless,
It seemed the porch of hell.
And here, men's souls were driven
On one side into flame,
Then tossed from burning torments,
Till frozen they became.

“From heaps of snow eternal
To waves of liquid fire,
The souls of men repentant
Went through the trial dire,

That was to cleanse the wicked
 From earth's defilements past;
 And make them meet to enter
 The gate of Heaven at last.

"Beyond—a great gulf yawning—
 Unfathomable—dark—
 Excepting where its cauldron
 Sent up a lurid spark;
 Such sights, oh, God! to witness—
 Such dismal sounds to hear—
 The lost must haunt my memory
 Through many a long year.

"I thought I was deserted,
 Abandoned by my guide;
 For, when they came to seize me,
 He was not by my side.
 But, lo! a star advancing.
 Shed brightness through the gloom;
 And then, the lost ones flitted
 Back to their burning tomb.

"It was my guide returning—
 That pure and gleaming star!
 Whose ray eternal, burning,
 Had glimmered from afar;
 Through realms of space he led me
 To regions of pure air,
 While hope, again reviving,
 Soon banished my despair.

"At length, I saw before me
 A wall, so long and high
 It seemed to have no ending,
 And reached unto the sky.
 There was no door, nor window,
 Nor steps to let us in;
 But soon we reached the summit,
 And gazed from thence within.

"Behold! a blooming valley,
 A wide, and pleasant plain,
 Full of spring's choicest flowers
 That could not fade again;
 And crowds of happy spirits
 Were in these fields of rest,
 Awaiting but the summons,
 To join th' angelic blest.

"This valley of probation
 Was for the saints of earth,
 Who still might have to cancel
 Some sin that here had birth;
 Whose robes were not quite spotless,
 Nor from defilement free,
 Yet who on earth had striven
 Sinless, and pure to be,

"Once more he led me onward—
 And then upon my sight,
 There burst a blaze of glory
 From Heaven's unclouded light;
 And songs from choirs æraphic
 Fell on my ravished ear;
 As if they called me gladly,
 To share that blissful sphere.

"Oh! how I wished to linger
 Around the blest abode;
 But soon, my guide retracing
 The path that we had trod
 Along the glowing ether,
 That seemed a trackless way—
 Brought back my pining spirit
 To its frail house of clay.

"And now, it but remaineth
 To live for God and Heav'n.
 I may not slight the warning
 That he himself has giv'n,
 A life of sternest penance
 Eternal joy must win—
 A life of sternest penance
 Atone for every sin.

"To God's kind care confiding
 My wife and children dear,
 I leave my earthly blessings
 To lead a new career;
 A cell must be my dwelling,
 The cold damp ground my bed;
 And earth the stony pillow
 To rest my hoary head.

"Nay, strive not now to turn me
 From this, my high resolve,
 The interests that prompt me
 Eternal hopes involve;
 I may not, cannot listen
 To love's imploring tone,
 I go to spend my life time
 In vigils—and, alone."

* * *

A few days passed—the worthy thane
 Was faithful to his vow,
 And left the endearments of his home,
 In penury to bow
 At superstition's magic shrine
 Until his life should close—
 And thus, in penance, lived and died
 The Hermit of Melrose.

LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS.

The more enlightened kingdoms of Europe are adorned with many literary associations and scientific academies. In the Northern States of our own union, many such are found, and in that quarter there is scarcely a town, nay, even a village which may not boast of its lyceum, or its debating society. In the South, from the sparser character of the population and the paucity of towns, such institutions are, of course, much rarer; and in the West, the absorbing demands of action leave little leisure for speculation. That such associations, well-regulated, may be made effective engines of mental and moral improvement, may hardly admit of a question. They bring their members together at regular periods for mutual advancement in elevated pursuits.

The youth who, in his search for knowledge, is confined to the narrow and secluded path of his own reading and reflections, however capacious his genius, or indefatigable his industry, will encounter many perplexities and obscurities. Of his well-informed acquaintances, each, perhaps, might be able to elucidate some obscurity and disentangle some perplexity. He too, in his turn, might prove himself equally serviceable to each of them. Could, then, he and they, animated by a common and generous enthusiasm, instead of such irregular interviews as chance might occasionally turn up, or whim casually dictate, meet together with a sort of astronomic regularity, on a common platform, to compare notes and intercommunicate opinions, the advantages of such an arrangement could not fail to develop themselves. This intellectual exchange would diffuse intelligence, extend the horizon of the thoughts, correct the style and elevate the taste,—expand and strengthen all the faculties of the mind.

Upon exercise of the mind, must he rely, who would aspire to achieve conquests in the realms of literature and science. The Roman army was denominated by a word signifying “exercise;” and that army bore its victorious eagles from the burning sands of Africa to the frozen rigors of the wintry North. As physical exercise is necessary to carry on the mysterious processes, by which the body is nourished and sustained, so equally necessary is exercise of the mind for its growth and development. It is true indeed, that “the soul always thinks;” yet, unless trained and disciplined, it will think feebly and without effect. So a vessel, without rudder, or compass, although continually in motion, may toss forever to and fro upon the face of the sea, the play-thing of winds and waves. The undisciplined mind is apt to indulge in trains of vague, dreamy, crepuscular thought, which have been compared to those light summer cloud-shadows that wave over the fields and disappear, leaving no impression behind. The mind travels on, “through endless passages that lead to nothing;” it reasons so inconclusively as to arrive at no result, and the memory, like the studio of an indolent artist, is lumbered up with a confused variety of unfinished pictures.

To remedy this, is the object of literary associations. As it is said by our philosophers, that no two spectators ever perceive the same identical rainbow, so it is perhaps true, that no two minds ever look at a subject from the same point of view, or through the same medium. Hence, the interchange of various opinions is as requisite to elucidate a complex subject, as the presence of various lights is to illuminate a complex object. And as the heavenly constellation guides the mariner in his course over the trackless deserts of the sea, so the constellation of minds will enlighten the pathway of truth.

Literary associations afford also happy facilities for the cultivation of the art of composition, an art equally requisite in the ordinary business and in the elegancies of life, in expressing the brilliant sallies of wit, the generous sentiments of friendship, or the tender emotions of love. It is true, that the first efforts of the youthful mind, grappling with subjects too extensive for its grasp, will be hesitating and awkward. So are the early footsteps of childhood. But the child that now totters precariouly over the carpet, may live like Humboldt, to scale the Andes, or, like Cooke, to circumnavigate the globe.

The youthful mind has been compared to a traveller enveloped in morning mists. Gradually, as he advances, the mists will be dispersed, field and forest will emerge from their dusky shroud, the river will gleam in the distance and the hoary mountain uncover his cloud-capped summit, and as the sun “flames in the forehead of the morning sky,” the whole landscape at length stands revealed in all its beauty and sweetness and splendor.

BOOKS.

One cannot reflect without amazement, upon the vast number of books now in the world, the many that have existed but are no longer extant, and on the multitude of new ones with which the press is daily teeming. Books seem to be perpetuated by a sort of metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls. One material frame decays, but the spirit is translated into another. The great material mass of them has perished like bubbles that float for a brief hour on the face of the ocean and then sink. A few only there are “which men will not willingly let die”—these survive, destined “to flourish in immortal youth.” But these few, perhaps, contain the fifth essence of all that was worthy to endure. Books may thus be likened to a plant germinating, expanding and arriving at maturity; it falls to decay—exhales its elemental gases into the common air, and they again serve to supply the exigencies of animal and vegetable nature, in the ever circling processes of growth and reproduction.

Again the imagination may amuse itself by collecting together all the books of all ages in one vast library and setting them to balance their accounts with each other, comparing notes and each relating the history of its fortunes. Some of them, it would appear, laboriously concocted by the toils of many years, had at length started into being, in the full flower of hope and promise, and been suddenly blasted by the withering frosts of criticism, and consigned forever to the Dead Sea of oblivion. For this consummation, had the pale student outwatched the stars by his solitary lamp.

Again, one cannot help admiring the multiplicity of processes at work in the preparation of that complex creation, a book. For this end, the miner delves in subterranean gloom, for the metal of the types and press. How many busy hands are engaged in making the paper, ink, &c. &c. ! How many laborious years are necessary for the author to equip himself for his work ! See him patient and alone, referring, collating, discriminating, comparing, sifting, annotating, doubting, composing, blotting out, tearing up, correcting, interpolating, punctuating and transcribing. Then come the compositor, setting the types, the proof-reader correcting mistakes, the pressman striking off the damp sheets, the binder folding, stitching, covering, pressing, trimming, lettering, &c., &c.

The book at last completed is next to be transported over sea and land, crossing rivers and mountains, until it finally reaches the reader's hand. And then to what vicissitudes of fortune is it subject? The "Adventures of a Book," if written out, might be as entertaining as the "Adventures of a Guinea." The book may fall into good hands, perhaps into bad; it may come into the possession of a scholar, a man of letters and of taste, or of a goosecap, a blockhead, an illiterate ass. Like Gil Blas, the work may encounter many ups and downs, keep high company and low. It may be tossed on the bosom of the waters, or whirled along railways; now it may slumber on the toilet of beauty, then tremble under the auctioneer's hammer; to-day it is the companion of wealth—to-morrow it may be thumbed by the ploughman.

Æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas regum-que turres.

Could books speak, perhaps one would be heard lamenting that it was his fate ever to be misunderstood and perverted, his figures all taken in sober earnest, and his serious statements all misconstrued into metaphor and allegory. Another would be heard declaring his indifference to the ignorant neglect of his degenerate times, appealing to posterity, exulting in fancied images of future fame and posthumous renown, by hope uncurtained to his transported view.

THE PLEASURES OF READING.

Gibbon, the historian, in his autobiography, said that "he would not exchange the pleasures of reading for all the wealth of the Indies." That he who aspires at all to the dignity of a cultivated mind, should, in the first place, make himself acquainted with the history of his own country, is sufficiently obvious. To the American citizen, the discovery and settlement of the new hemisphere,—the growth of her republics,—the revolutions by which they attained their independence and their governments, laws, manners and institutions afford a wide field of inquiry. The old world opens a still wider scene,—the records of antiquity, the dim chronicles of the middle age,—feudalism and chivalry,—the papacy and the reformation,—the darkness of barbarism and the revival of letters,—the progress of literature, science, the arts and religion,—with all the various and eventful annals of modern times. The array is vast and complex; yet, while the narrative of events is so voluminous, as the narration of one country and age is oftentimes but the echo and counterpart of what occurred in other countries and other ages, only a comparatively small portion is necessary to be read for the illustration of the whole. The facts of history spread out over an immense area; its philosophy is compressed within far narrower limits.

Biography, akin to history, is still more entertaining, as "coming home to men's business and bosoms." It introduces the reader to a portrait gallery of heroes, patriots, statesmen, poets, philosophers, martyrs and saints. Poetry and Romance enchant the fancy with their beautiful creations; while the severe mathematics serve to repress the extravagance of the imagination, and strengthen the energies of the understanding. Philosophy, with one hand, unfolds the teeming wonders of the physical world; and with the other, uncurtains the mysterious phenomena of mind and spirit. Books of geography, together with voyages and travels, afford an inexhaustible fund of information in its most picturesque and fascinating form. With them the reader, seated in his own arm-chair, may expatiate at will over the several quarters of the earth, study the manners and customs of every people, investigate the productions of nature and survey the monuments of art. He may visit the pyramids that tower sublime over the sandy borders of the Nile, wander among the ivy-mantled marbles of fallen cities, and linger pensive among the echoes of deserted palaces and dilapidated temples, where,

"O'er each mouldering tower
Dim with the mist of age, gray flits the shade of power."

When satiated with the monuments of human grandeur and decay, astronomy will elevate the soul to distant worlds and sublimer scenes—the stupendous machinery of the heavens, suns and planets and systems circling harmonious through the illimitable wilderness of space. Dazzled and amazed by the "dread magnificence of heaven," man returns to the earth, which, in the comparison, dwindles to "a mere speck in one corner of the universe." But here again he finds new subjects of admiration, in the curious structure of his own body, and in the various teeming kingdoms of animate and inanimate nature. And, as in the contemplation of the heavenly bodies, he was lost in astonishment at the infinitely vast, he is now no less amazed at the infinitely small. The telescope discloses the wonders of immensity above us; the microscope discloses the equal wonders of infinity beneath us. In the tiny insect, perfectly organized, yet invisible to the naked eye and living but for a day, may be seen the impressions of the same divine hand, which guides worlds and systems "whirling in the void immense."

THE SUNFLOWER.

(VERSIIFIED FROM THE GERMAN.)

1.

O many a flower bares its breast
To the rays of the rising sun,
But among them caressing, and caress'd,
There followeth only one.
Constant the Sunflower turns, and bends,
And ever its glances upwards sends.

2.

Let our hearts be like the adoring flower,
Not only open to God—
But follow, and turn to Him every hour,
Till we reach his bright abode ;
If the dying plant worship, shall not we,
Who are promis'd an Immortality ?

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

No. II.

"An Army is a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man."—Locke.

TO THE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON :

I have endeavored to show, that the appropriate duties of our Commanding General, have been usurped by the Secretary of War, without a shadow of reason in law, and unsupported even by policy. Very recent occurrences have tended to strengthen my doubts, as to the competency of the distinguished individual now presiding over the department, to perform duties so totally at variance with his early pursuits. But having already devoted more space to his Hon. Secretaryship than I had intended, it becomes necessary to descend to persons and things in lower places. In his report, the Secretary has said, "Major General Scott has the immediate command of the Army." Coming from such authority, we must take it for granted, though no occurrences of late would have induced one to believe, that Major General Scott even existed in a military capacity, had not attention been drawn to him by the astonishing and almost incomprehensible report from his pen which accompanies the one from the Hon. Secretary. "To the many valuable suggestions, contained in the report of the Commanding General, attention is invited" by the Secretary. What those suggestions are, I am at a loss to discover. They certainly do not appear on the face of this report, a repeated examination of which, presents but three suggestions to my mind. 1st. The remounting the late second regiment of dragoons. 2nd. Interchanges of positions or districts between troops ; and this can hardly be called a recommendation, but the shadowing forth an intention to recommend in future, and should it prove unpopular, we shall hear no more of it. 3rd. The great recommendation, and the point to which his mind seemed solely directed. The repeal of the act, approved May 29th, 1830, amending the 65th article of the rules and articles of war. Which amendment humanely and wisely enacts, that when "any General officer commanding an army, or Colonel commanding a separate department, shall be the accuser or prosecutor, the court for the trial of the offender shall be ordered by the President of the United States." The humanity of this act is apparent on its very face. It was intended to protect the junior from tyranny and oppression. Very recent occurrences have proved its necessity, and I hope Congress will weigh well the effects of a repeal, before giving sanction to it, notwithstanding the high toned and indignant manner in which our commander has repelled the severe reflection it casts on them, "by supposing it possible that his juniors, no matter by whom detailed, might, at the prosecution of the commander, be subservient enough to inflict punishment against conscience, justice and law!" Courts have been found very recently, and he almost tells you so in his report, which, under threats from superior authority, have, on being reconvened, reversed former decisions and awarded severe sentences in lieu of former acquittal. One court has been found, I honor them, one and all, who entertain an opinion of their own, and entertaining, dare express it. With shame I acknowledge there has been but one. How many, "at the prosecution of a commander, were subservient enough to inflict punishments against conscience, justice and law," I should blush to acknowledge. In a future letter, I shall resume this subject ; and in the mean time, some additional light will be shed in regard to that honored, but "contumacious" court, a copy of whose proceedings I am happy to see has been called for by you.

The indelicate, ungenerous, and unprovoked attack made by the commanding General, in an official report upon the character of one, who is his senior in years, his equal in rank, and certainly not his inferior in those qualities which ennoble the man and elevate the soldier, calls for a few comments before leaving the subject. He says, "of the discipline of the Army—that important element of efficiency—prompt and cheerful obedience to law and to lawful commands, including the certain punishment of every breach of either ; of discipline, thus technically understood, I may say, if it be not universally respected and enforced on the part of commissioned officers, the exceptions have been of late but few, and are becoming yearly fewer. Here, again, as in respect to morals, science and literature, the benefits and beauty of an education at the United States Military Academy are highly conspicuous in the staff, in corps and in regiments. Throughout the whole, directly and indirectly, the standard of excellence has been greatly elevated by that institution. One officer, (occasionally on duty) with rank sufficient to render his example of disobedience, &c., highly mischievous ; some hesitancy on the part of several courts martial to punish officers for unlawfully striking or beating soldiers, and the positive refusal, as yet, of an existing court to award any correction in a like case. These are the principal exceptions, under the head discipline, which call for animadversion in a solemn report. The hesitancy, in some former courts, was soon overcome by reason and calm advice, at the instance of the executive.

The court, remaining contumacious, is, I am sorry to say, composed of officers taken from those otherwise fine regiments, the 3rd and 4th infantry, now in reserve at Jefferson Barracks. I need scarcely add, that this case and that of the individual of rank alluded to above, are not, in the special matters, under my control." This is an extract, verbatim literatim, et punctuatim, from the report of the Major General commanding the United States Army.

Never before has Carlyle's remark appeared to me more forcibly true—"Extreme exactness is the sublime of folly."

This is the only instance in which the discipline of the Army is referred to, and it would appear, that this is made solely for the purpose of securing an opportunity (I am sorry to add one is never lost) to cast odium on an "individual of rank" whose reputation was gained in hard fought battles. It was hoped, this personal warfare would cease upon the promotion of the present commander-in-chief, but his report seems to forbid the idea. It is only necessary for Major General Edward P. Gaines to exhibit in his defence the tokens of confidence received from a grateful country, to answer most eloquently the malignant and sarcastic sneers of a military rival and bitter personal enemy, though they do appear, in violation of all taste and propriety, in a "solemn report."

The Army had cause to hope for more than it has received from its present commander. The brilliancy of his achievements "in the successive conflicts of Chippewa and Niagara, and his uniform gallantry and good conduct as an officer in said Army," for which the thanks of Congress and a gold medal were tendered, induced all to suppose that his command of the American Army would prove as satisfactory, as his previous efforts on the field were brilliant and successful. Many causes combined, have prevented the fulfilment of these expectations. Not the least among them may be cited, an aspiration for political honors, and an erroneous impression, that the birth-place of a Marshall could produce none but eminent jurists.

It will become necessary to refer so often to the Commanding General and his reports, including his frequent, though fortunately unsuccessful attempts to thrust himself into political notice, that I shall pass for the present to our organization.

Our military establishment (unmilitary would be a more appropriate appellation) has for its basis the act of the 2nd of March, 1821. By this act, the line of the Army was to consist of eleven regiments. Several important changes have been made since then, and particularly by the acts of the 30th of May, 1832, 5th and 7th of July, 1838, and the 23rd of August, 1842. The result of all these changes has been, so far as the line is concerned, the addition of three regiments, a little more than one fourth of the original strength. Let us examine into the additions made to the staff during this time, not only in regard to numbers, but in rank and pay. The following table will exhibit very plainly the number and rank of officers in each department of the staff in the year 1821, when our army consisted of eleven regiments, and again in 1844, when it consists of fourteen. The enormous increase, both in numbers and rank, is almost incredible: yet it has crept upon us so gradually, that but little notice has been taken of it.

*Brevets.

Ten officers of the line, principally subalterns, were allowed by the law of 1821, to hold appointments as Assistant Quarter Masters, and receive a small addition to their pay for doing duty in that department; this appointment, however, conferred no rank, and as we have as many, or more subalterns performing the same duty now, and for which they receive no pay, that number has been very properly omitted in the table. If we but deduct the Medical and Pay Departments, which have barely kept pace with the line, the rapid, unnecessary and enormous increase of our staff is astounding. But little short of 700 per cent., during a time, when the Army, to which it is, or ought to be, merely an appendage, has only increased about 28 per cent. The number of officers in the line has not increased in that ratio, forty Lieutenants of Artillery having been discontinued in adding the three new regiments. The increase of these staff gentlemen in number, is by no means the greatest burden the Army has to bear. Look at their rank. Where is there an Army on the face of the globe having more General and field officers by one half in its staff than it has in the line? I will venture the assertion, that no other Army can be found, having even one fourth as many. If we consider this enormous increase in rank as well as numbers, and also, that the officers of all these departments receive cavalry pay and allowances, we shall find, that the actual expense of our staff, with the two previous exceptions, as compared with that of 1821, has increased at least 1,500 per cent., whilst that of the line has not exceeded 25 per cent. In the laudable ambition of your friend, Mr. McKoy, to reduce the expenditures of the government, let him not overlook these foul stains on our military legislation. But let him be careful upon whom he relies for information, and if any calls are made on the Washington City Army, the Staff Bureaux, let them be for facts, and not for the gilded pills which have been so long used in gulling the people and their representatives. I will not pretend to assert, that the staff of our Army, as organized in 1821, would be sufficient for the wants of the service at present; on the contrary, I am convinced it would not; yet I do contend, that our present staff is too ponderous for so frail a body to bear, and unless we are relieved of a part of it, the line must sink, exhausted under its weight. A glance at the Quarter Master's and Commissary's Departments, where we find mere drivers of mules, and slayers of bullocks clothed with the military rank, and eligible to the command of Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels, Majors and Captains, must convince the military eye of this fact.

The gross abuses which have crept into our service, in regard to these corps—the deception which has been practised to conceal these abuses—the odium which has been brought upon the whole Army through their instrumentality—and, finally, the enormous and useless expense to which they have subjected the country, must all be considered separately and fully before their extent and enormity can be made to appear in a proper light. The act of Congress of the 23rd of August, 1842, served as a slight check, and stopped one of the leaks through which the treasury was being exhausted. As some member remarked, in debate on that bill, “we had a double ration post in every second or third room of the war office building,” and a law, intended to cover expenses necessarily incurred by military commanders, was, by an enormous construction, made to increase the already enormous pay of at least half our staff officers. Yet, strange as it may appear, the influence of these gentlemen in Congress was so great, and their opportunities in Washington so favorable, that they convinced the Chairman of the Military Committee in the House of the injustice done them by cutting off their allowances. In a conversation with the honorable Chairman but a short time after the passage of the law, he expressed his regret, that the section referred to had found its way into the bill, and was astonished beyond measure, when answered, that it was the only redeeming feature of his whole bill of abominations. This subject will be resumed in my next, when I hope to present a few statistics in proof of the above assertions.

A SUBALTERN.

From the proceedings in the House of Representatives, I have just seen a move thus early, by the indomitable and persevering McKoy, the worthy Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to ferret out the abuses and corruptions in our Army. I hail him as a friend, and, with his consent, will unite with him in the righteous cause, “foot to foot, hand to hand, heart to heart.” Through you, I respectfully ask his attention to the table above, and the comments following it. In my next, I hope to present him with some truths, told by figures too, which will afford him grounds for reducing his appropriation bills hundreds of thousands.

The inquiries which he has made, are, many of them, very pertinent; but a want of knowledge on details, prevents the possibility of his striking at the seat of corruption. My object will be to remove the veil, expose the cancer, and afterwards assist in holding the patient, whilst he applies the knife. The Army proper, that is, the duty portion, invites scrutiny; and will rejoice to a man over the exposures which can be made, and which have only slumbered for want of champions and a channel. The latter I have found, and I hail with no little pleasure the approach of the former.

THE "TABLEAUX."—A DREAM.

BY H. P. VASS.

PART I.

SHAKESPEARE—WITH TRAGEDY AND COMEDY.

"The intention of these verses, was to commemorate a little exhibition at our boarding house, in which several of the young ladies and gentlemen took part. The object of the performance, was to personate any picture, or subject, which might be selected as interesting, the different characters assuming the dress and attitude proper to illustrate the scene; and remaining (while the curtain is drawn) motionless in that position, so as to give their figures and costume the appearance of a painting, or rather, of statuary. That part of the room, in which the spectators sit, is darkened, and a number of brilliant lights, so shaded and disposed at the sides of the stage as to throw a strong light upon the figures, which renders the illusion very perfect and beautiful, if the parts are well sustained by the performers. A number of pieces were thus performed, and much admired. Among them, were the three subjects to which my dream refers.

The first representation, discovered the bust of Shakespeare, elevated on a pedestal, with the Genius of Comedy and Tragedy on either side, arrayed in the costumes, and assuming the look and attitude appropriate to those characters—the first, with a smiling face, is in the act of crowning the immortal bard with a wreath of flowers, and seems to claim the poet as her favorite—while the more melancholy, but not less interesting Genius of Tragedy demands his attention by her tears, and the wild and hopeless despair which agitates her beautiful features. The great dramatist, equally sympathizing with each of his fair attendants, is supposed to remain transfixed and uncertain to which party he should render allegiance. The next character, to which the verses have reference, was sustained by a young lady, arrayed in the Greek costume, and the last subject of the dream, is the well known story of Virginius, the Roman Father. Having written the poetical description of the first scene, and presented it to my fair colleagues of the "Tableaux," they were pleased to express their approbation of my lines and requested me to continue the subject, so as to embrace all the pieces performed, but fearing that my dream would thus extend to a tedious, or at least an unnatural length, I selected only the three subjects to which my verses refer. It will be perceived, that I have indulged my fancy in giving action and words to some of the characters which was not the case in the representation—but I look upon this as an acknowledged poetical license, which perhaps does not require an apology."

The sun's last rays were fading in the West,
As late I wandered forth with care oppressed.
Beneath an aged tree, whose branches spread
In verdant foliage high above my head,
I laid me down and viewed the quiet scene—
The distant groves and gently sloping green;
And as I listened to the murmuring wind,
A pleasing sadness filled my pensive mind;
I thought I saw angelic forms around,
And heard sweet music wake her soothing sound.
Faint and more faint the sweet illusion grew,
And the dim forms seemed fading from my view,
Till sleep had wrapped me in her soft embrace,
When once again, with majesty and grace,
While heavenly harps their rapturous strains renew,
The pleasing vision passed before my view.

How sweet the magic strains fell o'er my ear,
Now quick and gay—now sad as Beauty's tear
And as the varied harmony I heard,
Lo! in the midst a god-like form appeared;
Upon his lofty brow, immortal Fame
Had stamped the deathless glory of his name.
A fairy form now beckons him away;
Fain would he go—yet, still he seemed to stay
Gazed on the smiling dimples of her cheek,
And heard her voice in winning accents speak.
"Oh come with me," the maiden seemed to say,
"And sweetest flowers shall strew thy joyous way,—
Come to my bower where mirth and music join,
And bright-eyed nymphs for thee the wreath entwine.
There happy fairies trip along the green,
And ever fadeless blooms the smiling scene;
Then come with me"—but hark! a mournful sigh
Stills the sweet voice—another form drew nigh,
O'er her white robe, and from her brow so fair,
Streamed the dark tresses of her raven hair;
But on that cheek no ray of pleasure shone,
And every dream of hope seemed dim and gone.
Fast fell the tear-drops from her weeping eyes,
And her fair bosom heaved with frequent sighs:
No words she spake; but all her looks confessed
The pensive grief which filled the maidens' breast.
Aloft the fatal dagger now she shook,
Then turned and wept with wild despairing look.

With courteous action, mournfully and slow,
She waves the god-like form with her to go.

Now filled with joy—now sad with woe's alarms,
Of each he feels the all resistless charms,—
With one he smiled and with the other mourned,
His awful features changing as he turned.

But oh! while thus I gazed with brief delight,
The graceful forms seemed fading from my sight.
Soft o'er my ear, the sadly pleasing strain
Of dying music sweetly swelled again;
And, like the memory of long vanished years,
Faint and more faint the lessening scene appears;
But still transfixed, great Shakespeare seemed to stand,
And still the spirits waved the beckoning hand.

PART II.

THE GREEK GIRL.

My dream was changed—far o'er the Ægean sea,
The summer winds sighed soft and mournfully.
Within a verdant isle, which seemed to sleep
On the calm bosom of the great deep,
The ruined arch and temple now were seen
In mournful contrast with the living green,
And fallen columns, carved with gorgeous art,
Told their sad story to the dreamer's heart,—
Told of the glory of a former age,
Ere Greece lived not alone on History's page.
And ever and anon the fitful blast
Sighed o'er the ruined relics of the past—
But not all desolate—the lovely scene,
Where nought but grace and beauty once had been;
Still bloomed the flowers; and every whispering gale
Wasted their fragrance o'er the peaceful vale.

Lo! in a bower with sweetest flowers entwined,
Fancy beheld a lovely maid reclined;
Graceful her form—and from her soft dark eyes,
All lovely as her cloudless summer skies,
There beamed a radiance, so divinely bright,
As if the stars had lent their heavenly light,
And to the maiden such enchantment given,
That mortals scarce could claim what seemed of heaven.

How oft I tried her witching glance to meet,
And vainly sighed to worship at her feet;
But ah! even as I gazed upon the maid,
All the fair scene grew dim and seemed to fade;
And nothing could my anxious fears dispell,
When 'round the isle I saw the billows swell,
And the dark waves sweep o'er the fairy scene
Where the bright island of my dream had been.

For the sweet maiden's fate, fast fell my tears,
When lo! a fairy bark in sight appears—
Onward she flies before the rising gale,
That hurries far away her lessening sail,
But still I marked upon her deck a form,
Which Heaven would keep amid the howling storm;
For, while the rude winds with her dark locks played,
"Tis she," I cried, "my charming Grecian maid.
Ye cruel winds, that bear her from my view,
On waft to her my long and sad adieu!"

PART III.

VIRGINIUS.

The vision changed—a sadder scene appears,
Which well might call forth sorrow's bitter tears.
Methought, I saw the lofty swelling dome
Rise o'er the city of Imperial Rome:
What means yon mournful group advancing nigh,
And the stern vengeance in the Roman's eye,—
Why doth the sad attendant sob and weep;
Methinks, the fair haired maiden doth but sleep.
See! as her head inclines with modest grace,
Her tresses veil the beauties of her face;
But still, her features partially appear,
Pensive and sweet as Pity's trembling tear.
O'er her white neck, her sunny locks are straying,
And life's last flush o'er her fair cheek is playing;
But ah! what mean those spots of crimson hue,
Her flowing robe discloses to my view—
She droops—she falls—my sweet Virginia dies,
And her pure spirit seeks its native skies;
So sinks the lovely rose-bud's tender form,
And yields its opening beauties to decay;
So bends the lily to the driving storm,
When the bleak winds bear all its sweets away.

"Awake," I cried, "Virginia, awake—
One last fond look, oh! give, for mercy's sake;—
Yield, yield not yet to heaven thy parting breath;
Lovely in life, I'll follow thee in death.
Let me fly with thee to those realms above,
Where we shall live in fadeless, endless love:
Earth has for me no joys when thou art gone,
Then leave me not in the cold world alone.
Sadly I'll wander by the lone sea shore,
And weep—when I behold thy form no more;
And every mournful breeze that passes by,
Will bear to thee my bosom's ceaseless sigh."
Sad and distressed, in vain, methought I cried;
For to my grief no answering voice replied.
With wild despair and vengeance in his eye,
The Roman raised the fatal knife on high:
One moment o'er her bleeding form he dwells,
And all the anguish of a father feels.
From her cold cheek, the sunny locks he drew,
As if to breathe a long and last adieu,—
Gazed on the marble features of his child,
Tears fled with looks of desperation wild.
Confused and dim, strange forms seemed hovering by,
And "Vengeance" and "Revenge" was still the cry.
The sky grew black, as if the gods looked down,

To blast the Tyrant with their withering frown;
And far behind, by the pale light, methought
I saw the Roman grasp the tyrant's throat:
Down, down to Earth he hurls his struggling form,
While thus his voice is heard above the storm—
"Relentless Tyrant, have I crossed thy path,
Now shalt thou feel a ruined Father's wrath.
Behold the hand that nipped my tender flower,
To shield her from a cruel despot's power,—
Know that the hand which struck that fatal blow,
Shall bear thee, Traitor, to the shades below.—
Think, that thou hear'st my lost Virginia sigh,
And in thy sins, Remorseless Tyrant—die!
I saw no more—for clouds had rolled between,
And from my sight veiled the dark tragic scene;
And the wild tempest, and the howling wind
Raised such a tumult in my anxious mind,
That sudden I awoke. The stars on high
Sparkled like gems in the blue vaulted sky;
All the bright beings of my dream had fled,
And dying night-winds sighed around my head;—
Lonely I wandered by the moon's pale ray,
And homeward took my solitary way.

PRETENSION.

By the Authoress of "The Vow," "Lona D'Alvarez," &c.

CHAPTER I.

"The world is still deceived with ornament,
That seeming truth which cunning times put on,
To entrap the wisest."

"O, what a goodly outside falsehood bath."

Merchant of Venice.

"Really, Almeria, you must abandon your late hours and continual whirl of dissipation, for positively you are beginning to look decidedly passee," said Mrs. Clifton, as she anxiously gazed upon her daughter, who was languidly sipping her morning chocolate.

"Very true, Mama," drawled Almeria after a pause,—slowly sitting the richly gilded cup on the breakfast table, and lifting her eyes towards an opposite mirror. "La beauté passé promptement—now-a-days, that of Almeria Clifton depends solely upon the goodly outside of dress."

But it was very evident from the deep lines indented upon her brow as she glanced over her whole person, that the careless, gay remark was not the prompting of an equally careless heart, entirely indifferent to the sad truth of the mirror's reflection. Whirling a lounge near the fire, she threw herself upon it, exclaiming—

"I have doubtless terribly disappointed you my ambitious mère—and you are beginning to fear being the mother of an old maiden daughter."

There was a slight sneer upon Mrs. Clifton's lip, and a shade of harshness rested on her brow as she listened to the taunting remark of Almeria, and witnessed her disrespectful nonchalance of manner. No one, to have then seen the fashionable Miss Clifton, would have recognized the same person whose success had been so brilliant at a private ball the previous night. Although, respecting the perfection of features, or complexion, she had never been strictly awarded the palm of beauty—yet so exquisite was her taste in dress, so decidedly fashionable her whole air and appearance,—united with the high finish of an accomplished education, that she often enjoyed the eclat of belledom, when many of far greater claims to that just merit, were passed by as inferior, unnoticed and unknown. She had only one tolerable feature, her eye, which was full, lustrous and dark, and often sparkling with intelligent animation—such glances, however, were generally reserved for the hour of captivation, or studied policy. Nay, her every expression of countenance was with her a complete toil of care. She had at will the tendre, bewitching, innocent, and all those winning glances deemed irresistible in a woman. Art supplied all other deficiencies. So long as Mons. Lereux's cosmetics were fresh, so was her complexion; from his case of divine curls, she could always select a rich mass of dark ringlets, which were so tastefully and artfully intermingled with her own scanty portion of hair, as to defy the detection of even that obsequious coiffeur. Dr. Bodine had so scientifically inserted, and exquisitely matched several front teeth, that hardly one of his acute clan could have pointed the counterfeit from the real. Added to these conveniently supplied deficiencies, were the unrivalled efforts of Madame Deveux' skill, in proportioning the usual parts of dress to her person which was naturally graceful, and of that size, susceptible of any plastic formation. 'Tis true, Nature had not entirely been niggard of her gifts towards the ambitious Almeria; for no one could boast of a more perfect foot and hand than she, and surely no one could have understood better, the art of displaying them to the best advantage. The former was of fairy size and perfect proportion, and the latter of aristocratic mould and color. Neither of these desirable gifts were suffered to remain often in the shade of obscurity, but were visible in every movement. In fine, there was no effort or external appliance spared by Almeria to appear a beauty—which gifted possession, no one could have more ardently coveted than she did.

On the morning we have alluded to, every graceful appliance had been laid aside in her own chamber, to be resumed at a more fashionable hour, and she appeared in all her native and unadorned laid-deur. Greasy papers concealed little knots of frizzly hair around her forehead, which was of that sallow hue, and glistening smoothness so opposed to all that fresh velvet softness of youth. Her cheeks were, if possible, of a deeper shade of that dreaded color—and under those sparkling lustrous eyes, were those distressingly dark lines—dissipation or excess never fails to paint with a deep tint, even upon the most youthful face. A dark, and by no means very clean calico robe dé chambre, was folded carelessly around her tall person, her delicately cherished hands were encased in short fingered, soiled kid gloves, and those fairy-like feet were suffered to rest comfortably, in embroidered slippers of the utmost softness, but which bore the marks of better days. Well might Mrs. C.'s countenance express disappointment and mortification, when the sole heiress of her store of maternal affections—her pride and only child, appeared before her thus completely disrobed of every personal attraction. But Almeria seemed not to share her feelings, or to return by word, look or manner, any of her expressed solicitude. She continued her reclining posture, hardly aware of the presence of any one worthy the effort of conversation or notice.

"Had you a pleasant party last night?" again spoke Mrs. Clifton after a pause. "Was Sinclair the devoted, in his attentions?"

"Passably agreeable; but I hazarded another scheme last night, I chose to play the cold and indifferent to Mons. Sinclair. It is not always judicious in a young lady, to evince too much anxiety in wearing her cap, after it has been successfully set. Many have lost a heart by too much pains to secure it. Men are so wily, and always on the alert against what they call the snares of beauty, that they begin to garner up suspicion, when a woman smiles too acquiescing."

But Mrs. C. was not to be deceived by the evasive nonchalance of her daughter's reply—she shook her head, saying:

"You would never have been thus venturesome, but from some powerful policy or motive. I suspect, Edward Lorimer was not a little connected with such tactics. It is high time you had discarded all such girlish flippant airs, and cease encouraging the attention of such a parvenue as he. You appear to forget entirely your twenty fifth birth-day is fast approaching—which age let a girl round off, and then, farewell to fresh charms, or naïveté of manner. They don't draw well in such traces."

Almeria, in vain, endeavored to maintain her usual sang froid. A slight flush passed over her sallow cheek, when she lifted her languid eye to her mother's face, and met her scrutinizing look. The remark evidently disconcerted her.

"The world shall never know when I round it off, and methinks, my fastidious Mama will be the last one to apprise them of it. She likes too well to play the agreeable, affable widow, in her rustling satin, to arouse any suspicious calculation of her own age, by announcing that of her daughter."

It was not often that Almeria cared to restrain her bitterness of feeling, even towards a parent, so little was she accustomed to self-government, and so sadly wanting in a heart that "knew a generous thought." But now, that parent had unkindly reminded her of what few women can patiently bear.

an allusion to her age, for what truth is more repulsive and annoying than ——— "to be told

The melancholy fact, that we grow old."

"One thing is certain, I cannot long support my present style of living," continued Mrs. C. "I have already expended too much in re-furnishing our house so expensively, while I have drained, as Cowper says, 'my cellar dry and larder clean,' to appear to the world rich. Your education and position in society, which, together with your frequent trips to cities and fashionable watering places, have nearly exhausted the principal of my fortune, to say nothing about my original income. It would, no doubt, be rather mortifying, after so much unwearying indulgence, to curtail your luxuries, and appear to the astonished world in your own true light, disrobed of the dazzling gloss of wealth!"

"It would indeed," returned Almeria, thoughtfully, "but, I rely upon your thrifty economy, 'to keep up the noble ship from sinking,' as Lieut. Gordon always says about a waning lady. This you can manage to do very successfully, until I make an advantageous settlement."

"And that you will certainly never do," retorted the mother, contemptuously, "so long as Edward Lorimor is single. All the Sinclaire's, Hamilton's, and a host of other eligible wooers, might 'sigh like furnaces' to you in vain, notwithstanding my repeated arguments and entreaties, that you should discontinue the attentions of such a pauvre young man. I often repent ever consenting to take charge of Evora Beaufort, since it subjects us to a familiar acquaintance with her nominal guardian, Edward Lorimor. It was well for the poor orphan, that he was absent, when her aunt died, or I know, I never would have thus charitably accepted the trust, Miss Catharine Beaufort so imploringly assigned to me. I might have been guarded, as usual, with my well-tryed armor of suspicion."

"Quiet your fears, Mamma, and doff your charitable armor, respecting Mr. Lorimor's designs upon my heart. I wonder where your usual clear-sightedness has fled—for he evidently visits us only for the sake of Evora, who has managed to pretty securely entwine herself in his friendly interest. I never saw a guardian more indulgent or attentive, for all of which, I admire him the more. His generosity is unparalleled, towards one so desolate."

"Not so very desolate. I am sure the small anxiety left her by her aunt, might be some object, with one so poor as he, to have the management of! At any rate, I do not like him, and I know my suspicion respecting your sentiments of regard and admiration for him is not unfounded. You would make a pretty useful wife truly for a poor lawyer, and one too, rather advanced in years."

Almeria half arose from her recumbency, while the fire of indignation burnt in her dark eye.

"I would, indeed, be one far too unworthy of such as Edward Lorimor, having been so long under the tutelage of a heartlessness, that inculcates a marriage of convenience as the summum bonum of all earthly happiness, and to cultivate the flower of pure love in the heart, is time misspent, and feeling wasted. But fear not," added she, somewhat softened, "your daughter is equally politic and manœuvring—in every respect worthy your untiring preceptive care. Edward Lorimor will never be blessed with the hand of Almeria Clifton."

As the last words escaped her, a servant entered, bearing a note upon a splendid wrought silver waiter. Almeria opened it—a beautiful embossed card fell from the envelope, which she no sooner read, than a curl of haughty scorn wreathed her lip, as she tossed it to Mrs. C.

"Mr. and Mrs. Brownlow's compliments," &c.

"They climbing the flowery steep of fashion and aristocracy! How the vulgar do pant for praise, and how absurd their folly in supposing that 'leather and prunella' could ever tread those dear proscribed paths. Alas! poor moths, they know not that

'Pigmies will be pigmies still, though perch'd on Alps.'

I suppose from your recently expressed regrets at your expensive style, Mamma, I must not dare to name giving a party myself!"

"What, another, after all that expense and turmoil last winter? Not I, indeed, and you cannot question the propriety of my decision, did you but deign to look around you at the luxury courting your every glance, and which, I sadly fear, will yet prove my downfall."

Almeria's eye carelessly followed the motion of her mother's, as she cast it around the room, which did, indeed, speak the lavish expense alluded to. A rich carpet nearly buried the foot in its gorgeous velvet tuft—orange satin damask curtains, whose graceful folds were caught up by splendid gilded serpents, revealing embroidered muslin hangings, of the finest texture. Beautiful vases, mantle lamps and ornaments—large polished mirrors, wooing the anxious eye every where—massive pieces of silver glistened on the various, heavily carved tables—the walls were hung with the richest and rarest paintings, while lounges, ottomans, fauteuils, and chairs of velvet cushions, were placed in fashionable disorder throughout the room. Folding doors of shining mahogany, were partially opened, giving a glimpse of another parlor, if possible, more elegantly furnished, but reserved for more particular use.

Almeria's voice broke upon the reverie of Mrs. C., caused by the sight of so much elegant expense and taste. "I heard Sinclaire say, he became acquainted with Peter Brownslow in some city, and I do suppose, they have determined it shall be known to the world, that one of such wealth and so distinguished in his appearance is an old friend, and claims their attention, though he is so much above their coarse stamp and pretensions. The party was, no doubt, hatched up for this display, which, of course, he will be compelled to attend, and I must even do the same on his account. It is bad enough to be forced to go to it, but much worse to return the compliment. Just think of our inviting a tailor's family, to mingle with their employers. Shocking alternative! I do despise such aspiring people; because they have acquired a little yellow dress, they forget immediately their own hands vulgarly toiled to accumulate it."

"Tis an evil we are compelled to submit to," replied Mrs. C., "and, in my opinion, one of the greatest, incident to American freedom and republicanism. This, is indeed, a mushroom age, and, as Shakspeare says, one would have to sift 'a bushel of chaff, to get a grain of wheat.' But Almeria, look at the hour, it is time you had attended to your toilet—remember, I only use this room while Sinclair is in the city—he is so given to early calls, and it looks so much more aristocratic to be accidentally seen in an apartment like this, as if it was commonly used. At the risk of every thing, we must keep up the semblance, to one like him."

"Yes, indeed," returned Almeria, rising to obey her mother's injunction, "it would, doubtless, horrify his fastidious eye, as also our high family pride, were he ushered into our usual breakfast room. High life below stairs, no matter what goes on above, the tact is, not to incautiously lift the gorgeous curtain, before the scenes are well acted."

At that moment, the door opened, and a young girl came bounding in, with all the grace of a fawn; her straw bonnet had fallen back upon her well rounded shoulders, over which floated, in wanton profusion, the richest curls of dark auburn. Her cheeks were glowing with the bright radiance of health, and her eyes dancing with gladness, while her lips, so bursting red, were slightly parted. She was about to approach Mrs. C., but panting for breath, she paused, and turned to Almeria—

"Glittering in beauty and innocence
A radiant vision, in her joy she moved
More like a poet's dream, in form divine."

"See, Miss Almeria," said she, holding up a large bunch of wild flowers, "what a beautiful bouquet I have gathered for you in my morning ramble; although the flowers are not quite so rich and rare as those Mr. Sinclair brought you from the public garden, still they are equally fragrant."

"Pshaw, Evora, how you alarmed me, I thought you were some visitor. You are forever filling the vases with your common hill-side flowers."

Almeria roughly pushed away the small hand, that was held towards her, while Mrs. Clifton said, sternly—

"A pretty way of spending your time truly—go to your embroidery. I am in want of the ottomans, and I do wish you would cease your very infantile ways, and cultivate more refinement of taste. You will never lose your gaucherie of manner, and, notwithstanding you have always a pattern of excelling grace and fashion in Almeria, it does indeed seem, as if you had only been raised with vulgar, low-bred mechanics."

"She would find a proper element, were you to permit her to attend the Brownslow's party. Really if she had have been invited, I would delight to see her moving in that courtly throng, with her accustomed childish glee and ease."

As Almeria's stately form glided from the room, poor Evora, abashed, shrunk away, and seated herself in a recess, nearly concealed from the view, by the sweeping folds of the curtains. Her head sunk upon her throbbing bosom, while the long curls kissed her varying cheek, over which stole tears, more bright and transparent, than winter's congealed gems. The paleness and quivering of her full curved lips, bespoke some inward painful emotion, while her delicate fingers nervously plied the needle upon the gorgeous flowers of worsted embroidery.

"Evora," said Mrs. C., coldly addressing her. "I do not think it proper in one so young to walk out alone, even in the morning. You appear, recently, to think my advice or opinion, of small importance, and I am sorry to say, you are often forgetful of your promise to your dying aunt, to render me entire obedience."

A low sob from Evora, was all the answer Mrs. C. received for some time; at length, she ventured in a trembling voice to reply:

"I was not aware you disapproved of my morning walks with Mr. Lorimer, for he always accompanies me, and I am truly sorry you have cause to reproach me with disobedience. But if a promise of renewed exertions, to secure your kind approbation of my conduct, will atone for what I have done wrong, I will willingly make it."

Evora happily did not see the haughty look of Mrs. Clifton, when she answered:

"Oh! I suppose you only care to play the obedient and grateful to your very attentive guardian, Mr. Lorimer—as to my approbation, that is a matter of secondary importance, when his is to be secured. I did not know he was the companion of your charming walks, which, hereafter, I desire may be discontinued. If you are so very young, you are too old to transcend the limits of female propriety. Come, it is nearly the hour for visiting. Almeria expects a stranger to call on her this morning, and as it is time enough yet, for you to grace the parlor with your presence, you can retire to another room."

Evora, in silence, was about to gather up her embroidery and obey the command, when Mrs. C. interrupted her, saying:

"Oh no! leave your frame and worsted balls, also your paintings in the recess, it gives the room an air of taste and elegant refinement, peculiarly attractive, to see such graceful implements of female industry mingled with the splendid array of costly art."

The door had scarcely closed upon the retiring Evora, when Mr. Sinclair was ushered in. Mrs. Clifton gracefully arose from her fanteuil to welcome the elegantly dressed, highly perfumed and distinguished visitor, whose matchless whiskers and curling mustache would have been the envy of admiring kings.

"Excuse the present dishabille of our sitting-room," said she with careless ease, "this is our little sanctum, where, sans cérémonie, we can loiter away our time, unrestrained by the fetters of fashion or form. My daughter generally pursues her morning studies and avocations here, undisturbed. Mr. Sinclair took the offered chair, with equal grace of manner, asking, in his most honied tone, 'If Miss Clifton was visible, and in health, after the dissipation of last evening?'"

"Oh yes," replied Mrs. C., "Almeria possesses a mind, so happily 'tempered and mixed' with those ingredients, which make our own felicity, that she rarely seems to be oppressed by any artificial excitement of giddy pleasure. In the morning, she is as fresh as the mountain dews, and just as eager for another rout, as if she had enjoyed an interval of rustication. Now, is the happiest time with all of her age, while the world is full of new delights, and when the froth of enjoyment mantles high. I only hope her native innocence and warmth of heart, may never become cruelly blasted, or receive a harsh check."

Miss Clifton appears indeed, truly blessed with a fine flow of spirits, and that happy faculty of only viewing the brightest side of life's picture. I presume her worldly career is just in its dawn, as I have heard you had resided here, but a short time.

"Not longer than two winters," returned Mrs. C. quickly, "but excuse my remissness (rising and pointing to the fire.) I have permitted you to become almost chilled, we will find more comfortable cheer in the parlor."

"Not before I have examined these beautiful paintings," said Sinclair, pausing before the recess window, where many sketches, with a handsome port-folio and drawing implements, lay upon a small table, inlaid with carved ivory. "This is really exquisite," continued he, holding up a painting; "I never saw a more correct or perfect sketch of Loch Leven. I presume Miss Clifton spends much of her time in cultivating her evidently fine talents?"

"Yes," spoke Mrs. C., carelessly, "she gives what few spare moments she can from her music and French to her painting—but really, they are lamentably few—she is so constantly engaged with company. There's her embroidery, and other more useful employments, almost neglected for the want of time; I fear my ottomans will never be finished."

Sinclair's eye followed Mrs. C.'s, and rested upon the embroidery, but he again turned over the drawings, remarking—"they displayed too much talent and taste in their execution, to be neglected."

"I believe I hear Almeria in the parlour," said Mrs. Clifton, as she led the way, followed by Mr. Sinclair.

Almeria's start of surprise was managed with all possible grace and art. She was seated beside her harp, holding the tuning key in her beautiful hand, on which glittered many rare jewels, as if about to tune it, but perceiving Mr. Sinclair, she gaily threw it down, exclaiming joyously:

"Mr. Sinclair with Mamma, instead of my expected odious maître de musique Bonjour monsieur, soyez le bienvenu."

"But I may lay the 'flattering unction' of your welcome, entirely to the non-appearance of your music master," said Sinclair, in his most winning tones. "Permit me," continued he, approaching the harp, "to supply his place, and request you to play me a tune."

"Not I, indeed," said she, gaily shaking her head and pushing away the magnificent harp playfully with her petite foot, "I fear you would be a more authoritative and relentless critic than good Mons. Fontaine. I'm so tired of every thing in the way of employment, I'm determined to take 'time by the forward top,' and shoot folly as it flies. Look here at my precious bouquet of wild flowers, which generally rewards me for my matin rambles."

Sinclair gallantly plucked one from the vase, and as he placed it in his richly embroidered vest, he vowed he would preserve it as a memento of a nature-loving votary of fashion—a strange anomaly in the shifting giddy circle of wordly pleasure. "I shall hereafter, play the spy upon your morning rambles, and with your permission share some of their refreshing delights. I have just had the pleasure of examining your paintings, and 'pon honor, Loch Leven is portrayed with such vivid life, I almost stood 'neath the shadow of its frowning gray walls."

"I believe you are what the world calls a travelled gentleman—do tell me something about dear romantic Scotland, the land of elves, hobgoblins and spirits of all kinds. The genius of Walter Scott, has thrown a magic charm around its every glen, valley and highland. Would that I could roam o'er those hallowed spots—to climb its hoary mountains—to 'sit and muse' o'er its rocky cliffs, gazing down upon the now roaring and now silent waters of its numerous streams and lochs—whilst I sketched some of the surrounding sublime scenery. Methinks, I can hear the merry bag-pipes of those noble highland chiefs of valorous heart and sturdy mould. Did you ever meet with any of that towering race, and did you bring many sketches home with you?" asked Almeria, in the most playfully childish manner.

Sinclair replied in the negative, saying, he "unfortunately made so rapid a tour through that country, as also through others—he had no time to indulge his tastes or inclinations. However, the scenery was so vividly imprinted upon the tablet of memory, he intended, at some future day, sketching some of its most consecrated spots. By-the-by," added he, evidently desirous to change the conversation, and taking up a note of invitation from a filagree basket on the table, "do you expect to attend Mr. Brownslow's party? Pray who and what are they—I have a slight acquaintance with the younger Mr. Brownslow?"

Almeria's eyebrows (which Nature had arched rather heavily, but through the aid of the dexterous tweezer, they were made to appear most delicately pencilled) were raised with a look of suppressed irony, as she replied—

"You may well ask the question, though I am totally ignorant of their genealogical tree. America, you know, owns no family records of lineage. Mr. B. is quite a wealthy tailor, who has one son and two daughters—the latter have just returned from a boarding school of some fashionable celebrity, and now, doubtless, desire to make their entrée in genteel société although the youngest is several years my senior—past sweet eighteen."

"Will you honor them with your company?" asked Sinclair.

Almeria looked entreatingly at her mother.

"Ma chère mère, do you hear Mr. Sinclair? Now do say oui, for you know I do so dearly love dancing, and I am sure it will not affect my standing to go, besides, poor things, we ought to gratify them by some notice of their invitation!"

Mrs. Clifton looked gravely up from her knitting.

"Ah! my dear child, although I grant it may not injure your influential standing in the least to go—but do you think an intercourse with such people, very good sort of persons in their way I confess, could benefit you? In spite of all my efforts to instil into your mind a love of more rational amusements and refined intellectual pursuits, also to practice self-restraint, still you will continue to be so passionately fond of every thing that is frivolous. You should remember, that youth does not always last, or continue bright."

"Now you know, my beloved mère, (Almeria threw herself gracefully upon a tabouret at her mother's feet, and gazed coaxingly into her face) you have often said I inherited your disposition,—for which happy resemblance I am not to blame, and that my good grand-mère always indulged you. It surely did not injure you, for now you are such a pious member of the church. Perhaps I may complete the likeness, and be equally so—say, wont you let me go to the Brownslow's—if it is only to see what sort of people will be there. They will amuse me so—and I ardently pine for something new and astonishing."

Mrs. Clifton laid her hand gently upon her daughter's dark curls, saying—

"You do indeed well know how to exercise your power—I never could refuse you any thing—Heaven grant I may never repent my weakness! Would that your mother was more worthy of the 'high calling wherewith she has been called,' and that you may imitate a brighter example of piety, is her sincere prayer."

Mrs. C.'s eyes glistened with tears of fervor, as she arose, and hastily left the room.

"My dear good mère is always so kind, and withal so pious. I wish I were such a Christian, I think it would be very interesting to be a religieuse."

"What a wish for one so jeune," exclaimed Sinclair. "I guess Miss Clifton would find religion a cold panoply for her overflow of delightful spirits—who would bear an aspect grim enough to banish from her lip every gladsome smile. Such a requisite armour, is only suitable for ladies passé. But to return to the Brownslow's party—will you permit me to be your chevalier?—Sinclair rose to leave—"Call to-morrow, I will decide then; (Almeria always had the tact of arranging a second visit from a favorite gentleman) I really anticipate a deal of fun in beholding their pretensions—bah! I shall have to carry my sal volatile, to preserve my olfactories from the fusion of plebeian odors—for I expect to be jostled by rough mechanics, grocers, tanners, and all sorts—who will have no mercy on my feet. Bless me! the thought induces me to decline the honor—but then, I pine for some fun. You'll protect me from rude assaults, I suppose, and return me safe to ma chère mère?"

"Certes," returned Sinclair,—gallantly placing his hand upon his bosom—I will feel highly important with my precious trust, which will contribute greatly to mitigate my probable annoyances—resulting from the necessity, on my part, of bestowing the usual courtesies of society. Je suis tout à vous. Vous n'avez qu'à commander."

Almeria smiled her sweetest, as she gracefully bowed to her retreating lover. "Comme il vous plaira! Adieu, jusqu'au revoir" replied she, in her blindest tone.

Sinclair's aerial turrets, were of the most elevated structure, as he wended his way homewards. "Judging by outward appearances, they are certainly wealthy, and she is the sole heiress. Young, sprightly, of high ton, and fascinatingly amiable in every thing she does. I must indeed look well to my interests—for she would be a God-send of luck in my present emergency. I flatter myself, the bait has taken with her, also the wily chère mère. Smile on me propitiously, ye gods! for once, let me be successful in life's masquerade, though hypocrisy be my domino."

He had hardly descended the marble steps of

Mrs. Clifton's house, when that lady again sought her daughter, whom she found very complacently adjusting her ringlets before the mirror.

"What an inimitable actress you would make, Almeria—I never witnessed a better performed piece on the stage, and who would now recognize in you, the same care-worn, faded looking being, who, but a few hours ago, seemed incapable of even the least exertion of thought."

The metamorphose was as great as the one at the brilliant ball. Every thing about her whole mien and person bespoke juvenile grace and unimpaired health. The jaune hue of her cheek and brow was no longer visible: no rose was more fresh and bright in the surrounding vases, than the blooming color of the former; and the latter, was as fair and smooth as Parian marble. Even those pallid parched lips, were seemingly rich with the lively meandering current of nature, (thanks to Leroux' vermilion tint) as they poutingly opened, to disclose to the admiring eye, those lines of pearl, while tones, carefully modulated to the most silvery accents, issued from the beauteous partition. Well might Almeria have looked satisfied with the tout ensemble of her own handiwork!

"Yes, Mama," said she, with unusual affability, "I have often thought, I would have done better for the mimic stage of life, than for the real, or as the daughter of one of 'true religious blue.' So much for tact, taste and policy—the three great moving principles of successful ambition and pride. I heard all that Sinclair said about my (as he thought) drawings, and I can likewise congratulate you on your ruse. How easy it is to still the small voice within—though some say, it is 'hard to hide the sparks of nature!' It is well Evora was not present—and as he appeared so good a judge of painting, I was cautious not to jeopardize an exhibition of my musical powers, for fear of his critical acumen."

Mrs. Clifton could not repress a rising sigh at her daughter's shameless deceit and sang froid—but, like daughter, like Mamma, she banished all unpleasant reflections.

"Mr. Sinclair is evidently a man of the highest polish, aristocratic birth, and doubtless rich. Do, for Heaven's sake, Almeria, play your cards well, and let the trumps be hearts, whether your own is concerned or not; only win his if possible, and thus end my wearing suspense on your account. Remember, I have removed from several cities, where you have worn out your youth and charms—all this I have done, to secure you an eligible matrimonial settlement, and now my stock—pecuniary, and of mental and physical patience, is well nigh exhausted. We will soon have to pause, and take a backward step in the scale of fashion—and pride."

Mrs. Clifton left her daughter, to ponder over and digest her sage advice.

Let us beware, of the first step in deceit—for 'tis indeed

—— "a tangled web we weave,
When first we practice to deceive."

After we once "cut our cable," leaving the anchor of truth, to launch into its most dangerous sea, few possess the power of retracing their steps, or are capable of steering clear of those fatal eddies, which never fail to whelm every principle of goodness, virtue, or honor. The heart's store of garnered affections becomes stranded and wrecked on the barren waste of woe and guilty disappointment. Did we but as sedulously guard our inward tablets from its desecrating power and influence in the eye of our Heavenly Father, as we do to wear a "goodly outside" to the misjudging world, how infinitely more ennobled would we be, in the scale of being and excellence! How much more worthy of that high destiny He has so graciously bestowed upon us here, and which, He will assuredly allot to the virtuous in a brighter one hereafter.

THE HOLY HOUR.

BY MRS. ELIZABETH J. XAMES.

"JESUS WEPT."

1.

It was a Holy Hour!
Romance and fairy song were both laid by,
And the clear radiance of the sunset sky,
Fell in a golden shower
Upon the open page of that blest Book—
From which my soul a holier lesson took.

2.

Gently, the zephyrs breath
Amid the leaves of Inspiration stir'd;
Anon, mine eye from the Eternal Word
Caught the sad scene of death—
Where the two Sisters mournful vigils kept;
Where they were weeping—and where Jesus wept!

3.

Yes, "Jesus wept!" how deep—
How full of meaning was that one brief line!
Closer it drew my heart to Pity's shrine,
And bade my memory keep
The words on which I mus'd, that they might be Ever the prompters of my sympathy.

4.

Still musing on, methought
Form, after form, rose 'mid the deep'ning gloom
That slowly gather'd o'er my quiet room—
And one with glory fraught,
Stood pale, sad, solemn,—yet serenely bright,
And heavenly, tho' bow'd by earthly sorrows' might!

5.

It was the Saviour's form ;
Beside him, with a troubled aspect, stood
Martha, whose worldly spirit now subdued,
Sunk 'neath affliction's storm ;
Wildly she lifted up her voice, and cried—
"Hadst thou been here my Brother had not died !"

6.

But at her Master's feet,
With the long tresses of her golden hair
Unbound, and O ! how radiantly fair
Sat Mary :—trusting, and sweet
Was the expression of those mournful eyes,
Whose tearful pleadings woke the Saviour's sighs !

7.

He pray'd, and groan'd, and wept.
He, whose pure being in the skies had birth,
In anguish knelt beside the bed of earth
Where that lov'd brother slept.
And with a tone of human grief and love,
Imploringly besought his Father's aid above !

8.

And then, his sorrowful eye
Lighted up with a God's benignity,
When he who had known death's dread mystery—
At that loud call, drew nigh
From the grave's portals, clad in ghastly white—
Chasing its fearful shadows from his sight !

9.

So from mine eye did fade
The thrilling scene, but the dark room did seem Lighter, and purer from my musing dream—
And my heart better made.
Yet, ere I slept, once more I sought the Book,
And to my soul another lesson took.

THE WIFE'S PRAYER FOR HER HUSBAND AT SEA.

Oh Thou ! who art of friends, the dearest,
Hear Thou my prayer
For him, who next to Thee, is nearest,
Whose love, next thine, my chiefest care.
Thy skill has wrought the deep emotion
Of human love,
Troubling the spirit oft with wild commotion,
Unlike the peacefulness above ;
Then pity Thou the boding sorrow,
Through darkness blind,
Foreseeing not so far as to the morrow,
Save presage of some ill to find !
Thou, on the far-off seas discerning,
That speck so small,
That "very little thing," not spurning,
Keep Thou the barque that holds my all !
Oh, lay thy gentlest hand, protecting,
On that dear head,
Each wind and wave in love directing,
Rocking in peace his ocean-bed.

* Isaiah, 42. 15.

And give thine angels charge concerning,
Each footstep rash,
Lest heedless, thoughtless, blindly turning,
Against some ill, his spirit dash.

In holy, god-like deeds, abounding,
And heav'nly grace,
Each tranquil hope his heart surrounding,
Show him Thy secret dwelling-place.

From all the grief my spirit measures,
Oh ! shelter him ;
From anguish that the heart-string severs,
From tears, that make youth's eye grow dim.

And oh ! my loneliness, so dreary,
My widowed heart,
In hours, when hope, itself, is weary,
Soothe thou with Heaven's unequalled art.

One boon,—one more I crave !—oh, hear me !
Bring him again,
With blessings back to love and cheer me !
Let, let not this one prayer be vain !

Father ! of every friend, the dearest,
Hear Thou my prayer,
For him, who next to Thee, is nearest,
Whose love, next Thine, my chiefest care !

THIRTY YEARS PASSED AMONG THE PLAYERS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

BY JOE COWELL, COMEDIAN.

To those who remember the Theatre in its "palmy days," this book will, doubtless, afford interest and amusement, both from the broad farce which is scattered through its pages, and from the visions it will conjure up of many who, in their day, contributed to delight them by exhibitions of histrionic talent, which we fear we must in this locality, at least, count among the things that have been.

It is foreign to our purpose, to inquire into the value of the drama as a school of morals, although we may be permitted to say "en passant," that we think it at least as efficacious to that end, as the stale jests of a clown, or the tricks of a rider and his horse. But we must own "the soft impeachment," of having ourselves derived from a well performed play, most exquisite satisfaction ; and if ever we were made the worse man for it, we are ignorant of the fact, and our conscience sleeps in quiet on that score. To those who have no relish for Theatrical amusements, or who are scrupulous as to its indulgence, the book will be probably dull and, perhaps, offensive. It is true, that it possesses graphic scenes full of humor, but its style of composition is rather indifferent, and its tone of morals not over strict. We are very sure, however, that no harm is meant, and there is a combination of freedom, nature and heartiness about the work, which is the probable result of an education commenced on ship-board and completed in the Green Room. Upon the whole, we sympathize with "Funny Joe," and hope that he may reap from his "Thirty years," enough to sustain and comfort his latter ones.

We are indebted to Messrs. J. W. Randolph and Co., for a copy of this work.

STANZAS.—SELF-RECKONING.

I.

Well may my friendships all decline,
Since, there is in this heart of mine,
So much of selfishness;
Disguise the feeling as I will,
'Tis selfishness I find it still,
Whatever be its dress.

II.

I seek not pleasure,—but, 'tis pride
That leads me from the crowd aside;
Nor can I feign the art,
To feel the friendships I have won,
Or cheat the cheerful guidance on
Of sympathetic heart.

III.

Still wayward, obstinate and stern,
What lessons duty yet must learn—
Alas! from birth I've been —Perchance, because of lonesomeness—
Suspicious still of love's caress,
And friendship's soothing mien,

IV.

Why should they seek me? What had I
To capture human sympathy,—
I, timid, poor and lone?—
Wherefore the boon but to beguile,
The soothing word, the tear, the smile?—
To lure and leave undone!

V.

In all extremes of life, extreme,
My years have pass'd me as a dream,
Of strongest light and shade;
My grief was like a passion still,
My joy convulsion—from its thrill
My own heart shrunk afraid.

VI.

Whate'er the mood 'twas still unrest,
No grief o'erthrew, no pleasure blest,
Each passion strove in vain;
But still, however strange it seem,
I cherish'd most the dark extreme,
And pleasure found in pain.

VII.

No joy, unquestioned, came to cheer
The winter of the rolling year,
And with a strange delight,
I lingered only to behold
Its glory fade, its promise cold,
Its beauty change to blight.

VIII.

And thus, but in a less degree,
Than him of Pontus,* I could be Secure from other's bane;
I lived on sorrows—found in grief
A solitary, strange relief,
And joy'd in deepest pain.

IX.

Ah! sad the fate, perversely wild,
That tutor'd thus the orphan child,
And made him,—now that years
Have left him stranded on the shore—
Hopeless of human love no more,
As hopeless of its fears!

MELAIA AND OTHER POEMS.

BY ELIZA COOKE.

New York, J. & H. G. Langley, 1844.

This is one of the most elegant volumes, in point of mechanical beauty, ever issued from the American press. The type, paper and binding, are both rich and neat. The illustrations are of unequal merit, as regards design; but, taken collectively, they indicate a great advancement in the taste of readers, and the enterprise of publishers. The introductory poem, like almost all long effusions, does but inadequate justice to the talents of the authoress. It contains many fine passages, but lacks that sustained vigor and finish, which alone can insure to such efforts a lasting reputation. It is to her minor, and occasional poems, that Miss Cooke is indebted, for the reputation she enjoys. Several of these have become familiar to every class in this country, by their frequent appearance in the newspapers of the day, and their union with the favorite melodies, at present in vogue. Miss Cooke writes for the people. She is no refined sentimentalist, no ideal dreamer. Her verse is dedicated to the homely associations of every day life. She appeals to the universal, not the peculiar sympathies of men. Household affection, and every day events, are, for the most part, her chosen themes. To the illustration of these, she brings a frank, warm-hearted, and vivacious nature. There is a directness, a simplicity, and a spirited vein in her poetry, which wins at once. She cannot justly claim an exalted rank in the English Parnassus, but she may rightfully assume a very useful one. There are many persons, whose poetic instincts are too latent, to be reached by the highest order of genius; whom metaphysics puzzle, and delicate imagery never impresses. Yet, they have generous hearts, and a degree of ideality. To such minds, the plain but feeling numbers of Miss Cooke, afford an innocent and delightful excitement. They mirror the most interesting phases of experience, and convey many affecting lessons. Nor is this all. Such intelligible poetry, is often the means of creating a yet higher taste. Through a very simple vestibule, many pass into the inner temple of song. The poor and uneducated need their minstrel, as well as the educated and tasteful. In the coarsest human clay, there exists more of the pure gold of love and truth, than careless observers can perceive. We deem, therefore, the popularity of such writers, especially where their morality is of a high order, and their labors stamped with honest enthusiasm, as an auspicious and welcome sign of the times; and we rejoice, that it has been found desirable to republish, in such handsome style, the volume before us. Having thus rendered our tribute of praise to the work and its authoress, we cannot refrain from expressing one thought, that suggested itself, upon our first cursory inspection of the volume. We could name a score of American writers of verse, not at all inferior, in their way, to Eliza Cooke, and some vastly her superiors, who can find no publisher in the country, to issue collections of their poems. To mention particular instances, would be invidious; but the fact is indisputable, that men, and women too, who have won from the highest critical authorities, and the voice of fame itself, abundant encomiums, are so little appreciated by their countrymen, that their best efforts have no local habitation, but the corner of a newspaper, or the scrap-book of a friend. We lament this preference of foreign writers, where merit is equal, both for the sake of the authors and the country, whose name they honor. It must be conceded, (notwithstanding the indignation expressed far and wide, at the vulgar injustice of a late article on American poetry, in the Foreign Quarterly Review) that there still exists among us, an absurd deference to English opinion, and a weak self distrust in ourselves on literary subjects. It is high time, we outgrew such childishness. We never shall have a national literature, until we appreciate those who are capable of promoting it. If Congress continues apathetic in regard to the mere rights of native authors, what is to be expected of publishers? If there is such a growing taste for poetry among the people, why not look at home for supplies, as well as beyond the sea? There is more beautiful, chaste and noble verse, scattered over this young republic—verse that has sprung from glowing hearts, and fine imaginations, than the mass of readers suppose. Let it be gathered in, and fairly presented to the world. It will then be seen, that we too, have our poets, worthy representatives of American life, scenery and institutions.

THE GRACES.

BY E. B. HALE.

The Graces, three in number are,
Beautiful beings with eloquent eyes!
Jewell'd with gems that the Hours wear,
In Mahomet's love-lit Paradise!
Oh! soft are the tones of an Æolian string—
And sweet are the carolling notes of Spring—
But softer and sweeter the Graces sing;
As 'round and 'round, in dulcet play,
And sprightliest mood, they while away
The weary hours of a darksome day,
And merrily trip,
And cheerily sip,
The sweets of pleasure's coronet-cup,
To keep their lively spirits up.

The Graces, three in number are,
Ken ye aught of their glorious home?
Ken ye any so Heavely fair?
Ken ye whether they go and come?
Oh! Kind of heart and gentle are they—
Musical ever—and ever at play—
In sadness never—in joy for aye—
Brides-maids oft where Hymen reigns,
Weaving and wreathing Love's golden chains,
And lingering still when Beauty wanes,
Faithful and true,
Existence thro',
Bearing the soul, when life is riven,
Up to the emerald shores of Heav'n.

The Graces, three in number are,
Bound by many a sacred tie;
Ken ye aught of the emblem they bear
Of Amethyst-blue? or ken ye why?
Heard ye never how ring upon ring,
In clustering curls the Graces fling
Their soft brown locks, to the Zephyr's wing?
Or, heard ye never how loving and true,
They ribbon'd a hoop of Amethyst-blue,
And 'round, and 'round, and skilfully thro',
The ends they knit,
And hallowed it,
That Cupid might adorn the face,
Of her who flung the hoop with grace?

Woo then, lady, the graceful three—
Woo them early—and woo them late—
For Loveliness keepeth them company,
And Beauty comes where the Graces wait!
Beauty of form—and Beauty of limb—
Beauty of soul—no time can dim—
Beauty to all—to her and to him,
Who wooing and winning that triune band,
So kindly of heart—so open of hand—
Go joyfully up to the Seraphim land,
Where Beauty and Grace,
Forever embrace,
And love-tuned spirits of blessedness full,
Worship forever the Beautiful!

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE MALTESE PEOPLE.

BY W. W. ANDREWS, U. S. CONSUL AT MALTA.

The Religious and, Popular Superstitions of the Maltese people; their Carnival and its consequences—Duels at Malta, and Remarks on Duelling.

Although we have said thus much of the carnival to show that it is an absurd and an immoral custom, still we have not done with our subject. We come now to look at this popish feast in a graver light, and to adduce some powerful reasons, why it should not be permitted by a protestant government, in an English garrison town. Wherever there exists a difference of religious belief between the rulers and those who are ruled, there will always be found a smothered flame, ready to burst forth whenever it may find a vent. Such is the case at Malta, and the ruling powers would, therefore, be justified in abolishing a custom, which, if longer sanctioned, may, sometime or other, cause their ruin. Should the Maltese ever become more disaffected to British sway, what better opportunity could they wish to create a revolution, than that which the yearly recurrence of this festa would give them? Do not the Islanders well know, that during carnival, the English officers are engaged in pelting comfits at ladies, while their soldiers are lounging in the streets, or drinking in the wine shops of Florian! And should they seize this time to revolt, what have they to fear, certainly not the few sergeants guards who would be at their posts to oppose them? Give the Maltese but a just cause and a festival day, with another Caruana* to lead them, and they can be free, though their freedom should last but a month. We need not tell them this fact, for their clever leaders know it full well, and have often hinted as much, when asking concessions from the government, which have not been readily granted. Let the English remember St. Bartholomew's day in France, in 1572, when the brave Coligny, with one hundred thousand protestants, was slain in cold blood, and by the express command of the king. Let them remember also, that when information of this massacre was received at Rome, that "religious ceremonies were appointed to thank God for the success of the plot; that solemn masses were celebrated, a jubilee published, cannons fired, * Caruana is the name of the present Maltese bishop. Nearly five-and-forty years ago, this reverend person left the altar of his village church, and took command of his countrymen, who were then in arms, and trying to drive the French from their Island. Distinguished by popular manners and great courage, he soon acquired such an influence over his companions, that his wishes were always complied with, while at the same time, his will was a law. It was almost altogether owing to his persuasion and coercion that the Maltese became the subjects of England. The Islanders now say, that he has been too well paid for his services. That the laborer, in this instance, was not worthy of his hire.

bon-fires lighted in the streets, and grand processions formed, in which the pope, the cardinals, ambassadors, priests and soldiers assisted." With these occurrences floating in their memories, we tell these Saxons to beware, lest, at some future time, the follies of a carnival may not unexpectedly cause the scene of a horrible tragedy. The Sicilian vespers are not yet forgotten, and the bells of Malta may toll for a similar deed. We shall, doubtless, be told that this is an idle fear. So the Huguenots thought in France, and the French in Sicily, and dearly did they pay for their temerity.

Independently of the strife, bickerings and quarrels which the carnival at this Island usually occasions, it sometimes causes the shedding of blood, and once, to our own knowledge, has carried a thoughtless victim to his early tomb. Late on the afternoon of the 8th of February, 1842, four young officers of the 88th regiment were in Strada Reale, which is the great thoroughfare on a carnival day, and pelting the ladies whom they saw at the windows, or met in the streets, as they were walking along. Custom does not require that there should be any acquaintance between the parties, as the throwing of a handful of comfits in a lady's face, is thought to be a compliment, and the harder they are thrown, the more friendly the act. Among the many persons who were thus honored by these young men, was one fair girl, the daughter of an officer, who had been in her Majesty's army and risen to the rank of a captain. Bordering on the public square, and directly in front of the palace is a reading-room into which Capt. Levick thoughtlessly went, leaving his daughter in a crowd without any protection, unless her mother or a younger sister could give it. This a parent could hardly expect. It certainly has been a matter of surprise, that a gentleman, who had lived so many years in Malta, and was so well acquainted with the follies and liberties of a carnival, should have thus imprudently left his wife and children in a situation, where even his presence would hardly protect them. This unwary step obliged Capt. Levick, on the following morning, not only to put his own life in jeopardy, but while doing it, to take the life of another.* Had he been more prudent, his hands would not now be "indelibly stained with the blood of his fellow man, and his heart (we would fain hope) wrung with the tortures of remorse." During the time that these young ladies were thus unprotected, they were met by the officers of the 88th, who, wholly regardless of their lone situation, kept following and pelting them with sugar plums, until their father returned. Whatever may be the license allowed among the Maltese during carnival, still few Englishmen, who had been educated in the Army, would permit their brother officers, in their intercourse with their families, to be governed by any such rule of action. Hence it was, that Capt. Levick immediately left the square to take his daughters home, it being his intention to return and call those who had annoyed them to an account for their conduct. This determination, however, he was for the moment prevented from carrying into effect, as the more he tried to get his daughter out of the way of her pursuers, the more she was pursued. Lt. Adams unfortunately so far forgot himself as to again insult Miss Levick by putting his hand on her bosom and leaving among her clothes a handful of comfits. No father can be expected to observe such conduct without wishing to resent it. But whether this is to be done at the moment, as was the case in this instance, has been a matter of doubt. Many have said that the provocation which Capt. Levick received was too great to be borne by a parent, and that by striking his opponent he only showed himself ready to resent the insult, as publicly as it was offered. Others say, that under no circumstances should he have given a blow, as Lt. Adams could be easily found, and that satisfaction, which a gentleman would ask, always be granted. We are well persuaded, that a practised duellist would have simply asked for the name of the person who had insulted his child; and left it to his good fortune and pistol hand to have brought him his revenge. And Capt. Levick, sanctioning as he does this barbarous practice of duelling, should have controlled his passion and pursued this course. According to the code of honor, by striking his opponent, he disgraced himself. Lt. Adams, on receiving a slap in the face, returned the blow with a stick. A scuffle immediately ensued, but the mother of the young lady getting between the combatants, the fight was not long continued. No gentleman, bearing a commission in the English Army, is allowed to settle a dispute by a pugilistic meeting. To receive a blow is to send a challenge. This custom has been established by the constitution of Charlemagne, which says, that "a slap in the face became an injury that could only be obliterated with blood, for the man whose face had been slapped, had been treated like a low-born person."

* Capt. Levick as a duellist felt himself under this obligation.

Was this absurd and unchristian law to be as strictly observed by the ladies of England as it is by their husbands, we fear that Victoria herself, might ere this have been in the field to be shot at by her spirited dames, who might, at different times, have received some such singular mark of her Majesty's particular notice. But fortunately in this, wisdom guides the weaker sex. Ladies, much to their praise, closely following that scriptural command, which says, if you are struck on one cheek, turn the other also. Were duellists to take counsel of their wives, we should not so often hear of these brutal murders which, even with the apologists of duelling, a barbarous custom alone can justify. For many years, it has been the fashion among the higher classes in Italy and England, France and Germany, always to resent a blow, whether given by an open or closed hand, a glove, a cowskin, a whip, or a cane, by challenging the person who gave it. There appears to be a peculiar stigma attached to a blow, which the gentlemen of all countries are unable, or unwilling to bear. But why should there be this singular sensitiveness? Does not a person, however high his rank, by striking another, become a facchino? And being so, is his opponent bound to descend to such a level to meet him? we think not, however much duellists may differ from us in our opinion. In Roman law, it is expressly stated, that no infamy was attached to the person who received a blow. "Ictus fustium infamiam non importat." "Sophocles, being advised to prosecute a man who had struck him, calmly replied, if a donkey kicked me, would you recommend me to go to law?" If this truly noble answer is not sufficient to satisfy the wounded pride of any man of the present age, we will cite a few other remarkable instances, to show that Sophocles was not alone, in ancient times, in thus passing over a blow, without noticing the man who gave it. "When Eurybiades raised his stick against Themistocles, the youthful hero merely replied, strike, but listen to me." Lycurgus also, we are told by Millingen, "did not deem it necessary to avenge the blow he received from Alexander, though it deprived him of an eye." Few men will be found willing at this day to carry their spirit of forgiveness as far as Lycurgus has done. Neither is it expected that a man who had thus grievously injured another should be permitted to go unpunished. But he should not be murdered, for such is the case in a duel in the eye of the law, when one of the parties is slain. Dr. Millingen, in his history of duelling, gives us an account of what he terms a "most vindictive duel," and which had its origin in a blow. We can only call it a deliberate, wilful, and malicious murder. For the committing of which, the survivor should as surely have gone to the gallows, as the authorities could have found wood enough in France, from which to erect one for his reception. A colonel in the guards, we are told, "was boasting of his good fortune in never having been obliged to fight a duel. Another officer present expressed his surprise, with some indirect allusions to his want of courage; observing "How could you avoid fighting when insulted?" The colonel replied, that he had never given offence, and that no one had ever presumed to insult him. Moreover, that on such an occasion, he would consider the character of the person who had wantonly insulted him ere he demanded satisfaction. Upon this statement, his interlocutor, in the most insolent manner, struck him in the face with a glove, adding, "Perhaps, sir, you will not consider this an insult!" The colonel calmly pet on his hat and walked out of the room. The following morning, however, he sent a challenge to his aggressor. When they came to the ground, the colonel wore a patch of court-plaister of the size of a crown piece on the cheek which had received the blow. At the very first lounge he wounded his antagonist in the sword arm; when, taking off the plaister, he cut off an edge of it with a pair of scissors, and, replacing it on his face, took his leave of his adversary, very politely requesting he would do him the honor of letting him know when he recovered from his wound. So soon as he heard that he was able to hold a sword he called him out, and wounded him a second time; cutting off another portion of the patch. In a like manner he called him out, fought, and wounded him, until the plaister was reduced to the size of a shilling; when he again challenged him, and ran him through the body; then calmly contemplating the corpse he observed, "I now may take off my plaister." This, says the author, "was a cruel, but a well-merited chastisement inflicted on an insolent braggart, who little knew at the time he thus wantonly insulted this officer, he was addressing one of the most dexterous swordsmen in France." Then, say we, that it was the more disgraceful in the colonel, so to butcher his victim before he murdered him. How the learned doctor could have called this a "most vindictive duel," in one place, and only "a well-merited chastisement" in another, we are at a loss to know. It could not be both. "A well-merited chastisement" might be given with a whip, and no one would have pitied the aggressor in this duel had he received it, but it cannot be applied to a mortal wound when given by the point of a sword through a man's body. A stronger term must be used to express such a diabolical and murderous act.

In the French duelling code, which has been sanctioned by many of the nobles, ministers, marshals, generals and admirals of France, every advantage is given to a person who has received a blow. This has evidently been done to make men careful how they strike one another, when the insult may cost them their lives. We take a few extracts from this celebrated code, which Christian officers of the highest rank in their country have thus seen fit to sanction. The sixth article is as follows: "There are offences of such a galling nature, that they may lead the insulted party to have recourse to acts of violence. Such acts ought invariably to be avoided, as they can only tend to a mortal combat." Quoting only those portions which bear on our subject, we next come to number nine. "When the offence has been attended by acts of violence, the offended party (we are told) has the right to name his duel, his arms, and the distance." Number twenty-three. "The seconds of the aggressor, may, if they think proper, refuse to fire by signal, if the aggressor had not struck his antagonist." Number twenty-seven. "The seconds are never to let their principals know that they are of opinion that the nature of the insult received is such as to render a mortal combat necessary." "There is," says an able writer, "much judicious consideration in thus allowing great advantage to a person who has received a blow, as it may tend to render hasty subjects more cautious, not only from the just apprehension of their affording considerable advantage to their opponent, but of rushing into a quarrel of a desperate character." With those who uphold the practice of duelling, this is a plausible argument, and doubtless has its weight in their councils. But to those who do not justify it under any circumstances, and look upon it in all cases as a felony, this reasoning would be wholly lost. Such persons would naturally say, first persuade us, that whenever a man is slain in a duel, the survivors are not murderers both by divine and human law, and then we will listen to all which may be said in its favor. Until this is done, your arguments would be like offering us a portion of the materials for an edifice, without, in all probability, our ever possessing a foundation on which to erect it. Before we want the pillars we must first be sure of a floor. And before we can legislate for duellists, we must first be convinced that by so doing, we should not sanction a practice, which is as unholy in the sight of God, as it is unjustifiable among men.

Hardly can we expect that persons who, to sanction duelling, must break every Christian and moral law, should be willing, when on the ground, to obey that which they themselves have drawn up. It is expressly stated in the French code, that when the injured party strikes the one who injures him, it remains for the person who is struck to send the challenge, although he may have given his opponent a good flogging in return for his blow. This appears to be a curious law, for by it we observe, that the same man who is insulted first, may be beaten, challenged, and killed. But curious as it is, it should be obeyed by duellists, and Capt. Levick was therefore wrong in sending a message to Lt. Adams, demanding satisfaction, when, by the laws which should have governed him, he had nothing of which to complain. Not so, however, with his opponent, for he was still serving in the army and must not bear a blow. Lt. Adams, on returning to his barracks, consulted with the senior captain of the corps, who appeared to be either a very stupid, or malicious person, and known by the name of Jeffries. Far better would it have been for this young man to have gone out of his regiment to have found a friend; for, by trusting to this Jeffries, he lost his life, or rather he was murdered. In saying thus much, we are not writing too strongly; for such is the opinion of all who have become acquainted with the circumstances which attended this unfortunate meeting. On the morning of the ninth of February, a challenge was sent from Levick to Adams by the hands of Lt. Mattei, of the Royal Malta Fencibles, and another at the same moment from Adams to Levick, by Capt. Jeffries; the gentlemen bearing these messages, passing each other on the road, as they went on their mission. At twelve o'clock of the same day, the respective parties met in a secluded spot, behind a fort, and near to a Catholic burying-ground. After the seconds had consulted some time, a line of twelve paces was marked out, and the combatants took their stations at each extremity of this truly murderous distance. It has been proved that Levick, on taking his ground, told Adams "to remember, that should any sinister consequence follow this affair, the father of eleven children, would be brought to an untimely end." If such was his opinion, why was he there to fight, and also as a challenger? He should have thought of his family before, and remained at home. We know not with what intent this remark was made, but of its effect on the mind of a young officer, who was out to fight a duel for the first time, we may easily judge. How can a man fire at another when told by him that he is the "father of eleven children," and when he knows also, that it is on this parent they solely look for support? It is impossible, and on the moment when this remark was made, Capt. Jeffries should have withdrawn his friend, and said the "affair" was finished. But this stupid officer did not do it, and simply remarking, that he hoped "no sinister consequence would follow," went on to give his signal for a shot. The principals in a duel are never allowed to speak to each other on their first meeting, unless it is when touching their hats, to merely say good morning. Capt. Levick's observation was therefore as unmanly, as his conduct was unjustifiable, after he had made it, in firing at his opponent. Lt. Adams' pistol having missed fire, the seconds held another consultation, and decided on another shot. This wicked course was pursued at the instance of Jeffries, who said that the wounded honor of his friend could never be healed, so long as his pistol was not discharged. But how did the gallant captain of the 88th come to this decision? Certainly not from the duelling code, for in that it is expressly stated that a "miss fire, is to be considered a shot." Surely Lt. Adams was destined to fall, for fate was against him, and his adviser a fool. When Capt. Levick knew that he was to fire again, he told his second to put "a full charge in his pistol"—an expression which he can never forget. These words will ring in his ears, so long as life remains in his body. To put the "full charge in," for what purpose, unless it was that he might be the more sure to kill his man? Was not a wound sufficient? Must he send a ball through his opponent, merely to gratify a fiendish disposition. Too strongly does this remark remind us of a savage Corsican who, after running his knife in a man's body up to the handle, turned it round in the wound, saying to his victim as he did it, "Ah, it holds, does it! This is my revenge!" But where was Jeffries that he did not stop the affair, when this fatal order was given? Was he bent on the death of his friend? Surely it would seem so, for otherwise, how easily might he have prevented the sad tragedy which was so shortly to happen. Blundering throughout, he missed the opportunity, and Adams was slain. We are told by John Burton, St. Croix Crosse, the present assistant surgeon of the 88th, who turned Queens' evidence to save his commission in the army, that Levick, after making this observation, commenced speaking in Maltese, a language which no one who was on the ground understood, save the person whom he was addressing. This speaking in an unknown tongue was unfair, and should not have been permitted by Jeffries, had he known his duty. Lt. Mattei appears, unfortunately, to have obeyed the injunction which was given to him by his principal, for when the word was given to fire, the ball from the pistol which he had loaded was sent with so much force, as not only to pass through the arm of Adams, but afterwards into his body, where it remained until after his death. On the tenth of February, at 8 o'clock in the evening, this unfortunate young man expired, "in the bloom of his age," and "only bequeathing" (as Dr. Bruno has pathetically said) "to his friends a painful memory, and to his family utter desolation." An able English writer, after commenting at length on this duel, thus remarks: "Here are your 'men of honor,' your 'gallant gentlemen,' who are the latest upholders of the 'code of honor,' your modern knights, sans peur, et sans reproche! striving it would seem to sneak from the halter, by the help of a mean Old Bailey lie,* and turning Queens' evidence! Turpin, was a Bayard to them." This language is much too severe, for none of the party were ever in fear of the hangman, and therefore could not be guilty of telling a falsehood, to save their necks from the rope, which is the badge of his office. Levick and Mattei denied that a duel had been fought in the same way as any prisoners would have plead not guilty to an indictment, at a criminal bar. Leaving it for the crown advocate to find his testimony, and prove the fact if he could. By the English law, no persons are obliged to criminate themselves and, though it would have been far more honorable in these gentlemen not to have answered any questions which were put to them by the magistrates, still we cannot call their denial of having been engaged in a duel, an "Old Bailey lie." The conduct of Jeffries throughout the whole of this sad tragedy, cannot be too strongly condemned. Three different times could he have arranged this affair, and done it in an honorable manner, but he failed in doing it, and hence the fatal result. The blood of young Adams is on his hands, and wash them as he may, still they will always be stained. By the decease of this officer, our thoughts again return to Mr. S., of whom, and his "evil eye," we have now but a word to say. Certainly it is a singular circumstance, that his prediction to the Judge about a capital trial should so soon have been verified, and still more remarkable is it, that one of the party, who appeared at the bar to be tried for his life, was the same Maltese officer who was present at the whist table, and took part in the conversation, when this unfortunate prediction was made. Several of these curious coincidences have tended to make many of the Islanders believe that Mr. S. is afflicted with an "evil eye," and that all who come in sight of him must be more or less affected. Ridiculous as is this belief, no reasoning will ever change it. It is a popular superstition, and so it will remain. Jeffries, hearing that his friend was mortally wounded, got his passport legalised by the Neapolitan consul and fled to Syracuse. Sorry are we to add, that since his return to England, he has been so fortunate as to get his majority in the same corps, which, by his inexcusable conduct in this affair, he has so much disgraced. When the trial came on, the members of the jury were so much disgusted at the escape of Jeffries, which they supposed had been effected by the assistance of Sir Hector Greig, the chief secretary to government, and also at the baseness of John Burton St. Croix Crosse in turning Queens evidence, that they at once acquitted Levick and Mattei, thereby sanctioning their assertion in the first instance, that no duel had ever been fought; or, in other words, that Adams was still alive, though all the officers in his regiment had seen his corpse, and attended his funeral. Such was the result of this trial at Malta. The jury would not believe Crosse's evidence, and therefore acquitted the prisoners. But how are the ends of justice to be attained, and duelling to be prevented, if men in such important cases will be governed by their private feelings, and look not to maintain the law? Lt. Adams' death was caused by a silly custom of the carnival time, and the sooner this foolish festa is abolished at Malta, the better it will be for all its inhabitants. Matthews, in his "Diary of an Invalid," winds up his description of the carnival at Rome, which he gives in sixteen lines, by saying that it is an exhibition "only fit for a nursery. Nothing," says he, "can be imagined more childish, and there is very little mixture of wit, or humor to make the childishness amusing." If such is a true statement of this exhibition in the Roman capital, and we have no reason to doubt it, how much more ridiculous must it be in this Island, where the population is so poor, and the people so ignorant! Let this festa be abolished and in five years it will be wholly forgotten. The experiment at least should be tried, or there may be other victims to its follies, other Adams' to be slain. Now, that we are on the subject of duelling, we have still something more to say.

* Messrs. Levick and Mattei, unfortunately said at first, that a duel had not been fought—they, erroneously supposing that the prosecuting officer would be unable to procure evidence wherewithal to convict them.

In the late trial of the Earl of Cardigan, before the House of Lords for shooting Capt. Tuckett in a duel on Wimbledon Common, a remark was made by the Attorney General, which no honorable duelist can justify, or Christian excuse. This officer stated, on opening the case for the prosecution, that he was "rejoiced to think, that on the present occasion the charge against the noble prisoner at the bar did not imply any degree of moral turpitude, and that if he should be found guilty, his conviction would reflect no discredit on the illustrious order to which he belongs." The bishops were so much shocked at this unprincipled remark, that they rose in their places and left the house, not returning to their seats again so long as the trial continued. Wisely did they act in pursuing this course, as it was a severe reproof to the speaker, and one which, for his unjustifiable assertion, he most richly deserved. On Lord Cardigan's appearance at the bar, he was informed by the Lord High Steward, that he was there "charged with the offence of firing with a loaded pistol at Harvey Garnett Phipps Tuckett, with intent to murder him; in a second count, with firing with intent to maim and disable him; and in a third count, with firing with intent to do him some grievous bodily harm." Of the truth of these charges there was not a doubt, and yet the Attorney General, who was present to bring the guilt of the prisoner home upon him, so far neglected his duty, as to say to the right reverend prelates of England, and its assembled peers, that he was rejoiced to find the conduct of the noble lord had been wholly free from moral turpitude, and that even if they did find him guilty of firing at Capt. Tuckett with an intention of murdering, maiming, disabling, or doing him any grievous bodily harm, "his conviction would reflect no discredit on the illustrious order to which they all belonged." When such language as this is used by one of the highest living law-authorities in Great Britain, before the highest tribunal, and by a person also, who was charged by his sovereign to convict the prisoner at the bar of felony, if he could do it justly, there can be but a faint hope that duelling will be abolished, or that the laws which have been enacted to prevent it, will be carried into execution. If such a declaration is true of a peer, in the House of Lords, it is also of a cobbler in any criminal court. How then will a jury be able to convict a prisoner, even though the members of it should be satisfied of his guilt and feel disposed to send him to a prison, a gallows, or on a voyage of transportation to Botany Bay? Well would it have been, had the Attorney General given us to understand what he meant by his term of "moral turpitude." He accused Lord Cardigan of taking "a deliberate aim" at his opponent, and of grievously wounding him with a pistol having a rifle barrel, while Capt. Tuckett was using one which was plain. These accusations he proved, and still it would seem they were not sufficient in his opinion to imply any degree of "moral turpitude" in his lordship's conduct, but, on the contrary, so far from it, that we find him saying to the peers, that if they declared him guilty, "his conviction would reflect no discredit on the illustrious order to which they all belonged." How different would have been the language of a Story, a Marshall, or a Legaré in America. Was a person in our country to try to take the life of his antagonist by following the same course which the noble lord is proved to have done, he would be justly called a base and unprincipled scoundrel. What is it but a daring attempt to commit murder, when a man fires at another who is only twelve yards distant from him after taking a deliberate aim? And what is it but taking an unlawful advantage when the same man uses his own pistols which have rifle barrels, while his opponent fires off hand, and with pistols having a common bore? Had Lord Cardigan killed Capt. Tuckett under such circumstances, it would have been a most wilful and malicious murder. The Attorney General perhaps would have called it a justifiable homicide, or manslaughter, or an accidental and fatal rencontre. But where is the republican judge who would not have said that it was a foul murder of the first degree? And where would a jury be found in America, that would not decree the same? Englishmen have so often called our duellists savages, and our courts corrupt, that we may be excused for continuing our remarks, promising faithfully to draw them from an authentic report of Lord Cardigan's trial, which we procured by accident, and have at this moment lying open before us. When his lordship was asked, on the opening of the case, whether he was guilty or not of the charges brought against him, and how he would be tried, he answered, "by his peers," without noticing the first query, although it was given in the same breath, and in the same sentence with that to which he had deigned to reply. Why, may we ask, was not the noble prisoner obliged to give a categorical answer to the question which was put to him, as any other criminal would have been compelled to do in any other court? Why was this deference paid to rank? Justice could not claim it for him, and certainly his conduct had not been such as to deserve it. Had Lord Cardigan been pressed for a direct reply, he must have acknowledged his guilt. The proceeding would then have been stayed, and the noble prisoner, claiming his privilege of a peer, would at once have been set at liberty. Not, however, having answered this question, witnesses were called, and this farce of a trial went on. Never do we remember to have read the report of a case where the proof of a persons guilt was more clear, more direct, or more unimpeachable than it was in this against the Earl of Cardigan. Of the truth of this statement, we shall let others judge, by giving the evidence of the principal witnesses who were called by the Attorney General to sustain his cause. A person by the name of Dunn, who was both a miller and a constable, testified that he was near the spot where the duel was fought and took the parties into custody. His lordship at the time still having the pistol in his hand with which, on the second shot, he had wounded his opponent only the moment before. Strong as was this testimony against Lord Cardigan, still it was not all which the Attorney General could bring to bear against him. We have said, that of the noble prisoners guilt, there is not a doubt. And so well persuaded are we of this fact, that we ask in all confidence where is the man who, after having read the evidence of Mr. Busain, which we now give, will differ from us in our opinion? We quote word for word. "When (says this inspector of police) Lord Cardigan came up to the station-house at Wandsworth, on the evening of the twelfth of September, I bowed and asked his business. He said he was a prisoner he believed. Indeed, sir, said I, on what account? His lordship said I have been fighting a duel and I have hit my man, but not seriously I believe; slightly, merely a graze across the back. He then pointed over his shoulder, looked over and said, this gentleman also is a prisoner; my second, Capt. Douglas. He presented me his card, and I saw the Earl of Cardigan of the 11th Dragoons." After reading this testimony, we cannot but express our surprise, that his lordship, being so "honorable a person," should not have stated to Mr. Busain, that he had hit his man after taking "a deliberate aim," and with a rifle barreled pistol. He certainly should not have left these important facts to have been first told by the witnesses in an open court. Was the noble peer ashamed of his conduct, that he was silent on these important points? Or was it, that they had escaped from his memory? But what, it may be asked, had been the sum and substance of Capt. Tuckett's offending which caused Lord Cardigan to feel towards him such a deadly hatred, and prompted his taking such a foul and dastardly advantage to deprive him of his existence? It was nothing more nor less than publishing a letter in the London Morning Chronicle, containing, as his lordship said, "matter that was entirely false," and which must be contradicted. Capt. Tuckett, not coinciding in the Earl's opinion, they mutually appealed to the mouths of their pistols, to settle that difference which their own could not. The absurdity of this course can be easily shown. Had Lord Cardigan killed his opponent, and he came very near it, we should have been most effectually prevented from ever having known who of the two was in fault. Had he himself fallen, it would have been no satisfaction for the insult which he had gone on the ground to avenge. Therefore, let the result have been as it might, the noble peer must of a certainty have been the loser. Hence the folly of his sending a challenge, even if we look not to its wickedness. On the testimony of the miller and police inspector, the Attorney General rested his case with the utmost confidence. So much so, that before closing his argument for the prosecution, he said to the peers, that he knew not how his "honorable and learned friend (referring to Sir William Follett, who was the prisoner's counsel) would be able with all his learning, ability and zeal, to persuade their lordships to acquit his noble client, on any one count of this indictment." Throughout the whole of this trial, the Attorney General appears to have pursued a singularly wavering course, which can only be accounted for from the fact of his having been a personal friend of Lord Cardigan's, and though he knew he was guilty, yet wished for his acquittal. How otherwise shall we be able to answer for the curious contradiction, which we can trace in his remarks? At one time we find him accusing the noble Earl of trying to commit murder, bringing his proof, and saying the accusation was proved. At another, declaring that he at once acquitted the noble lord of having done any thing which was unfair while fighting the duel, and that if found guilty of the crime imputed to him, "his conviction would reflect no discredit on the illustrious order to which he had the honor to belong." If this last remark is true, Lord Cardigan had committed no offence. Why, therefore, was he placed as a criminal at the bar of the House of Lords. And to be tried on an indictment, which, had it been proved against a commoner in a lower court, would have sent him to "Newgate," or New South Wales? With such an admission on the part of the prosecuting officer, it is somewhat surprising that his lordship did not sue for damages, laying them at a heavy amount; not for the injury done to his character, as we are told he had done nothing to disgrace himself, but for the payment of his counsel's fees, the annoyances he had undergone, and his loss of time. Perhaps, to make the farce the more complete, he should have procured the services of the Attorney General, to have enabled him to win his cause, which fortunately most men still think, could only have been done by breaking every law. Rejoiced, as would have been the Attorney General at the noble Earl's acquittal, still he would rather have had him a hundred times condemned, than that by his acquittal, the least reflection should have been cast on his professional skill. This feeling he has strongly evinced. For it was not until he had been told by Sir William Follett, that he had failed in making out his case, inasmuch as he had not proved the christian names of Capt. Tuckett, which by law he was bound to do, that we find him forgetting his friendship for Lord Cardigan, and trying, with all his powers, to compass his condemnation. What, said the Attorney General in a burst of indignation, "am I obliged to call the clerk of the parish where he was baptized, in order to prove his baptismal register? Am I to call his father, or his mother, or his godfathers, or godmothers, to prove the name that was given him at the baptismal font?" The noble peers whom he was addressing, thought he was lying under this obligation, and therefore stayed the prosecution. Thus a mere quibble of the law, which would not have saved a boy a flogging in a common school, was sufficient to acquit Lord Cardigan of a heinous crime, before the highest tribunal in Great Britain. Each one of the peers was obliged to give his decision separately and John Lord Keane, being the junior baron, was the first who was called upon to answer. This nobleman, rising uncovered in his place and laying his right hand on his breast, answered, "Not guilty, upon my honor:" the only exception being the Duke of Cleveland, who said, "Not guilty legally, upon my honor." This decision may have been according to law, though not according to justice, and we think the Attorney General was perfectly justified in saying as he did to their lordships, that "they should not stop the prosecution upon any objection like that" which Sir William Follett had started. It was a trifling, shuffling way of getting rid of the case, and one which no distinguished lawyer should have seized upon, or the noblemen of England have sanctioned. Now that we have nearly finished with our sketch of this case, which has been fairly and faithfully drawn, we must say, that it was throughout, as a trial, from its commencement to its termination, a mere mockery of justice, a truly perfect farce. Long may it be, before the English will find a parallel case in our supreme court, or a similar decision from our judges. Until this does occur, we have but little to fear from their taunts. They may continue to talk of the "little learning" of our law givers, and of the "little justice" to be found at our tribunals, but until less can be found to censure in their own courts, they will talk and write in vain. In a debate which took place in the House of Lords, on a motion to print Lord Cardigan's trial, the Earl of Mountcashell thus remarked: "He said that something ought to be done on the subject of duelling; otherwise their Lordships would expose themselves, after the result of the recent trial, to the malignant aspersion that they identified themselves with the system. He wished to know from her Majesty's Government whether the act of the first of Victoria was framed with intent to put an end to duelling? If so, the trial which had occurred could only be considered as a mockery of justice." More than two years and a half have passed away since this language was uttered in the House of Lords. During this time, duel after duel has been fought, and murder after murder committed, and still nothing has been done to prevent their occurrence in future. Was a noble lord to fight a duel to-morrow and kill his man, he could not be brought to punishment. For he would either escape as Lord Cardigan has done by a quibble of the law, or if found guilty, claim his privilege of a peer, and thus be set at liberty. How can we hope that the practice of duelling will be abolished in England, so long as their lordships are placed above the law? Lord Wharncliffe has stated his intention of bringing "in a bill to settle the point with reference to the right of a peer to plead privilege in case of a felony; as (he said) he happened to know that, in the case of the recent trial, if a conviction had taken place, that point would have been raised." This notice was given in February, 1841, and yet from that time to the present, nothing more has been said on the subject. That the noble lords should not wish to curtail those privileges which have come down to them from their ancestors for many generations, is natural enough, and that they will not do it, until compelled by the force of public opinion, is equally probable. Let, therefore, the English journalists take up this subject; for, without their united assistance, nothing will ever be done. The editor of the "London Times," has set them a noble example, and well would it have been, had his compeers of the press followed the same manly, fearless and independent course. We quote his remarks—they are eloquent, just and true. "No more disgraceful, or demoralising spectacle (says this writer) can possibly be exhibited before the eyes of a people than the accommodation of the laws, or the submission of their arbitrators to the popular crimes of the higher classes. Let the Attorney General say what he will, a crime is not divested of its inherent moral turpitude by the frequency or the impunity with which it is committed; nor does felony cease to be a crime, when the felon is countenanced, or even stimulated to the act by the class opinion of the circle which forms his world. Every class has in it an aggressive self-contriving principle which aspires to ride rough shod over society and chafes under the restraint of law. It is the very object of law to bind together all these discordant interests by restraining the eccentricities of each, and compelling each to submit its own opinion to the central intelligence, which consults for the common good. What the effect upon society in general must be, of letting it be understood, that there is a crime which must not or cannot be restrained or punished because peers and gentlemen think proper to commit it, while the law declares it to be a felony, we leave those to judge who know the power of example, and the aptness of the lower orders to learn evil from their betters. We are firmly convinced that no more pernicious or anarchial principle than that of the defenders of duelling was ever broached by chartism, or even socialism itself. 'Strict legal formality' says a contemporary, 'brought Lord Cardigan to the bar of the house of peers under an accusation of felony; and strict legal formality has given him an unanimous, and, in our opinion, honorable acquittal.' All felons, we have no doubt, think the laws under which they are brought to justice are 'strict, legal formalities;' and we doubt not that they will cheerfully accept the doctrine which renders the law, "Thou shalt do no murder," to be as mere a 'formality,' as that which requires every one of three christian names to be proved, in order to sustain an indictment. Lord Cardigan's acquittal is honorable no doubt in the eyes of those who would have thought it equally honorable to be convicted, and of those alone. Something we trust will be done to remedy the evil consequences of the late trial, ere it be yet too late." This is a vain hope, for as we have before remarked, nothing will ever be done until the people of Great Britain take the subject of duelling in their own hands and see that their laws are obeyed equally by the peasant and the peer. How different was the language of Bacon who was the Attorney General in the time of James I., from that of him who conducted the prosecution in Lord Cardigan's case only three years ago, in the reign of Queen Victoria. The former said in a letter to Lord Villiers, that when persons were brought before him who had fought a duel, he would know no difference between the peer who wore a coronet, and the servant with his hat band. That all should be punished alike. But what said the latter? He congratulated the assembled peers of England, that there had been nothing of moral turpitude in Lord Cardigan's conduct, and that if found guilty of having attempted to kill his adversary, his conviction would reflect no discredit on the illustrious order to which he had the honor to belong. While the Attorney General entertained such an opinion about duelling, he would well become a fit successor to Sir John Jeffcott who, after having killed his man at Exeter, in 1833, immediately embarked on an English frigate, and went to Sierra Leone as the principal judge. Too good an exile for one who had committed so black a deed.

In our next letter we shall speak of the duels which were fought at Malta during the reign of the Knights, and also of those which have occurred since the flag of Old England, has taken the place of the standard of St. John.

LINES

SUGGESTED BY THE DEATH OF SISTER CLAUDIA.

Who departed this life at the Female Orphan Asylum in Washington City, on Sunday evening, the fifth of November, 1843, in the twenty-fourth year of her age.

In te, Domine, speravi; non confundar in aeternum.

So young and fair to die!
On each beloved face,
Familiar scene of earth and sky,
With languid gaze
To look, and feel it is the last,
While life's faint tide is ebbing fast;

Ah! melancholy doom!
So tender and so bright,
To shrink into the darksome tomb,
From life and light!
Fearful, thus trembling and alone,
To plunge into the dread unknown!

Yet, maiden, didst thou meet
That moment dark and drear,
With soul serene, with aspect sweet,
And spirit clear,
As tho' it were a parting brief,
That did not ask a tear from grief.

No feverish flush of joy,
From frenzy's dizzy bowl;
No raptures fitful, fierce, to buoy
The sinking soul,
Were thine; with humble faith yet bright,
Thine eye caught glimpses of the light;

The light which oft doth dawn
On death's prophetic glance,
By angel hands the veil withdrawn,
In holiest trance;
While tones of heavenly music swell
From seats where happy spirits dwell.

Approach, yet softly tread;
How silent and how deep,
The solemn slumber of the dead,
The sacred sleep!
Nay, start not, for Elysian grace
Still woos us in that quiet face.

She sleeps, as they who rest
From weariness and woes;
Her palms are folded on her breast,
In meek repose;
From toil and care 'tis some release,
To look upon such perfect peace.

Call we this death, so fair,
So gentle, so serene?
And doth the King of Terrors wear
So mild a mien?
No pain, no sorrow and no strife?
'Tis something better, sure, than life!

Come, bear her gently hence,
Upon the mother breast
Of earth, with love and reverence
Lay her to rest;
Yet stay; a word I fain would breathe
Within the "dull, cold ear of death."

Then, tell me, silent one,
The world, why didst thou fly?
Had it no charms for thee alone,
Beneath the sky?
No joys for one too young and fair,
To sink beneath the load of care?

A father's fond embrace,
A mother's pleading tear,
Didst thou resist with steadfast face,
Yet not austere?
A sister's anguish, brother's sigh,
With sinking heart, yet purpose high?

Did ne'er the gentle flame
In that soft bosom glow,
Mantling with pure and graceful shame
The virgin brow?
Hast thou not glittered in the dance,
And revelled in life's young romance?

Or, timely, didst thou learn
The vanity of all
We prize, and disenchanted turn
From joys that pall;
Of pleasure's giddy draught but sip,
Nor drain its dregs with languid lip?

Perchance, by grace divine
Touched, when the world was bright,
Upon thy dear Redeemer's shrine,
With heart contrite,
Youth, beauty, charms that quickly fade,
A willing sacrifice were laid.

Peace to conjecture dim,
And surmise profitless;
Motives are seen alone by Him,
Who oft doth bless
The weakness of the human heart
With strength to choose the better part;

That better part which thou
Hast chosen, virgin wise,
Beside whose sacred relics, now,
Rain tears from eyes
Of orphans cherished by thy love,
And trained to follow thee above.

Though simple was thy lot,
Laborious and obscure;
Though pain and sorrow spared thee not,
Mild to endure;
Princes and Kings shall wish that they
Had humbly followed in thy way;

When crowned with living light,
To call his loved ones home,
The Bridegroom in the hour of night,
Arrayed shall come,
And hail thee as his virgin bride,
Forever bright and glorified.

Then, bear her gently hence,
Upon the pillowing breast
Of earth, with love and reverence,
Lay her to rest;
Nor weep as they who, hopeless, weep;
She is not dead; she doth but sleep!

Requiescat in pace.

Washington, D. C., Nov., 1843.

TO MILDRED.

BY D. H. ROBINSON.

Dear little Lady! If, with song,
I've hallowed many another shrine,
Why should I not the strain prolong
To weave a wreath for thine?

Thou hast a heart as full and deep
As beats beneath a woman's breast,
Where Love will soon his revels keep,
And rosy longings rest!

Thou hast a mind from which the wild
Sweet flowers of thought will surely spring;
There seems already with the child
A mental blossoming.

The smile that lights that ample brow
Already tokens woman's might;
Thou hast an eye from which, even now,
There gleams a spirit-light!

God bless thee, Mildred! May the glow
That lightens up thy MOTHER's soul,
Still through thy very being flow
Till life's last wave shall roll!

And may the joy thy girlhood hath,
Bloom ever with thy blooming youth—
And Heaven shower along thy path
The sweet star-light of truth!

ON THE DISTRIBUTION OF INSANITY IN THE U. STATES.

The importance of insanity is a sufficient apology for the publication of the accompanying insane statistics, calculated with great care from the returns of the late census and several of the reports of the insane asylums. As originally published, these statistics did not admit a ready comparison of this country with others, or of different portions of the country with each other. In the accompanying tables, the returns of the different States have been reduced to a common standard, and thus rendered more readable and useful. These statistics are necessarily less rich in information than those published by the insane asylums of Europe, and do not afford a comparison upon many important and interesting minutiae contained in the reports of Salpêtrière, Charenton and other European asylums. Independently of the total absence of information upon many points, these tables are not worthy of entire confidence in relation to those points upon which they professedly report. From the difficulty of obtaining correct returns from a wide area of sparsely populated country, the census doubtless underrates the percentage of insanity in this country. I am strengthened in this opinion by those reports, containing the proportion of the insane to the total population in their respective States, and which, as far as they have fallen under my observation, show a much greater prevalence of insanity than is attested by the late census. Thus, according to an estimate made in New-York in 1825, the proportion of insane and idiots, was 1 in 721—and in 1838, 1 in 877 inhabitants. The latter estimate shows a diminution of insanity, but will hardly authorize the presumption of a sufficiently increased diminution to explain the discrepancy between this estimate and that derived from the late census, which is 1 in 1038. Although the accompanying tables may not be true in the abstract, they are relatively so, and prevent the general feature of insanity in this country and afford an important insight into the mental and moral influence of our social and political institutions. In examining these statistics, the first inquiry naturally suggesting itself, is the relative prevalence of insanity in this country and Europe. According to the most authentic estimate, the proportion of insane is, in Norway, 1 in 551 inhabitants—in Scotland, 1 in 573—in England, 1 in 783—in Wales, 1 in 911—in Rhenish provinces, 1 in 1000—in France, 1 in 1750—in Italy, 1 in 3785; making a general average of 1 in 1336, and a fraction showing the average prevalence in this country, 1 in 979, to be greater than in Europe, and if the fear already expressed be true that the census underrates the proportion of insanity, there is a greater difference in favor of Europe than above stated. We might at first refuse to admit the existence in our country of any peculiar causes, calculated to produce insanity, accustomed, as we are, to congratulate ourselves upon the very general diffusion among all classes of those blessings of existence, which contribute to mental and physical health and happiness. That our country is happily exempt from many ripe sources of insanity, incident to the dense population, and the social and political institutions of Europe, is indisputable; but do not those very institutions which we so much deprecate, present a check to insanity? And are not those free institutions in which we glory, calculated to promote it? Life in our republic has all the excitement of an olympic contest. A wide arena is thrown open, and all fearlessly join in the maddening rush for the laurel wreath, or golden chaplet, which are the guerdons in that race which is to the swift, and rarely does any Hesperian fruit seduce the candidates from the contest. Are not the bitter rancour of partizans, the morbid excitement of politicians, the feverish anxiety of gambling speculators, the sickness of hope deferred, ambition maddened by defeat, avarice rendered desperate by failure, so many sources of insanity? When the darker passions of the heart thus rise in mad rebellion, will not reason, either be dethroned, or reign in tumultuous anarchy? In Europe, on the contrary, the arena is more limited, the competitors are fewer, their course is comparatively clear, and the metae are less widely separated. Life is there rather a walk, than a race, and is pursued in a slower gait, rarely presenting the elbowing strife and jostling emulation so lamentably frequent in our over crowded agora. The excitement of rivalry is diminished by the different castes of competitors being confined to their respective courses, which are separated by barriers rendered sacred, of time-honored custom. This system, in the same degree that it checks the development of the mental faculties, secures them from derangement they may suffer from rust, but not, as in the former condition of society, from friction. That numerous exceptions to these results are to be found in both countries, is as undeniable as that the general tendency of the social and political institutions of the respective countries is that alluded to. I am happy to quote in confirmation of these views, the opinion of the intelligent superintendent of the Bloomingdale Asylum, who detects a connection between periods of active commercial speculation and those in which insanity most prevails.

If from the average of insanity in this country, we proceed to examine its distribution in the different States, we shall find as great variety as in the different countries of Europe, and one as difficult of explanation. Several of the States enjoying, in common, the same climate, possessing a similar topography and soil, whose citizens are similarly distributed among the different professions, and which apparently are exposed to the same physical and moral causes, present a wide difference in the relative prevalence of insanity. It is difficult to detect the precise causes of insanity in the individual States, and when capable of detection, it is doubly difficult to so analyze the result, as to refer to each element its due proportion. Another source of complexity which should prevent hasty generalization, is derived from the fluctuating character of our population. Emigrants generally leaving behind them the idiotic and insane, the State receiving the immigration has less than its due proportion, and the parent State more. This is probably the explanation of the singularly small proportion of insane in several of our newly formed States and territories, as exhibited in the table. Owing to the complexity of co-existing causes, it is impossible to make a numerical comparison between the agricultural and manufacturing portions of the union, although it is sufficiently evident that insanity is more prevalent in the latter, after making due allowance for the denser population and other causes peculiar to the manufacturing regions. The reverse is the case in Europe, if the distribution of insanity among the poor may be considered as a criterion of its general distribution, which may be safely done, as a very large majority of the insane are of the pauper class. According to the returns of the Poor Law Commissioners, the proportion of insane and idiots among the paupers in the entire population of England, is 1 in 1038—in seven agricultural countries, 1 in 872—in Lancashire, a manufacturing district, 1 in 1790. The proportion between the agricultural and manufacturing districts being as 224 in the former to 100 in the latter, or more than 2 to 1. This difference, I conceive, finds an easy explanation in the fact, that agricultural operatives are more exposed than the manufacturing to the inroads of poverty, which, with its concomitant evils, is every where the purveyor of the insane asylum. Although those restrictions upon free trade which disgrace the commercial code of England, operate alike upon the agricultural and mechanical operative in rendering employment uncertain, and equally exposing them by any commercial casualty to be deprived of the means of subsistence, yet the evil falls more heavily upon the former than the latter, as the agriculturist is almost the sole supporter of his family; the children and females being comparatively unproductive consumers, but to the mechanic, the females and children are important aids, being more than able to support themselves. It would be more inconsistent with the character of this article to enlarge upon this subject, but all acquainted with this portion of political economy, will, it is presumed, admit that the agriculturist of England is more liable to poverty than the mechanic, and will see in this the cause of his greater liability to insanity, when it is recollected how large a proportion of the insane of all countries are paupers. Not only is the agriculturist of this country free from unwise governmental interference with the profits of labor, but owing to a more equal distribution of land, he occupies an entirely different position from the mass of the agricultural population in England, he is a land holder, and the fruits of his daily toil go neither to satisfy the rapacious avarice of the middle master, nor the extravagance of an absentee, but reward his own industry. To these causes we are undoubtedly indebted for the less prevalence of insanity among our agricultural population. If the statistics of insanity and education are examined in connection, no uniform relation will be discovered between them. Among those States possessing a high status of education, are those in which insanity is most abundant, as well as those in which it least prevails, and vice versa. This is not to be attributed to the inertness of education upon mental disease, but to the operation of existing causes from whose effects it is difficult to separate those of education. When the influence of education upon insanity shall be more fully developed, it will doubtless prove as upon crime complex. The Baconian apothegm, that knowledge is power, is now received as an axiom; power it undoubtedly is, but it is power for good or evil. In the thorny path of life, as in Paradise, good and evil are the fruits of the same tree, and the moral tastes of the gatherer will alone determine the choice. To bestow this power without the moral wisdom that can alone control and check it, is to arm the blind, and to trust to chance for a proper use of the power. The remark of M. Guery, that crime is most abundant in those provinces of France, where education is most generally diffused, or a similar statement in reference to portions of our own country by De Beaumont and De Tocqueville, is not, therefore, surprising. The influence of education upon insanity, as upon crime, will therefore most probably vary with its nature, and to secure its ameliorating influence must be moral as well as intellectual—it must not be merely a cramming process of filling the head with ideas, but the heart must be formed to habits of virtue—virtuous principles must not be abstractly taught, but the pupil must be trained to their practice, and it must be ever borne in mind, “that education is but a school for life and life a school for eternity.” As the power by which mind influences mind, is chiefly derived from education, it may, in our country, frequently coöperate with our free institutions in producing mental disease, as it presents the ambitious with a ladder, the demagogue with the means of pinging to the passions and pandering to the vices of the mob, and adventurers of every kind a means of attaining their ends. There is a species of education undoubtedly prejudicial to mental health; that education which refines without strengthening the mental faculties, but which weakens them in the same proportion as it renders them more acute, and which terminates in a kind of intellectual epicurism. It is a law of our nature, that our organs in proportion as they become refined are weakened; thus the sensitive touch of the lapidary and the microscopic eye of the mathematical instrument maker are purchased at a sacrifice of strength. In the same manner, merely intellectual education would weaken by refinement. Corresponding to this intellectual acuteness, a morbid sensibility of the feelings is produced, alike unfavorable to mental health.

As the negroes constitute in this country a distinct caste, operated upon by few moral, social, political causes in common with the whites, but those peculiar to themselves, they have not been included with the whites in the estimate, but the proportion of insanity among them has been independently calculated. Taking all the States together, there is but slight difference in the relative prevalence of insanity and idiocy between the whites and blacks, the difference being in favor of the latter; but if the slave-holding and non-slave-holding States are compared, mental disease will be found very differently distributed in the different regions; in the former, it is much more prevalent among the whites, in the latter, among the blacks. This singular difference in the distribution of insanity can only be ascribed to the influence of slavery, as the States compared are in other respects equal. A glance at the tables will suffice to show the difference alluded to, as well as the much greater prevalence of insanity among the blacks of the non-slave-holding, than among those of the slave-holding

States. This difference is to be explained by the fact, that in the non-slave-holding States, the blacks are in a condition of social helotage, constituting the pauper caste and the heirs of all the ills which poverty entails upon its subjects. The negro of the South, on the contrary, cares not for the morrow, well knowing, that another will provide what he shall eat, what he shall drink, and wherewithal he shall be clothed; his simple mode of life secures him health, and in the winter of life, he crowns “a youth of labor, with an age of ease.” Not only is mental disease more prevalent among the blacks of the non-slave-holding States, than among those of the South, but it also predominates among the whites of the former, over those of the latter, although the inequality is much less than between the blacks.

The census of Virginia in connection with the reports of the State asylums, render it practicable to study minutely the distribution of insanity in the different districts of the State. East of the Blue Ridge, among the whites, the proportion of insanity, is 1 in 1436—among the blacks, 1 in 1436,—West of the Blue Ridge, among the whites, 1 in 688—among the blacks, 1 in 817. Insanity is therefore more common in Western than in Eastern Virginia, both among whites and blacks, but the increase is much greater among the latter, which is probably to be accounted for by the larger number of free negroes in tramontane Virginia; insanity being from causes already explained more prevalent among this class than among slaves. The cause of the increased prevalence among the whites is less obvious. As observation, by no means limited, had previously to the census produced the opinion that idiocy was more common West of the Blue Ridge than East of it, and as the census fails to express whether insanity or idiocy is the more common form of the disease, we might feel inclined to select the latter as most abundant, and explain it by the opinion of Esquival, that idiocy was most prevalent in mountainous regions from some endemic cause peculiar to such districts, had we not been reminded by Dr. Dunglison, that as Wales and Italy, eminently mountainous, do not support the rule, it cannot be absolute. Whatever be the cause, the fact shows the truth of the statement previously made, that insanity is not in this country as in England, proportionate with agriculture, as East of the mountains, about 50 per cent. of the population are engaged in agriculture, and West of it but about 25 per cent. It will doubtless excite surprise, that in the sea-board district, composed of the eminently malarial counties, mental disease is less prevalent than in other portions of the State, the proportion being, 1 in 1049, including both blacks and whites,—in the country between this district and the Blue Ridge 1 in 819, and West of the Blue Ridge, 1 in 703, showing a gradual increase as we ascend from the sea level.

In reviewing the subject, we find much reason to congratulate ourselves upon the absence from our country of many causes predisposing to insanity which are prevalent in Europe, and that those peculiar to our social and political institutions will find an effectual check in education founded on a moral and religious basis. It is gratifying to the philanthropist to find in education both an antidote to the evils of our political system, and a security for its permanence and success, thus making the cause of America the cause of the world, and the cause of her people the cause of humanity.

Smithfield, Dec. 19, 1843. C. B. HAYDEN.

THE SOUTHERN LYRE'S WAKING MOMENTS.

Mrs. Sigourney's invocation to the Southern Muse, has waked several lyres. The following strain is the best that has reached us.—[Ed. Mess.

Awake! my Muse from "stilly" hours—
From 'neath the myrtle's shade,
Fling on the breeze thy lofty powers,
And through the heavens wade.
Thy spirit is invok'd abroad,
By sister Muse's lays;
Shake off old Rip's mossy cloak so broad,
And wake to brighter days.

And while Aurora's golden beams,
Shall shoot the ether through,
Let not these Southern crystal streams
Glide on without thy view.

While these eternal mountains stand,
Whose brows are deck'd with white;
Where "leaps live thunder" from his hand,
Who made both day and night.

Let not thy strains their whispers cease,
Beneath the myrtle's shade,
Nor turn to sleep in silent peace,
In some lone Southern glade.

Awake! ye fires in Southern soul—
No longer stillness keep—
Dart radiant beams from pole to pole,
And o'er the foaming deep.

Born on the South's bright sunny shore,
Where genius spreads her wing;—
Awake! awake! to sleep no more,
And with thy sister sing.

Mount Vernon! echo back the strain,
And let the numbers roll,
Their echos long from main to main,
And loud from pole to pole.

While Marshall's and old Henry's names
Upon the record stand,
Let Southern Muse's god-like flames,
Spread light o'er freedom's land.

"Lyre of the South awake! awake!"
And let the wild winds bear
Thy swelling notes from lake to lake,

NEW YORK, JANUARY, 1844.

There was a time, and that time has not very long since passed away, when a novel would readily command two dollars. Now, the same food for the imagination and the same material for amusement can be procured for twelve-and-a-half cents. This is certainly a vast difference in the cost of an article, to occur in the course of fifteen or twenty years. What is the cause of this great difference in money value? Is it that people are willing to pay less for intellectual amusement now than they were twenty years ago? Has money become dearer, or in other words, scarcer? Has the taste for light reading dwindled away so that novel-wrights are willing to sell their wares for whatever they can get? Has the supply so far exceeded the demand as to cause this great reduction of price? To these questions, the answer is, no. People are as fond now of amusement as ever; the number of readers has increased far more rapidly than writers; for the purposes of diversion, money is as abundant as ever, or theatres, concert-rooms, lecture-rooms, &c., &c., would not be so numerous attended.

Some years ago, when novels and light literature began to command a reduced price per volume, American authors were anxious to obtain the passage of an international copyright law, but they were vigorously and successfully opposed by American publishers, who found it to be their, then present, interest to print and publish books which cost them nothing in authors' fees. They argued, that an international copyright law would have a tendency to reduce the amount of printing, and therefore paper-makers, printers, ink-manufacturers, book-binders, folders, type-founders, die-sinkers, engravers, &c., would have less to do, and as American authors by profession were much less numerous than any one of the callings named, an international copyright law was anti-republican in spirit, because it sought to protect the few in their labors at the expense of the many. They further argued, that by not passing the law, the people would be very much benefited, because the price of books would be reduced, the number of readers would be increased and, consequently, information, the great foundation upon which the permanency of a republic must ultimately rest, would become in time universally diffused. As to the justice of giving British authors some reward in this country for labors in their own, the idea was not for a moment entertained, and they willingly lent themselves to be pirates on the great intellectual ocean of the world, laying violent and appropriating hands upon every man's mental argosie, that was not under an American flag, and if under an American flag, it was only suffered to keep the sea by paying a sort of "black mail," by large discounts on the value of the cargo.

What has been the consequence of the success of their arguments and opposition. These appropriators of British mental labors, in their eagerness to verify their predictions, were driven to compete in under selling each other, and, it is said, that large capitalists not unfrequently published books at less than the cost of "getting up," for the purpose of bankrupting publishers of smaller means. This system of competition has gone on till the whole country is flooded with cheap trash, twelve-and-a-half cent novels, grammars of all languages, cook-books and scientific works. Now, we find that some large houses, whose capital was employed solely almost, in the "getting up" of the lightest and perhaps the most injurious kind of reading, have laid their money in another channel, and bring forth works of solid merit in literature and science. But finding this description of books, although yielding a more certain return, not as profitable as lighter reading, because the admirers of solid and useful learning are fewer, they have joined hands with the authors and are ready to make common cause with them. "A change has come over the spirit of their dreams," and they find that an international copyright law will protect the morals of the people, shut off the supply of the obscene trash of Paul de Kock, Eugene Sue and others; that the price of good books will not be materially increased, that it is only just that men who belong to the great republic of literature, which is confined within the narrow limits of no kingdom or country, should receive every where a fair reward for their labors; that encouragement would be given to the productions of our own soil, and poor devil, American authors, need no longer starve, and the trades which are connected with book-making will lose nothing.

What have the people gained by all this contention of rival and special interests? An astoundingly cheap literature mostly made up of trash—made to sell—and recently, some most valuable and cheap books. American medical libraries are now supplied at a comparatively small cost, with the very best productions the medical world ever saw, both of home and foreign origin. Let us glance at a few of these more recent volumes:—but first—

A NEW THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL TREATISE ON NAVIGATION, by M. F. MAURY, Lieutenant United States Navy. Second edition—1 vol. 8 vo. Ed. C. Biddle, Philadelphia, 1843.

Perhaps navigators may smile at even the idea of any person writing a book on the subject of navigation, knowing as almost every sailor does, that Bowditch is master of the seas. But let me assure them this is not a matter to excite either laughter or contempt, but is worthy of all praise. Indeed, it ought to be a source of naval pride, that a young navy officer, merely "a school-boy Midshipman" when the work was produced from his active brain as I understand, should be able to write a new book on the theory of Navigation which commanded the approbation of the great BOWDITCH HIMSELF, to say nothing of such mathematicians as BACHE, Ward, and very many minor masters of the higher branches of mathematics. But Americans have been ever diffident, it has been said, in their own judgment of American authors until their works have been stamped by European approbation; and this is perhaps, in a small degree, the reason why this truly admirable work is less known than I am sure it ought to be, and surely will be. In no very long time it has silently and gradually made its way to a second edition, which cannot be said of every American book, for it was not voraciously seized upon and puffed up to the skies by every newspaper in the country. It has won favor by its own unobtrusive merit; and had there been an international copy-right law when it first saw the light, at this time, it would have been the text book in every school in which Navigation is taught throughout the broad face of our country.

The reader may ask, what are the peculiar excellencies of this book on Navigation? I shall play the honest critic and speak of defects as well as merits, for I am not bound as an editor, by fear of offending either author or publisher:—I am beyond the reach of both. And first of defects. It is not a foot-rule. Bowditch's Navigation is to the navigator what a foot-rule is to a carpenter—it enables him to measure his work as he goes; but, like the foot-rule, it teaches not very well for what purpose it is marked with inches, or why a foot may not be thirteen inches long as well as twelve. Bowditch does not deal in why and because so much as he does in, "thus it is." Now the difference between the books of Bowditch and Maury is simply this:—the former tells you most plainly it is so, and the latter tells you why it is so, and why it must be so, and the reason why it cannot be otherwise.

The book treats concisely, clearly and sufficiently for elementary purposes of Algebra, Geometry, Logarithms, Plane and Spherical Trigonometry, Nautical Astronomy and Navigation. The principles of all these branches of mathematics are explained in a simple manner—in fact, in a much plainer way than we have found in other books. But as the work has received the approbation of Bowditch, Bache, Rodrigues, Ward, Coffin and of the Naval Lyceum of New York, and is recommended by them as a text-book for naval schools, it is supererogatory to say a word upon the subject of the value of the book.

There is a definition in the volume which, to our conception, is remarkably beautiful. Heretofore, all the definitions we have seen of a point, were equally applicable as a definition of nothing. We learned at school, that a mathematical point has neither length, nor breadth, nor thickness. That is perhaps true, but it certainly conveys the idea of nothing, as much as it does of a point—but Maury most aptly, we think, defines a point to be "an atom of space."

Let us hope, although the praises of this work have not been loudly sung in England, that it may attract the attention it merits, and that our young naval officers will learn from it the theory of Navigation, while they acquire practical knowledge on the broad oceans of the earth.

As we have been speaking of naval matters, I will call the attention of your naval readers to a most pleasant book, at least to all who feel an interest in the votaries of science. It is a small volume, published in Philadelphia during the past summer, entitled "Reliquiæ Baldwinianæ; Selections from the correspondence of the late William Baldwin, M. D., Surgeon in the United States Navy." Compiled by William Darlington, M. D., an eminent botanist, and formerly a member of Congress from Chester county, Pennsylvania.

Dr. Baldwin was a native of Pennsylvania. He was born in 1779, and entered the Navy in May, 1812, and during the war served at St. Mary's and Savannah. "He was stationed at St. Mary's for two years and six months; and for a considerable part of that time he neither had mate nor loblolly boy. The one resigned and the other died; a great many on the sick list—the weather extremely sultry—he scarcely had time to rest night or day—notwithstanding," says his wife, "I did all in my power to assist him, in mixing and putting up medicine. He was stationed two years at Savannah. In 1817, he accompanied Messrs. Rodney, Graham, and Bland, in the United States frigate, Congress, as surgeon of the ship, on a mission to Buenos Ayres, and other South American ports, for the purpose of ascertaining the condition and prospects of the Spanish colonists, who were then struggling to establish their independence of the mother country. Dr. Baldwin's reputation as a Botanist, induced the government to select him for this service. After his return, in 1819, he was appointed Surgeon and Botanist, to accompany Major Long's Expedition up the river Missouri. He was an industrious and zealous botanist, although his health was extremely precarious. He died on the banks of the Missouri, in September, 1819, in the forty-first year of his age.

The correspondence shows how the difficulties which surround pioneers in natural science are overcome by a zealous love and admiration of nature; and it shows, too, how valuable a true votary of science is to his country, and how little such worth was appreciated in his day. His services were valued at the paltry sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars a year.

We have read "An Essay on Organic Remains as connected with an ancient tropical region of the Earth, by Thomas Gilpin, member of the American Philosophical Society," Philadelphia, 1843—pages 40. The object of this paper is to show that organic remains occupy "a great uniform zone of tropical climate" "differently situated from the present tropics." The author thinks that this zone was once actually the tropical region of the earth; but that the globe has since changed the position of its poles, so that the ancient tropics now lie in a north-west and south-east direction, somewhat in a line with the present ecliptic. It is a bone of contention for geologists and to them we leave it.

Among the volumes which have fallen in our way, belonging to the subject of these rambling notes, is "Elliotson and Stewardson's Practice of Medicine," from the press of Messrs. Carey & Hart, Philadelphia, containing upwards of 1000 pages, closely and well printed. This work consists of the lectures formerly delivered by Dr. Elliotson in London, forming the skeleton, or outline of the whole, which is filled out completely by additions from the pens of Dr.'s Nathaniel Rogers and Alexander Cooper Lee of England, who have added, besides their own contributions, extracts from the best modern medical authors. To all this, Dr. Stewardson of Philadelphia, (physician of the Pennsylvania hospital) has made valuable additions, among which there are admirable chapters on Remittent and Yellow Fever. The work is extensively used as a text book by medical students in England, and there is but little doubt of its finding equal favor in the United States. Being originally in the form of lectures, the style is colloquial and familiar, and as technical words are explained, in notes as they occur, it is particularly well adapted to those who are seeking the rudiments of medicine—not such "rudiments" of the healing art, however, as Japhet studied.

The same house has published a cheap edition of Quain's beautiful anatomical plates this year, while their neighbors, Messrs. Lea & Blanchard, have devoted themselves almost to the publication of medical books. Among the most recent from them, we have a capital book, "A Practical Treatise on the Diseases of Children, by D. Francis Condie, M. D.," &c. An octavo of 650 pages. A standard, or text book, on this subject, has been long wanted, and from the author's large practice among children, his extensive learning, and long habit of thinking well, we feel pretty sure he has supplied the desideratum in a satisfactory manner to the public. It is an American book, by an American author.

Messrs. Barrington & Haswell, of Philadelphia, have published a neat little book on "Minor Surgery," by Dr. Henry H. Smith, of Philadelphia, a young surgeon of much promise. The same gentleman has edited the beautiful Anatomical Atlas which accompanies Professor Horner's "Special Anatomy and Histology" from the ever active press of Messrs. Lea & Blanchard.

From the Boston medical press, we have a most excellent book—Dr. Warren's edition of "Walshe on Cancer." Dr. Warren has added valuable notes to a new edition of Sir Astley Cooper's work on "Dislocations and Fractures," which Messrs. Lea & Blanchard have recently presented to the public.

Sir Astley Cooper's work on Dislocations and Fractures first appeared in 1822. It went through several editions during his life, both in England and this country, and at his death he had recently revised it and placed it in the hands of his nephew for a new edition. Of this last revised edition, the present is an exact copy; and contains besides valuable notes and additions by Dr. Warren, of Boston.

"This edition is published under the superintendence of the committee on publications of the Massachusetts Medical Society. The engravings are copied by Mr. A. Hartwell from those of the English Edition and are perfect representations of the originals. The committee feel bound to express their gratification at the manner in which these engravings are executed by the artist; and their obligations to the printer for the care and skill manifested in the performance of the whole work."

We do not think, however, that as far as the printing of the engravings is concerned, the execution is equal to that seen in Clymer's edition of Carpenter's Physiology, or Norris' edition of Ferguson's Surgery, or Goddard's edition of Wilson's Anatomy, all from the press of Lea & Blanchard. They are not so perfectly smooth and black as they are seen in English printed books; perhaps the very best wood-cut printing done in the United States, is to be seen in that most valuable treatise on a special surgical subject, "Goddard's Curling," from the press of Carey & Hart.

The printing of wood-cuts in our country is almost a new art, and, whether attributable to want of knowledge, to inferior quality in the ink or paper, our work is far from being equal to that we find in French or English books. But we are daily improving; and the reason is, that wood-cuts are now almost as essential to books as text or types. As an example of good wood-engraving and wood-cut printing, we may refer to the Pictorial Bible in course of publication by the Harpers of New-York; a fine English specimen is seen in "The Book of English Ballads," and among the finest French wood-cut work is the "Fables de La Fontaine, illustrées par J. J. Grandville."

"It may be asked," says Dr. Warren in his memoir of Sir Astley Cooper, prefixed to his work on dislocations—"It may be asked, and the inquiry is not without instruction as well as interest, how it happened that Sir Astley Cooper, beginning life as he did, not only without patronage, but under circumstances in some respects calculated greatly to prejudice his advancement, should so early reach the highest emoluments and honors of the profession. Happily, the answer is easy. If he obtained from the medical profession more honor and emolument than any other man has ever done, it was because he devoted to that profession an amount of bodily and mental energy, rarely, if ever, equalled by any other. In the first place, as we have seen, he spent ten years in most laborious application, before he seriously attempted to acquire private practice; and during more than half of this period he was employed in teaching and in practice, as well as in learning, so as to give much the greater force and effect to his inquiries. In addition to this, his whole life was a course of inquiry and study. Every case presented to him was not merely a disease or injury to be treated, but a subject for investigation. All these inquiries were directed to a practical object. He had little taste or respect for theoretical speculations; but an insatiable appetite for useful facts, and a remarkable aptitude to apply such facts to a practical purpose."

If we could be truly informed, there is but little doubt we should find, that in every case of individual greatness it would be traced, as in the instance before us, as much to extraordinary, mental and bodily labor, as to natural endowment. The richest soil will be unproductive of good, will lie fallow and waste, unless industriously cultivated, not for one season only but continuously. A great lawyer, a great divine, or a great physician cannot be formed by the labor and study of a single year. All these, or any one of these branches of human knowledge, is too intricate and too abstruse to be mastered by any intellect by paroxysmal efforts sustained for a short time. In the case of Sir Astley, ten years of laborious preparation were required before he began to practice. What an apprenticeship compared with the three years study required of students of medicine in most of our colleges. The requirements are too small for the interests of the people, and for the interests of the medical profession. Indeed, high grades of intellectual culture do not seem to be fully appreciated in our country: and we take too little general interest in the means afforded in the United States for attaining the highest degree of education in the professions. The general reader is often indifferent as to what scientific books are to be found on the shelves of our booksellers. Why should he not be informed of the publication of good books on medicine and surgery, theology, or law, as well as of those on history—books of travel, voyages, novels, or poems, and works of imagination generally.

Let me commend to all your readers, Mr. Messenger, and to your young readers especially, the paragraph above quoted from Sir Astley Cooper's Memoir: it contains the secret of success in almost every pursuit. And we may add, it shows that the profession of medicine requires a large money capital, besides industry and natural ability to insure success in its practice. Whilst he studies, the student must be maintained, for several years; and he requires books, instruments, &c., and he must pay preceptor and college fees. But the people set little value on this noblest of professions, even when acquired, if we take the salaries, &c., paid by the people, through the agency of the general government, for the services of the best educated medical men in the Army and Navy. A Navy register, at hand, shows that the Navy department consists of the office of the Secretary of the Navy and five bureaux; namely, a bureau of Navy-yards and Docks; a bureau of ordnance and hydrography; a bureau of construction, equipment and repair; a bureau of provisions and clothing; and a bureau of medicine and surgery. To the chief of each of the first two bureaux is paid $3500 per annum; these two bureaux are in charge of two captains in the Navy, whose pay would not be less on any other duty; the third bureau is also in charge of a captain, who is entitled to $3500 on any duty whatever, although the law, creating the bureau, directs that its chief "shall be a skilful naval constructor" and shall receive for his services $3000 per annum. Whether the captain in charge, receives less than his pay as an officer in the Navy, in consequence of being a "skilful naval constructor," (of course the terms of the law are complied with) the document does not say. The chief of the (4th) bureau of provisions, &c., receives $3000; but the chief of the bureau of medicine and surgery is assigned only $2500 per annum. The intrinsic importance of each of these branches of the Navy department taken separately, and the degree of intellect, professional and general knowledge, together with the amount of bodily and mental labor required to discharge the duties in each, cannot be very different; and it certainly is not least in the bureau of medicine, although such is the plain inference to be drawn from the salaries assigned to the chiefs of the several bureaux. A similar disparity will, most probably, be found in the bureaux of the War department; but as the officers of the Army receive a small salary, and emoluments, or perquisites "to make up," it is not so easy to make a comparative statement.

The reason of this difference of value set upon different branches of human knowledge by the government is, that the science of medicine is not physical, tangible, palpable to the senses, as some other kinds of information brought into the service of the people are. The man who rigs a ship, or builds a dock, or casts a cannon, produces something that eye can see and the meanest intellect appreciate; the degree and kind of qualification required by a man to purchase large quantities of provisions and clothing can also be easily appreciated; but a man who takes measures to avert disease from thousands of human beings; the man who has learned to rescue his fellows from the death-grasp of fever and pestilence; to make the blind see and the lame walk; and to relieve, or assuage the agony of the sick and wounded, performs acts which are not generally seen, are not palpable to the senses of ordinary intellects, and, consequently, his services are appraised lower than those of any of his companions in office—and, it may be further adduced in illustration, that in as much as the services of the chaplain are even less palpable and cognizable than those of the physician, if there were a chaplain at the head of a religious bureau he would not be paid more than $1500.

This appraisal of mental labor below that which is physical merely, is strongly exhibited in the value set upon what they are pleased to call "head-work," by laboring mechanics, although, as was observed by Dr. R. M. Patterson in a lecture recently delivered before the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia, all working men admit that the hardest labor they perform is adjusting their accounts at the end of the week or month. The act of weaving words into sentences, and sentences into a discourse or essay upon any subject requires an amount of preparatory labor and study, not readily appreciated by those who have never attempted to perform it.

This low estimate set upon purely mental labor by the mass of the people, is, perhaps, one reason why the international copyright law did not pass. Perhaps it was well for the nation at large that such was the case, since it has led to the results we have indicated, the reduced price of books, and the publication of a large number of works of solid merit, in the arts and sciences, and especially in medicine and surgery. The people generally, are, or should be, deeply interested in the spread of medical literature and the advancement of medical science, because it must have more or less influence upon the skill of the medical attendants called to their assistance when sick or hurt. The national legislature ought to foster and encourage medical science as well as every other, by setting a standard value upon the services of scientific men called into the service of the government. It should insist upon the highest grade of scientific attainments, and pay for them accordingly.

Care is taken to give information to most, if not all classes of government officers; members of Congress are supplied with daily journals, books, and a library at public expense; the departments have their journals and libraries; ships of war, forts and Navy-yards are supplied with libraries, including books on professional subjects, &c., but there is no such encouragement given to the diffusion of medical knowledge. There is no medical journal provided for any naval station; our naval hospitals, ships and Navy-yards have no medical books, but both in the Army and Navy, medical officers are left to obtain professional knowledge at their own expense, out of small salaries, or not obtain it at all. And it is much to the credit of these gentlemen that they do purchase books, journals, &c., to keep way in knowledge with a constantly improving science, which must be of unspeakable advantage to the sick and wounded who may come under their care.

Were it not that Washington, Madison and Jefferson severally recommended in vain the establishment of a national university, we would suggest to the heads of the medical bureaux in the War and Navy departments, to ask the government to furnish a medical library, and the best medical periodical in our country—"The American Journal of Medical Sciences"—to every military post where there is a medical officer, to every naval hospital, every Navy-yard and every ship in commission. It might all be accomplished gradually by an appropriation of a thousand dollars annually, and the government and people would be benefitted more than this amount in return.

There is an indication that the value of science and of the services of scientific men is on the rise. The Hon. D. Henshaw, Secretary of the Navy, says, in his late report to Congress, "It is believed that great advantages may be derived by employing scientific persons in testing the quality of copper and various other materials, and in the preparation of many articles used in the service, which have heretofore been found, when used, of inferior quality. It is highly important that a competent person be employed in the preparation of fuses, rockets, and other fire-works, indispensable to the naval service. So deficient is the service in this knowledge that the fuses necessary for its use are obliged to be purchased.

"The medical department of the naval service requires talent, education, and moral worth, properly to fill it, of as high order as in other branches of that service; but the surgeons and assistant surgeons have no military rank. A modification of the law, by which medical officers in the naval service shall be entitled to rank, in a manner similar to that prescribed in the Army, might be beneficially made." (On this subject, see articles on "The Rules and Regulations of the Navy" in the Southern Literary Messenger for 1843.)

Whether Congress will act on these judicious recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, there is no means of knowing. But it should do so; no matter whether it be post hoc or propter hoc.

Whether the services of scientific men will rise in the estimation of the government and of the people, in consequence of Mr. Henshaw's recommendation, remains to be seen. But if they should rise, it may not be in consequence of any thing but members of Congress obtaining sound and enlarged views on the subject. We are so liable to reach false conclusions by false reasoning, that I will forbear any conjectures as to what may be the cause of any result that may accrue in the premises.

I will close this desultory communication with the following extract from a late introductory lecture by the distinguished Professor Dunglison of Philadelphia.

"Here now," says Bishop Latimer, in the last sermon which he preached before Edward the VI. of England. "Here now," said he, "I remember an argument of Master More's, which he bringeth in a book, that he made against Bilney; and here, by the way, I will tell you a merry toy. Master More was once sent into Kent to try (if it might be) what was the cause of the Goodwin sands and the shelves that stopped up Sandwich-haven. Thither cometh Master More, and calleth the country before him, such as were thought to be men of experience, and men that could of likelihood best certify him of that matter concerning the stoppage of the Sandwich-haven. Among others, came in one afore him, an old man with a white head, and one that was thought to be little less than an hundred years old. When Master More saw this aged man, he thought it expedient to hear him say his mind in this matter, for, being so old a man, it was likely he knew most of any man in that presence and company. So Master More called this old aged man unto him, and said: 'Father,' said he, 'tell me if ye can, what is the cause of this great arising of the sands and shelves here about this haven, the which stop it up, and no ships can arrive here? Ye are the eldest man that I can espy in this company, so that if any man can tell any cause of it, ye of likelihood can say most in it, or, at least wise, more than any man here assembled?' 'Yea, forsooth, good master (quod this old man) for I am well-nigh an hundred years old, and no man here in this company any thing near unto mine age.' 'Well, then,' quod Master More, 'how say you in this matter? What think you to be the cause of these shelves and flats that stop up Sandwich-haven?' 'Forsooth, sir,' quod he, 'I am an old man. I think Tenterton steeple is the cause of Goodwin sands. For I am an old man, (quod he) and I may remember the building of Tenterton steeple, and I may remember when there was no steeple at all there. And before that Tenterton steeple was in building, there was no manner of speaking of any flats or sands that stopped the haven; and therefore, I think, that Tenterton steeple is the cause of the destroying and decaying of Sandwich-haven.'

The American Journal of the American Sciences; The Census of 1840; The Medical News; Biography of John Randolph; A Christmas Carol; Arabella Stuart; Commodore Elliot; Aristocratic Distinctions; Goddard on the Teeth.

Of late, I have had little time for reading or reflecting, and for this reason, my month's gossip for the Messenger will be soon related. I have found an opponent to one of the contributors of the Messenger, touching the insanity of the slave population; but of that in its place.

"THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES," edited by Isaac Hays, M. D., &c. Published quarterly, in Philadelphia, by Lea & Blanchard; in London, by Wiley & Putnam, and in Paris, by Bossange & Co.

Without exception, this is the very best Medical Periodical published on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and is the oldest now being published in the United States, having been commenced upwards of twenty years ago under the Editorship of Dr. Chapman, who was succeeded by the present editor. The best skill and talent in the country contribute to its pages, which have long enjoyed the highest respect of the profession.

The January number of the present year, is a fair specimen of the journal generally. The first paper gives an interesting history of an epidemic erysipematous fever, which prevailed in Vermont and New Hampshire in the years 1842-'3. The second is on the "modus operandi" of medicines, by Professor John B. Beck of New York; the third is by Dr. John L. Atlee of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, describing a triumph of American Surgery; the fourth, by Dr. G. Hayward of Boston; the fifth, by Dr. Edward Jarvis of Dorchester, Massachusetts on "Insanity among the colored population of the Free States," in which he clearly shows, that the Census of the United States for 1840, on this point, is full of errors, and "is, in respect to human ailment, a bearer of falsehood to confuse and mislead." This paper is worthy the perusal of statesmen and political economists; and especially of the author of the article "Reflections on the Census of 1840," (Southern Literary Messenger, June, 1843,) for, in our apprehension, Dr. Jarvis has destroyed the data from which his conclusions are partly drawn. The sixth article describes the removal of a large tumor from the side of a "blooming boy" of four years old, by Dr. W. L. Atlee of Lancaster, Pennsylvania. The sixth article is by Dr. T. R. Beck of Albany; the eighth, by Dr. Wm. P. Buel of the city of New York; the ninth, by Dr. Fosgate of Auburn, New York, on Delirium Tremens; and the tenth, by Dr. Bissell of Connecticut.

All these communications are good, and some of them excellent. Besides, the number contains several excellent medical reviews, and a general summary of medical discoveries in all parts of the world, collected in the past quarter.

The public ought to know of the existence of this high-toned, scientific periodical, which contains a record of the experience of the most distinguished physicians and surgeons in all parts of the United States, who are devoted to the improvement of medical science, and consequently, to ameliorating "the ills that flesh is heir to."

We have also, the "Medical News and Library" for February, 1844, containing the latest information by the steamers from Europe, and 64 pages of "Watson's Practice of Medicine," among the very best books on the subject in the language.

"A BIOGRAPHY OF JOHN RANDOLPH OF ROANOKE," &c. by Lemuel Sawyer: 8vo., pp. 132. Burgess, Stringer & Co., New York.

The ex-member of Congress has given a meagre sketch of the caustic Randolph, not calculated to win the author many laurels, or add much to the respect of the public for the memory of the erratic genius of his subject. The style is often obscure, but the brochure has the rare merit now-a-days of clean white paper and pretty fair type.

We learn very little more of John Randolph and his man Juba, than has been previously published.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL in prose, being a Ghost Story of Christmas, by Charles Dickens. 8vo., pp. 31. Harpers, New York.

This is worthy of the better days of Boz, although it does come to us baldly printed on "whity brown paper." There is many a Scrooge in th world, who might see his picture here, and be better by imitating the reformation of the hero of the tale.

ARABELLA STUART. A Romance from English History, by G. P. R. James, Esq. 8vo., pp. 143. Harpers, New York.

Another badly printed book on bad paper. The story is a melancholy one, and familiar to readers of English History. It is generally well spoken of by the press.

ADDRESS OF COM. JESSE D. ELLIOT, U. S. N., delivered in Washington County, Maryland, to his early companions, at their request, on November 24th, 1843. 8vo., pp. 137. G. B. Zieber & Co., Philadelphia.

Whether we consider the author, the subject of the address, or the occasion of its delivery, a visit to his mother's grave, this must be regarded as an extraordinary production. It is a narrative of the author's own life, given in a vulgar, inflated style, which does but little credit to the literary ability of Naval captains, if we should be compelled to take this as a sample. Although the commission of a captain in the Navy seems to carry with it merit of every kind, it is very evident, that it has not conferred upon Commodore Elliot the qualifications of a fine writer or classical scholar. The old stories about Lake Erie and the figure head of the Constitution frigate are prominent features in the address, to say nothing of the Jackson affair, and the court martial, which sentenced him to suspension. He abuses the late Secretary Paulding and lauds Secretary Henshaw, and charges all the witnesses against himself with "being no better than they should be." Indeed, he makes some personal attacks, which do no great credit to his charity or kindness of heart. He represents himself as a much injured man, and seems desirous of taking what wrestlers call "a lower hold"—he addresses himself to the groundlings, and will probably get some votes, should he set up as a candidate for the Presidency. We say again, this is a remarkable production, and contains some "rich morsels" for those who seek after personal vituperation. To such, and such only, we cheerfully commend it.

The recent fracas in the House of Representatives at Washington, in which one Mr. Weller was a principal actor, shows there is an attempt to make aristocratic distinctions in our republic. It seems to have been clearly established, that a member of Congress is above the level of any of his fellow citizens, who report for the newspaper press. The duello, that was sought by the beaten party, could not come off because of his inferior social standing. Was that not the reason why the member of Congress was not permitted by his friends to accept a challenge to mortal combat? It is a "pretty reason" in a republic—and simple cits should take a hint, and not put themselves in the way of the "fisty cuffs" of honorables more powerfully endowed with bone and sinew than themselves.

"Goddard on he Teeth, with 30 plates," is a beautiful and highly meritorious quarto from the press of Messrs. Carey & Hart of Philadelphia. The plates are the best specimens of lithography, that have been produced in our country. It is a rarely good book, and we hope to give some account of it on a future occasion.

D. Ruschenberger HOLGAZAN.

Notices of New Works.

We are indebted to our enterprising neighbor, Mr. Gill, for A DIARY—together with STRIFE and PEACE. By Frederika Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt.

The name of Frederika Bremer is, in the eyes of the public, which has already passed judgment upon her merits, a sufficient recommendation. With them we leave it; but of the very coarse and un-lady-like preface, we cannot avoid saying a word or two.

It seems, as far as we can gather from her remarks, that some American translations of works of Miss Bremer have been imported into England, and sold at prices which seriously interfere with Mrs. Howitt's profits, and these "Yankees," as she calls them, have even had the temerity to be beforehand with the good Quakeress, in translating some productions of the Swedish lady, with which she (Mrs. H.) has not yet had leisure to favor the English public. She complains, that "an individual has proceeded, not only to thrust himself into the very midst of my (!) series, but has made an impudent attempt to injure my edition, as if I were publishing it in too costly a style." "He steps in, passes over the volumes on which I am, at the moment, engaged, and pounces on the next before me. This marks the Prowler and the Literary Body-snatcher."

With the relative merits of the two translations we have nothing to do, (we have not seen the American); but this "impudent attempt" to set up an arrogant and grasping claim to be the sole translator of the works of a foreign authoress, be the rival translations better or worse than her own, merits the severest castigation from the press. She claims, not only that no one should attempt a better translation of Miss Bremer's works than she has furnished, but that all future publications of that lady, and even those already out in the original, but not yet translated, should be left to her as "her series!" Ah! that "almighty dollar" seems to reign in other hearts than those of the "Yankees."

But this preface of Mrs. Howitt, furnishes ground for still more serious charges against her. Not to mention her impotent and spiteful attempt to underrate the American translations as "abounding with Americanisms, which all well-educated persons will be careful not to introduce into their families,"* (of which "Americanisms" she adduces slads as an instance—a word which Mr. Willis shows in a recent letter to the National Intelligencer, to be English and used by

* The italics are Mrs. Howitt's.

THOMSON and FLETCHER,) she abuses them most vulgarly and unsparingly, as translations from the German translations of Miss Bremer's works. Now, will our unsophisticated American readers, who, although aware of Marryatt's and Dickens' unblushing thefts, have still some confidence in female honesty, believe their eyes, when they learn, as is palpable from a comparison of Mrs. Howitt's earlier translations of Miss Bremer's works with the German translations, that those earlier translations themselves were made by Mrs. H. from the German translations? and that, at the period of their publication, about a year before the date of this preface, Mrs. Howitt probably knew not ten words of Swedish? Yet, she says, "I have spent two years in the preparation for, and in the execution of mine [my translations]!" If this is not a "suppressio veri suggestioque falsi!" then, as one of Dickens' characters says, "the law is a ass." Indeed, judging from the number of translations she has made in the intervening year, we very much doubt if Mrs. Howitt is acquainted with the Swedish language now—and in her preface to the work before us, she nowhere distinctly states that she is, and even speaks of a "Norwegian language," while no such language exists, for the Norwegians speak Danish. We expect soon to hear that she has discovered an "American language," and meanwhile, advise her to study her own English tongue, and favor us with a list of its Americanisms.

As Mrs. Howitt is so nervous on the subject of the vested rights of "translated literature," (we presume this is a Howittism) we would respectfully inquire:

1. How much of the enormous profits, which accrue to her from her translations, does she transmit to Miss Bremer, (whom she anxiously vindicates from the charge of poverty,) as a compensation for her share of the labor in producing these works; and 2. How much did she pay the German writer, from whose translations she at first translated her translations "from the Swedish?"

THE HOME-CRITIC, A NEW LITERARY JOURNAL.

We have received the Prospectus of this Periodical, which will shortly be commenced in the City of New-York, under very favorable auspices, and will be conducted on the plan of the London Athenæum, the first journal of the kind in Europe. We notice particularly the following remarks of the Prospectus, which meet our entire and hearty concurrence.

"The people ask for a journal, not which is leagued against them by strict alliance with a bookseller's or writer's system of puffery; which is negligently, and hence, if for no other reason dishonestly conducted; but one, however plain and humble, which has manliness and independence; which is not to be bought by money or favor; which shall, week after week, with industry and fidelity, sow the seeds of generous literary culture; cherish the good fame of the established author, which is the glory of the country, and not surrender his merits to the first careless writer, who, for pique, bad personal motives, or any other unworthy cause, chooses to make him an object of attack; be the first to welcome merit in the new comer, and the last to abandon the well-tried servant."

To these principles, particularly those which we have italicised, we invite the serious attention of our readers. This is the first time, as far as we are aware, that the writers of the North have broken ground against the corrupt, debased and debasing tyranny of the publishers and their hireling journals. In this undertaking, we of the South, bid them most heartily "God speed!" As a class, the writers of the North have ever been ready to hail with pleasure, every appearance of awakening literary taste at the South, and welcome every literary effort of its sons. But it cannot be denied, that every production of a Southerner, unless published at the North, has the doors of Northern publisher's journals closed rudely in its face, and the deaf ear of hireling criticism turned to all its merits. Let this cease—let a journal be established in our literary emporium, (which New-York is fast becoming,) which, without regard to the interests of publishers, shall "be the first to welcome merit in the new comer," from the Southern press, which shall seek out our productions, (which our few publishers are too lazy, or unenterprising, or too uninitiated in the tricks of trade, to force them upon the attention of the Northern public,) which, as far as we deserve it, shall stand by us, and represent our literary interests, with an eye to the good of the whole country, and an utter disregard of sectional feelings, and the dollar and cent consciences of publishers and puff-brokers, and, our life upon it, it should and will receive an extensive and warm support from the grateful and generous South.

As Mr. N. P. Willis remarks in a recent letter to the National Intelligencer, "Cornelius Mathews, Evert Duyckink, J. T. Headly, H. Fuller, W. A. Jones, George Folsom, A. W. Bradford, H. J. Raymond, J. B. Auld," are the gentlemen who are to furnish the matter—a strong company of manly writers. I understand there is a basis of some capital, and if the plan expressed in the preface is vigorously carried out, of 'assaulting all that is untrue, relying only on the advocacy of the truth, and making war on the immoral literature that is deluging the country,' there is a wide level in which it may find room and patronage. I wish the work success with all my heart."—Nat. Intelligencer of Jan. 30th, 1844.

It will be "of the size and general appearance of the London Athenæum, in sixteen quarto pages, of three columns each, printed in the best manner, and published weekly, on Saturday morning, at five dollars a year."

A subscription-list (with the Prospectus) lies at the bookstore of Messrs. Drinker and Morris, and we hope our public will be liberal in their aid. Subscriptions are also received by the publishers, Bartlett and Welford, 8, Astor House, New-York City.

SOUTHERN QUARTERLY REVIEW for January, 1844.

We are indebted for this number not to the Agent in this city, but to a friend in Charleston; we have not yet received the October number, and would call the attention of the publishers to this neglect of their Virginia subscribers, several of whom we have heard complain, that they have not received the recent numbers. No blame, we believe, can be attached to the Agent here, as he has never received them himself.

The leading article of the present number, is a profound and able essay on the French Revolution, by President Dew of William & Mary College. The second is a critique of "Mathews' Poems on Man," by Dr. Wm. Gilmore Simms, in which he points out many defects in that very pleasing work, though he justly considers Mr. M. "one of the most promising of the rising generation of American authors," and thinks his works "will place him very high on the list of names, by which the future literary reputation of the country is to be maintained." Mr. G. F. Holmes, one of the Editors of the Review, furnishes the next article. It is an elegantly written disquisition on the present state and prospects of our Indian tribes, and has the rare merit of furnishing much new and useful information concerning an old, and, as we had imagined, a thread-bare subject. Next comes an article on the "Relations of the Ancient World," by Professor Garnet, of our own State. It gives evidence of very finished scholarship, and contains much that will interest the reader and well repay perusal. Percival's Poems, give Mr. Jackson, of Savannah, an opportunity in the next article, of discoursing in a space of thirty odd pages, on poetry in general, and though the subject is a difficult one, he has furnished a very interesting communication. The sixth and last article, is a Vindication of the character of Socrates, from the charges made by Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Mitchell and the rest of the Aristophanes clique (if we may so call them,) by President, J. L. Reynolds, of the Baptist Theological Seminary in South Carolina. A Charleston literary journal says: "it is one of the gems of the Review. We should not say gem either; to use a fancy, the questionable taste of which must be pardoned, it is one of those golden brooches—beautiful from its simplicity, which, gracefully lodged in the pages of the Review, give them that finish and unpretending elegance, characteristic of the habits and manners of the amiable author himself." The article exhibits erudition, accurate and polished scholarship, and a thorough acquaintance with the subject. Though he alludes to them, Mr. Reynolds does not seem to have had by him, the beautiful and poetical articles of M. de la Martine on the same topic, published not very long ago, in (we think) the Revue de Genève. If we recollect rightly, some French or German writer, some few years back, published an article, to show that the condemnation of Socrates was strictly "according to law" at the period: we presume it was akin to an attempt, by M. Salvador, in his Histoire des Institutions de Moïse, to establish the legality of the condemnation of our Lord (according to the Jewish law,) which called forth an indignant reply from that celebrated lawyer, the elder Dupin.

A few "Critical Notices" follow.

Before closing our notice of this very interesting number, we cannot, as lovers of our native English, pure and undefiled, avoid noticing some blemishes, which courtesy alone can consent to call slight. In President Dew's article occur such expressions as "the manner and condition on which" (p. 15), "the crowd with which he was besieged," (p. 16), "veneration and confidence in the old machinery," (p. 17). These inadvertencies occur on three consecutive pages, and, indeed, on one alone, (p. 15), we have noticed several expressions, which, to say the least, are objectionable; such as "illustrate" in the sense of render illustrious, (a gallicism, which, though sanctioned by some dictionaries, should be expelled the Saxon pale), "ardor of patronage," "the monarch exercised a power over the literary public no less despotic than over the political," "made poor Racine die" "and powers of address." We have noticed other blemishes of a similar nature in the article, but give that page merely as a specimen—not with any design of impotently attempting to underrate the great abilities of President Dew, but to solicit his attention to these little matters, which, however unimportant in themselves, give ground for one of the most annoying accusations which our English "brethren" are in the habit of bringing against us. Professor Garnet also frequently uses the word staple in the very unusual, if not obsolete signification of the German Stapel—a mart; and we dislike the use of the bastard "philologer" for the legitimate Greek "philologist"—but these are matters of taste, and we gladly recognize the Professor's right to consult his own.

ARABELLA STUART. A Romance from English History. By G. P. R. James, Esq. Harper & Brothers: New York.

This is, in our opinion, one of the best of Mr. James' novels, possessing great interest, as well from the portion of English history upon which it is based, as from the vivid delineation of the events of the time. It is likewise, in a great measure, free from that excessive minuteness of detail, which generally characterizes our author's productions, and to us, at least, is tiresome to the last degree. The Lady Arabella, and her husband, William Seymour, are finely and beautifully described. To the former indeed, full homage has been paid, and the most poetical appreciation of that lovely and unfortunate woman, must, we think, be entirely satisfied with the pure, refreshing light, which Mr. James has shed upon her private life. Her death-bed scene, is highly wrought and deeply affecting; and yet, while causing sorrow to gush from our hearts, leaves a deep impression of the abiding power of virtue and genuine religious sentiment to soothe life's last agony, and impart consolation to the bruised hearts of those, who witness the fulfilment of the inevitable decree. We are well pleased likewise, with the sketch of the honest, fearless, down-right Countess of Shrewsbury. If King "Jamie" had been surrounded by male spirits resembling her, he would probably have been a "wiser and a better man." Our limits do not permit such a criticism of this work, as its merits entitle it to. Its beauties are many, and among its few faults, is the unmitigated censure of "England's Solomon," who is described as an unredeemed embodiment of folly, gluttony, tyranny and filth. He was certainly bad enough, but "methinks, not altogether monster." We also disapprove of the exclamation put into the mouth of Seymour, foretelling the punishment to be inflicted by Almighty vengeance on the descendants of James I. "On him, and his race, shall descend the awful curse, that plagues the wicked from generation to generation." This tampering with the awful and inscrutable judgments of Deity, is not to our taste; and besides, history does not record severer punishment, nor direr misfortune to the descendants, than to the progenitors of this monarch. And lastly, we protest absolutely and unequivocally against the marriage of the faithful, devoted Ida Mara to "Old Sir Harry West," noble, virtuous and glorious old bachelor, though he was.

To our friends, Messrs. J. W. Randolph & Co, we are much indebted for a copy of this work.

The Edinburgh Presbyterian Review, an authority of the very first order, says of the work which heads the above list:

"This is not a work to be disposed of in a mere critical notice. It deserves, as we propose in our next number to give it, a more ample consideration. Had it come into our hands in sufficient time, we should have performed that office in our present number. But we cannot permit so long a period to pass by, as must necessarily elapse before we have another opportunity to address our readers, without recommending the work to all who take an interest in the question it discusses. These questions are rising in importance every day, and are destined, we are most firmly persuaded, to convulse not only Britain, but the world. * * * The present volume is one of the first fruits of the controversy in America. Mr. Smyth, with whom we became acquainted a few years ago, through the medium of his admirable 'Ecclesiastical Catechism of the Presbyterian Church,' was roused to study the controversy by the hierarchical assumptions, universally manifested by his Prelatic countrymen. * * * The work has been already most favorably received, not only among Presbyterians, but also among all other Protestant denominations in America. To this expression of high approbation, we most heartily respond. This cordial recommendation we feel very great pleasure at having the privilege to reiterate to our brethren in this country. The work is decidedly the best manual of the Prelatic controversy in its present phasis, we have had an opportunity of consulting. * * * The work before us, being a reply to works that have appeared within the present century, and principally, indeed, within the last few years, is literally a work for the 'Times.' Whoever would study the Prelatic controversy, as maintained by the most learned Prelatists of the day, let him by the next steamer order Smyth's Lectures on the Apostolical Succession. The man who possesses this work, needs no other. It is full to satiety of extracts from the most popular Prelatic publications, both Anglican and American. We shall feel ashamed of our country, or rather of our degenerate sons, if the work has not a wide circulation among us. And were we not totally ignorant of the mysteries of 'the trade,' we would recommend a large importation, to meet the very large demand, that we are sure must be made for it."

And yet, will our readers believe us, that we inquired for it in vain in the principal bookstores of Richmond a month or two ago, and no one had even heard of it? But such is the case. Our publishers and literary men, are so isolated at the South, an esprit du corps is so entirely wanting among them, that such a thing is the rule rather than the exception. Unless our booksellers do also their part, all the exertions of the Messenger and other journals, to foster Southern Literature, uphold Southern writers, and free the South from its ignorance of its own literary greatness, will be utterly in vain. This, by the way, we return to the author and his works.

Thomas Smyth, D. D., is a Presbyterian Clergyman of Charleston, S. C. Born and educated for the Church in the North of Ireland, he came to that city some eight or ten years ago, and though quite a young man, made so favorable an impression on its public, by his eloquence, learning and fervid piety, that he was chosen pastor of its largest Presbyterian Church. Amid the arduous labors of this station, he has found time to master the science of Theology, so much neglected in this country, and the Prelatical Controversy, to which his attention was directed by his position as a Presbyterian divine, has furnished him with an occasion to exhibit his own powers, raise a stupendous bulwark in defence of the citadel of his Church's polity, and reflect honor on his adopted land. The works before us, give evidence of a clear and logical mind, an acute and powerful reason, and a profundity and extent of erudition, which would be rare, even in Germany. In these works, innumerable extracts from the Fathers, and from the obscurest scholastic philosophers, are united with notices of the most recent publications and opinions on both sides of the Atlantic, and all are brought to bear in elucidating and establishing his positions. Our duty, as an exclusively literary journal, forbids our expressing an opinion on the merits of the controversy itself; but a regard for Southern Literature, a pride in the success of Southern writers, a satisfaction with our at length making preparations to contribute our due share to the literature of our common country, will justify our using such terms in speaking of works, which—though we may be, for a very short time, in advance of public sentiment in expressing such an opinion—we consider worthy to be placed alongside of those of Robinson and Stuart, and as decidedly the ablest polemical writings which our country has yet produced.

We will, in conclusion, give to our booksellers the same advice given above, by the Edinburgh Presbyterian Review, to those of Great Britain.

THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN BURNS AND CLARINDA, with a memoir of Mrs. McLehose (Clarinda.) Arranged and edited by her Grandson, W. C. McLehose. New-York, Robert P. Binby & Co.

We are not disposed to visit this little work with the severe censure, which has been bestowed upon it by one at least of our contemporaries. We think that every thing which tends to cast a new light upon the characters of distinguished men, is valuable and interesting, and there is nothing in this volume calculated to detract from the credit which Burns has always had, for enthusiastic, kind and affectionate, though often misled and wayward feelings. We presume no one could have known without loving him, and that a lady, as enthusiastic as himself, gifted too with a high poetic temperament, whose heart's young and best affections had been crushed and trampled upon by the worthless object on which they had been bestowed, should have clung to one who so deeply sympathized with her, may be very contrary to bienveillance, but it is most natural nevertheless. That the attachment thus formed, should have been pure, as it undoubtedly was, that the panoply of virtue and religion should have so effectually protected "Clarinda" from even yielding to the approach of any grosser feeling, we confess, so far from shocking our propriety, excites our admiration and respect. The lovers of Burns, will have no reason to regret the perusal of this correspondence.

Messrs. J. W. Randolph & Co., have favored us with the copy which we have noticed.

"AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON HUMAN PHYSIOLOGY on the basis of the Précis Élémentaire de Physiologie par F. Magendie. Translated, enlarged, &c. by John Revere, M. D., Professor of Theory and Practice of Medicine in the University of the City of New York. New York, Harper & Brothers, 1844."

The title page of the American Edition, announces this volume to be "especially designed for Students of Medicine" and, in our judgment, it is well adapted to their wants; for, under the existing system of Medical Education, the Student has scarcely time or opportunity to store away the principles, much less to dive to the depths of those profound researches, which have been devoted to his art, during the last quarter of a century. The work before us, is strictly what it professes to be, An Elementary Treatise, and although it cannot be elevated to the dignity of Muller's Principles or Carpenter's Human or Comparative Physiology, yet it comprises in a small compass, most of the leading experiments and facts upon which Physiology, in its present advanced condition, has been based, and constitutes, in every respect, a valuable addition to the list of Medical text books. We therefore commend it to all, who may desire to possess themselves of a general knowledge of the laws which regulate and control the human organism.

THE BOY'S AND GIRL'S LIBRARY. Edited by Mrs. Colman. Vol. IV., January, 1844—No. 1. Boston, Published by T. H. Carter & Co. New-York, Burgess and Stringer. Philadelphia, G. B. Zieber & Co. Baltimore, Wm. Taylor. Portland, George Colman.

Here is a very pleasing little Periodical, for the use of young masters and misses, and while it ranks among its contributors, such persons as the Rev. Jacob Abbott, T. S. Arthur, Mrs. L. H. Sigourney, Mrs. F. S. Osgood, O. G. Warren, Miss C. M. Sedgwick, Miss A. A. Gray, Mrs. A. J. Graves, Miss H. F. Gould and C. D. McLeod, it cannot fail to abound in excellent matter, most attractively conveyed. The prospectus to the number before us, declares, that "the character of the work will continue to be as it has been, devoted to the cultivation of the best affections of the heart, while the understanding is enriched with knowledge, and the taste improved by superior drawings and engravings."

The present number gives a fair earnest of the sincerity of this declaration; and except, that the embellishments scarcely deserve to rank among "superior" drawings and engravings, may, in every respect, be recommended to the public.

It has our best wishes for its success.

REPORT OF THE COMMENCEMENT AND PROGRESS OF THE AGRICULTURAL SURVEY OF SOUTH CAROLINA, for 1843.
By Edmund Ruffin, Agricultural Surveyor of the State.

We are indebted to the indefatigable author of this Report, for the copy now before us; and we congratulate our sister State, on the selection of a gentleman so able to conduct the important enterprise, in which she is now engaged. We do not doubt, that the results will greatly add to her already rich resources, and far surpass in value the estimates of even the most sanguine of her sons.

Mr. Joseph Gill has placed on our table the following new works:

PAGET'S VILLAGE TALES—1st, 2nd and 3rd series,
LYRA APOSTOLICA,
SUTTON'S LEARN TO LIVE,
RECTORY OF VALEHEAD,
MOTHERS OF ENGLAND; and
THE MINISTER'S FAMILY. New York, D. Appleton and Co. Philadelphia, George S. Appleton.

The last two, by Mrs. Ellis, whose literary fame is too well established to need any commendation from us. We have had no time as yet, to do more than examine the externals of these works, and confining our remarks to their appearance alone, we can speak of them as highly creditable to the publishers.

GIBBON'S DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

With Notes, by the Rev. H. H. Milman, with Maps. New York: Harper & Brothers—No. 3. To be completed in fifteen numbers.

Our friends, Messrs. J. W. Randolph & Co., have favored us with No. 3 of this work. The type clear,—the paper fair, and so cheap, that this classic is now placed within the reach of every one.

NEW LAW JOURNAL.

The "South-Western Law Journal and Reporter," is the title of a new periodical, published by Cameron and Fall, at Nashville, Tennessee, and edited by Milton A. Haynes, Esq., of the Nashville Bar. It will be issued monthly, at $2 50 per annum, and each number will contain twenty-four pages. In form and appearance, it closely resembles the Boston Law Reporter, and is evidently designed to be conducted on the plan of that eminently useful and able journal. The present number (for January, 1844) contains a great deal of useful matter in a concise form, and induces us to augur favorably of the editorial talent of Mr. Haynes and the eminent professional gentlemen who are his associates. Such journals are much needed by the profession in the South, and we cordially wish this one permanent success.

We are indebted to the Agent, Mr. Gill, for the Edinburg Review for January, 1844, (Edition of Leonard Scott & Co.)

The leading article (on Michelet's History of France) is an offering (we wish some competent hand would make it a burnt one) to the genius of Charlatanerie which, at present, presides over British Literature. The writer coolly asserts, that "the English public is not aware, that both in historical speculations, and in the importance of her historical writings, France, in the present day, far surpasses Germany!" and then proceeds in the usual flippant style of a guinea-a-page reviewer, to pass off for new—as either of his own manufacture or Michelet's—ideas concerning the Middle Ages, the democratic tendency of the Papal supremacy, etc., which, profound and brilliant as they were when new, have to us the air of such very old German acquaintances, that we have actually forgotten where we read or heard them—from Michelet, or his reviewer, we are sure we did not receive them. We have not yet had time to look over the other articles, but as every body reads the Edinburg, nobis nolentibus volentibus, we leave the number with the remark, that the British Reviews generally, are depreciating sadly.

We have received from the same gentleman, the Edinburg for October, 1843, Blackwood's Magazine for January, 1844, the Westminster Review for December, 1843, (with able articles on Lord Sydenham, and on Porson's charges against Niebuhr in his "Examen," etc. Paris, 1837,) the London Quarterly for September, 1843, and the Foreign Quarterly for October, 1843—all republished by Leonard Scott & Co. More anon.

We hasten to tender our thanks to our fair friends of THE LOWELL OFFERING, for number 4 of the 4th volume of their extremely interesting miscellany. We recommend to the lovers of Pöessy, the "Jew's Soliloquy," in which beautiful thoughts are beautifully expressed in smooth and melodious numbers. "The Mouse's Visit," is a playful impromptu, in Scottish rhythm, and contains a lesson of mercy and kindness to inferior animals, which will find a response in every feeling bosom. We heartily wish this spirited and original periodical all success.

DANGER AND DUTY; or, a few words on Popery, Puseyism, etc., by the Rev. Richard Marks. First American, from the ninth London edition. New York, 1844.

INVITATIONS TO TRUE HAPPINESS, etc., by Joel Parker. D. D., New York, 1844.

These are very beautifully printed and neatly got up editions of popular religious works, and are to be had at Mr. Gill's. We are indebted to the same gentleman for Sweethearts and Wives; or, Before and After Marriage, by T. S. Arthur. New York, 1843.

Harper and Brothers have, through Drinker and Morris, kindly sent us the following works. A word or two about Dickens will be found on a former page.

A Christmas Carol. By Charles Dickens. New York, 1844.

McCulloch's Gazetteer. Part VIII.

Kendall's Life of Andrew Jackson. No. 3.

Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Harpers' edition, No. 4.

Neal's History of the Puritans. Edited by John O. Choules, M. A. Part II.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

APRIL, 1844.

REPLY TO E. D. AND MR. SIMMS.

Though our own views as to the benefits of an International Copyright coincide with those of Mr. Simms, yet we cheerfully invite attention to the following very able and gentlemanly communication, from a writer well known to our readers. The object of the Messenger is the advancement of Truth and the real interests of AMERICAN LITERATURE; and it will always promote the liberal discussion of important questions.

We regret exceedingly that we are constrained to divide the "reply;" but this will only affect the reader's impatience to peruse the whole, and not at all the force of the argument.

[ED. MESS.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

Sir:—From two articles in your last January number on the subject of International Copyright I discover, that some of your correspondents are strenuous advocates of that measure, and defend its justice and policy by arguments similar to those which have been so clamorously reiterated by interested English authors. I should not have ventured to mingle in the controversy, had not the partisans of this legislative novelty, in a spirit of wholesale defamation, charged the American people with an obliquity of moral perception and criminal indifference to the sacred rights of property, because they have been slow to embrace a scheme fraught with the most disastrous consequences to the cause of popular education and to the interests of the American publisher. Had we been assailed only by the hungry writers and pensioned libellers of England, I should have been content to pass by such illiberal invectives as the harmless effusion of foreign ignorance, prejudice, or malice; but when a native citizen, whose accuracy and impartiality might be deemed unimpeachable, joins in the hiss of reproach, and condescends to endorse these aspersions, silence might, perhaps, be construed into an acknowledgment of guilt.

Your correspondent, E. D., does not scruple to assert, that the cheap republication of foreign books in this country is "founded in fraud and supported by injustice;" that it is a species of "robbery;" that "it is a system of piracy and plunder, a violation of the laws of national courtesy and honor."

He insinuates that those who uphold this enormity have very imperfect notions of moral honesty, and, to evince his abhorrence of such monstrous offenders in still stronger terms, declares that they should be hung up (under the authority, I suppose, of the second article of war) like other pirates to the yard-arm. Not satisfied with denouncing our moral delinquency in this particular, he seems so thoroughly imbued with the prejudices of Smith, Carlyle and Dickens, that he charges a "want of faith" as our national characteristic, and broadly intimates, that repudiation, breach of trust and embezzlement are looked on in this country as mere fashionable peccadillos—as the indications of superior genius, venial at least, if not laudable. These are hard terms and bitter reproaches which E. D. has applied so unsparingly to his countrymen, and, if true, justify to the fullest extent all the ribaldry and abuse lavished on us by the scribbling tourists of Europe. Should any American presume, hereafter, to accuse these veracious travellers of calumny and misrepresentation, they could confidently appeal to this testimony of a native writer as conclusive proof of their candor—as the strongest confirmation of their vile imputations on our national character.

It is apparent that E. D. is a scholar and a gentleman; and I am the more astonished, therefore, that he should have disfigured his pages with such odious charges and "base comparisons." Yet, in justice to your correspondent, I am persuaded that he does not intend to be understood, as his language would import, to allege a general depravity of moral sentiment in the American people, and his gross vituperation should be received rather as the rhetorical declamation of an advocate striving to sustain his cause, than as the deliberate censure of a calm and dispassionate inquirer. The refusal or failure of some of the States to provide for the payment of their public debt, the frequent instances of speculation and embezzlement among us during a few past years would seem, indeed, to substantiate one part of his indictment against the honor and good faith of Americans. No one laments more than I do these disgraceful occurrences, or has beheld them with sensations of deeper mortification.

cation. They have been the consequence of a period of unbridled speculation and unexampled pecuniary pressure, which, in all countries, have been the fruitful parents of fraud and crime. Witness the relaxation of morals which pervaded England after the South Sea scheme, and France after the explosion of Law's Mississippi project. On such occasions the designing are unmasked and the weak perverted by the force of strong temptation, while the great mass of society remains untouched by the prevailing contagion. The corruption is only superficial and temporary, and will be speedily cleansed and healed by the native vigor of our moral constitution. Your correspondent will surely allow, that the great body of our people are sound and detest, as much as he does, these shameful examples of public and private profligacy. In the sequel we shall see whether E. D. is warranted, either by reason or justice, in denouncing the people of the United States as false to the claims of honor and good faith, because they have not surrendered to the taunts and importunities of English writers the boon of International Copyright. For myself, I shall not be deterred by the "argument of epithet" from vindicating our government in its determination to be neither bullied nor cajoled into the adoption of a system, the policy of which, to say the best of it, is problematical.

The temper of E. D. and your other correspondent, Mr. Simms, in their animadversions on the conduct of our people towards foreign authors, though they evidently coincide in their general conclusions, is widely different. Indeed the latter, in his elegant essay, manifests a spirit so exclusively national, that he deems our political enfranchisement but half accomplished so long as we are dependent on Britain for our literary nourishment, and insists that we shall remain in a state of mental vassalage, scarcely less galling than colonial subjection, until we succeed in building up a domestic literature, peculiar and distinctive. He seems to apprehend, that British books will corrupt our taste and poison the fountains of public sentiment—to imagine, that the constant dissemination of her numerous publications among us is the result of a systematic scheme in the mother country to "make us a subject people, to suppress thinking, to throw every impediment in the way of knowledge, and to perpetuate her tyranny over American industry by paralyzing the original energies of American genius." I confess I cannot perceive what bearing these propositions, admitting their truth, or the other facts and reasonings advanced by Mr. Simms, have upon the question of International Copyright; though their connexion with that subject will, probably, be explained in his promised inquiry into the causes of the present languishing state of our literature. On the first impression I would conclude, that International Copyright, so far from being a panacea for the evils so forcibly depicted by your eloquent correspondent, would, on the contrary, place British writers on the vantage-ground in their fancied warfare on American genius, by ceding to the enemy the stronghold of a monopoly in our own literary market.

The conspiracy of English authors against our mental independence, which your correspondent professes to have detected, is, I am sure, a mere figment of the imagination. Mr. Simms is a poet, and exercises the usual license of his craft in "giving to airy nothing a local habitation and a name." In the prosecution of such a design as he imputes to the writers of England, concerted action among so great a multitude would be totally impracticable, and that very difficulty must demonstrate, that a scheme so preposterous would never be undertaken. It were a strange method, indeed, "to suppress thinking, to paralyze the original energies of American genius" by supplying us with the best treatises on every possible subject, with the finest specimens of poetry and fiction, with the purest models of human composition. Such a plan could only succeed on the hypothesis, that education weakens the understanding; that cultivation corrupts the taste; that the most effectual mode of destroying thought is to supply abundant materials for thinking. We can conceive of no motive for so singular a project but to establish a political ascendancy, and for such purposes it would be utterly futile. As well tie Sampson with a thread, as hope to fetter the infant giant of America with these slender and fantastic ligaments. Our history, since the revolution, exhibits no indication of an abject reverence for British maxims. Instead of halting with cautious timidity in the rear of European precedent, we have advanced with a daring and confident step in the career of improvement, acknowledging no guide but reason, and discussing the lessons of past times as well as the example of other nations in a spirit of bold and liberal inquiry. Let this phantom then, which, if it were real, is powerless for mischief, no longer haunt Mr. Simms' imagination. The American mind is not of that texture to be daunted, or subdued by mere paper artillery. That a gentleman of Mr. Simms' sagacity should have been betrayed into so wild a theory is a fact, which I can only account for by the propensity of all speculative minds to disdain what is obvious, and to refer to some deep and recondite cause the solution of the most ordinary phenomena.

When Mr. Simms insists so strenuously on the importance of native literature as a means of effecting our complete intellectual emancipation, I infer from the tenor of his remarks, that he desires it to assume a peculiar anomalous character, specifically distinguished from that of every other nation. If this be his meaning, I must be permitted to dissent from such a view of the subject. Is there not danger, should we venture upon a new and untried path, that, as we deviate from the great English models, we shall depart from nature and good taste! In striving to be original may we not produce an uncouth monster, half woman, half fish; an object not of admiration but of derision and disgust! But if, on the other hand, he wishes American literature to receive its form and pressure from English classics, to imbibe their spirit and reflect their image, while I readily subscribe to the reasonableness of such a sentiment, I must avow my utter inability to comprehend the source of his morbid jealousy of British dictation. I shall not deny that the creation of an American literature is a great desideratum, and I devoutly believe that, in the fullness of time, that literature is destined to attain a glorious maturity, even though cheap books should continue to multiply, and International Copyright be consigned with other crude projects to the gulf of oblivion. It does not follow, because we waste the midnight oil in the study of those exquisite specimens of human genius furnished by the mother country in our common tongue, that we are yet in mental leading strings, or that the American mind is dormant, because in the turmoil of business we have not time to compose books. As the wilderness is subdued, cities grow up, wealth and population are augmented, more men will have leisure to write, and many will be driven by the competition in other pursuits to devote themselves to science and letters as a means of subsistence. This revolution has already begun, and the day-spring of American literature is now dawning with every prospect of a brilliant meridian.

By tracing the course of the discussion in reference to International Copyright, the motives which have kindled such a fiery and intolerant zeal among its trans-Atlantic advocates, may be easily decyphered. The unexampled growth of our country in wealth and population, the general spread of education among our people, and their insatiable appetite for new publications, amounting almost to a mania, have given birth to the greatest literary market in the world. The cupidity of English writers has been awakened by the prospect of engrossing this vast market, and hence their animosity against every man who has the hardihood to question the validity of their claims to such a lucrative monopoly, their furious denunciation of the cheap republication of their works in this country as another, and more aggravated form of literary piracy, and their labored efforts to assimilate the rights of authors to other forms of property. This clamor is of recent date. The great writers of the last generation, though the demand here for foreign books was even then immense, raised no such question—uttered no complaint, because we had not found it convenient, or politic to admit them to the privileges of Copyright. The gains of literary labor were to them a secondary and subordinate consideration; and they were justly flattered by the homage of a distant and enlightened nation to the cherished offspring of their genius, since it gave a foretaste of that posthumous reputation which was the ultimate goal of their ambition. They felt like Milton, when he sold the Copyright of Paradise Lost for the paltry sum of twenty pounds, that fame should not be weighed against pecuniary emolument; that the noblest recompense of intellectual effort consists in the contemplation of its beneficent effects, and in the grateful applauses of mankind. In this calculating age, literary ambition has assumed an opposite direction. Quærenda pecunia primum, fama post nummos is now the prevailing maxim. Men of the first abilities, content with a transient popularity, expend their great powers on the production of ephemera, destined, like insects, to perish in the passing hour. Haste and prolixity—formerly condemned as faults, are held in the highest esteem at a time, when the desideratum is to produce in the shortest space the largest quantity of light, flimsy, fugitive stuff, which, brought to the alembic of just criticism, would dwindle to the most insignificant dimensions, yielding scarce a pennyworth of useful thought to this enormous bulk of materials. In truth, book-making has been converted into a trade, a manufacture, in which quantity is regarded more than quality, and profit more than fame. It was natural, therefore, that your correspondent, E. D. should be struck with a resemblance between the productions of mind and the humble efforts of a butcher or tailor, since, now-a-days, the operatives in these opposite departments are governed by the same principles of action.

The notion, that the rights of authors, as defined by the new school of Dickens and Carlyle, rest on the same principles of natural right with property in general, and should in justice be placed upon the same footing, has never been recognized by any government in practice, and, if pursued to its legitimate results, involves the most startling conclusions; though E. D. contends that, to deny it, would be "to strike at the root of all intellectual labor, and to make the very existence of Copyright a continued injustice." A book, or a manuscript, which an individual has printed, or written, undoubtedly belongs to him, and he may refuse to publish, or impart it in any form, till he has been paid his price; and this was the only ownership which the ancients asserted in their works, when they sold copies to be transcribed or recited. When they had been recited, or published, and were thus incorporated into the mass of general knowledge, the ancients claimed no further property in their contents, nor considered it any breach of right in those who had heard, or read them, to appropriate their thoughts or language. Modern governments have gone a step farther, and secured to authors a temporary and exclusive property, not only in the original copy of their writings, but, to some extent, in the words and ideas they contain; and this limited right is to continue even after publication. The position of the friends of International Copyright is, that this artificial ownership, thus cautiously limited, is not a mere contrivance of policy, but is analogous in all its features and incidents to other descriptions of property, and founded like them in the paramount laws of nature and justice.

Property in things tangible, in the fruits of bodily labor is not, according to the theory of the best writers on natural jurisprudence, a mere conventional arrangement. It results from the very constitution of human nature, and must have appertained to man in all conditions, whether antecedent, or subsequent to the formation of civil society. As cupidity is one of the strongest passions of mankind, this right, more than other natural rights, would have been peculiarly liable to the assaults of rapacious violence, because it would have presented irresistible temptations to lawless and unprincipled marauders, prone to indulge their covetous and indolent propensities at the expense of the weak and defenceless; and hence the desire to secure it must have formed the principal inducement to the first establishment of regular government. Being founded on those immutable principles of justice, acknowledged by the whole human race, the State was bound to guaranty its undisturbed enjoyment, to shield the possession of the owner against the encroachments of fraud, or force. In all civilized communities, therefore, property has been fenced round with every legal sanction, and fortified by the terrors of punishment. If Copyright derives its origin from the same source, it is entitled to the same ample securities. To seize on and appropriate it by stealth, or violence, without the consent of the owner, would be moral theft, or robbery, and should be visited by the same infamous chastisement. And yet such a crime is unknown to any penal code, and, so far as I know, not even hinted at as a hypothetical improvement in the speculations of Beccaria, or the codifications of Bentham.

Those who affirm that an author has an inherent property in his writings at all times and in all places, do not mean to confine that property to the mere paper and packthread, the gilt letters and Russia leather; for no one disputes his title to these visible objects, when they are either the work of his own industry, or purchased with his own resources. The proposition is, doubtless, intended to have a much wider signification. It is designed to embrace the language, and, more especially, the thoughts, without which words are "mere sound and fury signifying nothing." These, the fruit of patient research and meditation, give a distinctive character to every book and constitute its chief value as a source of amusement, or instruction. The essence then, the substratum of all literary property consists in the thoughts of an author, and, if these could naturally be converted into property, it would be a matter of perfect indifference whether they were recorded in books, or imparted in public speeches, or private discourse. In whatever form they were embodied, they would still remain the subject of an absolute, unqualified ownership, which it would be criminal to invade, or violate, and which it would be, not only the province, but the imperative duty of civil government to protect. A man would be entitled, on this hypothesis, not only to the immediate usufruct of his own conceptions, but to every remote and incidental advantage to be derived from them. They are his by a title as certain and indubitable as his horse, his land, or any tangible possession; and no one has a right to use these for any purpose without his consent. Such are the attributes of all other property, and, if Copyright belongs to the same category, it must partake of the same qualities and incidents. If this doctrine be well-founded, then plagiarism should be stigmatized as felony, and even to use, or repeat the thoughts of another without any improper design should expose the person so offending to a civil action for the recovery of damages. Innocence of intention would avail nothing in the defence of such an action, because, to appropriate the property of our neighbor to our own convenience, or profit, for a single instant, knowing it to be his and without his permission, is, in strictness, a breach of his rights, and he is entitled to reparation commensurate to the extent of the injury. Neither could the defendant in such a case be allowed to plead, that he had made the plaintiff's thoughts his own by clothing them in new language and enforcing them by original illustrations; for he would be told that no disguise could change the intrinsic nature of the thing—that a thought, however transformed by the artifices of diction, or enveloped in rhetorical ornament, continues the property of the first inventor till divested by his own voluntary alienation.

But it may be alleged that, before the author of any new idea can complain of its wrongful appropriation by others, or reclaim it as his individual property, he must announce his title to the world, and fix his mark upon it by some unequivocal act, such as the publication of a book; that, otherwise, the first comer may seize it as a waif and apply it to his own use without the imputation of fraud, or injustice. Is it not manifest from this very distinction, that the supposed analogy between the productions of mental labor and other property is wholly illusory? Under what system of law does the security of human possessions depend on either a formal, or constructive proclamation of title to the wrong doer? And is not the fraudulent appropriation of the goods of another, with a felonious intent, theft in the eye of reason and by the principles of every penal code, though the owner of the stolen property be unknown? But if thoughts be property, surely that property can be asserted and made known in some other mode, than by the publication of a book. When a new idea is imparted either in public or private discourse, what hinders its author, at the very moment of its utterance, from making continual claim to the exclusive use and benefit of the conception, from protesting against any implied waiver of his rights in behalf of his audience? Such a notification would be less liable to misconstruction than even the act of printing, and would effectually repel the presumption of an abandonment of title. On the principles of those who maintain the resemblance between Copyright and other kinds of property, it is a necessary deduction, that this right, thus proclaimed and insisted on, is as clearly founded in natural justice and as much entitled to the protection of the civil magistrate, as the vaunted claim of an author to the profits of his writings.

Let us examine the soundness of this new-found analogy between Copyright and the other forms of property by another test. It is contended, that the rights of authors originate in the same abstract principles of justice with other human possessions—that, therefore, governments are under the same fundamental obligation to recognize and protect them—and that the indelible stigma of fraud and dishonesty is branded upon those who neglect, or refuse to fulfil this paramount duty. It follows from these premises, that they should be held by the same tenure, governed by the same rules with other property—that they should be modified or abridged by no considerations of expediency—divested only by the voluntary alienation of the owner—not even forfeited on the overruling plea of state necessity without adequate compensation. Concede that they derive their validity from the same source with other human possessions, and you are bound to ensure their perpetuity; for justice is inflexible, and will not be content with a partial satisfaction. In this view, to secure the rights of authors for ten, or twenty years, for any limited period of time, falls infinitely short of their equitable claims, and, to parody one of E. D.'s graphic illustrations, a state, acting on this niggard policy, resembles one of those courteous robbers, who, after stripping the unfortunate traveller of his all, generously refunds a sufficiency to defray the expenses of his journey.

In every country with whose history I am acquainted, where literary property has a legal existence, that existence is restrained to a space of time, longer, or shorter, according to the caprice, or the policy of the legislator. Nowhere has it been admitted as a claim of right, or put upon the same footing, in point of character, or extent, with other possessions. And yet, who has been heard to complain of this statutory limitation as an act of imperfect justice? to insist that the duration of Copyright should be perpetual? Even in England, where his claim of right has been first set up, it was solemnly adjudged, as far back as 1774, by the highest legal tribunal of that country in the case of Donaldson vs. Becket, that, at common law, an unwritten code, professing to embody the principles of natural justice and reason so far as those principles can be reconciled to the artificial constitution of society, an author has no exclusive Copyright in his writings, and holds only a temporary interest in them under the authority of statutes. Had an opposite principle been decided in that memorable case, it would have followed, that by the common law of England and of this country, which is essentially the same system, Copyright was perpetual; that it must be subject to the same rules and guarded by the same sanctions with other property. No statute would have been required to establish, or protect the rights of authors, either foreign or domestic; for, the moment that the common law recognized them as property, that beneficent and comprehensive code would have extended its ample shield over them in all places and provided adequate remedies to prevent, or compensate their infraction. Yet, if those rights rested, in truth, on the same original principles with property in general, the decision in Donaldson vs. Becket was undoubtedly erroneous and subversive of natural right and justice.

If the right of men to the exclusive use and application of their own conceptions had, in the origin of society, been placed on the same footing, in point of security and duration, with property in the fruits of bodily labor, and in tangible possessions, it is obvious, that such a system would have fettered the energies of the human mind, and interposed insuperable barriers to the progress of knowledge. Every great achievement of intellect has been the result of combined effort, of the united resources of many minds coöperating in the accomplishment of the same enterprise. Trace the history of any valuable improvement in art, or science, and you will find that it was not a sudden inspiration, an intuitive perception, a mere accident; but that the author was conducted progressively to the point of discovery by the vestiges of previous adventurers in the same path of speculation; that the obscurity in which some important truth was involved had been gradually dispelled by successive flashes of intellectual light, until the electric spark of genius had at length revealed it in the blaze of perfect day. It is because mental acquisitions have been regarded in all ages as a common fund for the benefit of our race, that philosophic research has penetrated so deeply the hidden secrets of nature, and guided benevolent effort to such brilliant triumphs in the career of moral and social reform. Let the domain of thought be parcelled out and appropriated, and you confine each individual within his own narrow circle; you throw him back on his own scanty resources, unaided by the exhaustless stores of knowledge accumulated by the labors of his fellow men. On this system he would be debarred from the use of any moral, or political truth, of any invention, or improvement in art, or science, in short, of every production of genius, which he could not claim as his own by actual purchase, or by the right of original discovery; for I defy the most subtle and ingenious advocate of Copyright to distinguish, on the principles of natural justice, between property in thoughts promulgated in books and thoughts orally communicated. Had Newton, or Leibnitz, claimed perpetual and exclusive ownership in the differential calculus, and converted that invention into an instrument of gain, the miracles wrought by the agency of that splendid conception would, instead of embellishing the history of the past age, have been postponed to some distant epoch in the depths of futurity. But, to present a still more striking illustration, let us imagine for a moment, that the use of the Novum Organon, or the Principia had been trammelled by the fetters of a perpetual Copyright, is it not probable, that modern philosophy, deprived of free access to these great works, would have been still groping in the obscure unprofitable subtleties of scholastic disputation?

Perhaps, to elude the force of this reasoning, it will be said that the friends of copyright, admitting that the argument of inconvenience is conclusive against its unlimited extension, are content to give such a brief and transitory existence to that franchise as may promote the advancement of literature without compromising the great interests of society. The ground of justice, of its having the same root in natural right with property in general, must then be abandoned. Expediency can never enter into the discussion of a just claim except with those who make utility the basis of all moral obligation.

The moral duty of governments to provide a recompense for literary labor is sometimes referred to a different sentiment. It is said, that we owe a debt of gratitude to the great men, whose invaluable works have contributed to our amusement and instruction, and that the most appropriate mode of evincing our sense of their services, of ensuring them an ample remuneration, is to give them a legal property in their writings. It is obvious that this view of the subject assigns to Copyright a very different origin from other property; for our duty to acknowledge the claims of a benefactor is of a complexion altogether distinct from our obligation to reimburse the services of a common laborer. If we refuse to comply with the one, we violate the plainest dictates of honesty; if we fail in the other, we may be called ungrateful, but are scarcely chargeable with injustice, or breach of faith. Gratitude is a refined and elevated sentiment, and it is repugnant to the delicacy, as well as degrading to the dignity of that virtue to confine its exercise to a sordid traffic of pecuniary advantages. It is a tribute which we owe to a benefactor, not because of the magnitude of the benefits conferred by him, but mainly on account of the benevolence of his motives. None is due to him whose aid is prompted, not by kindness, but by selfish and mercenary views. I am indebted to the butcher and the tailor for food and raiment, but when I purchase those necessary commodities, it will hardly be pretended that I am bound by any ties of gratitude to those useful craftsmen. In like manner, when the principal incentive of an author is pecuniary emolument, whatever may be the ability, or usefulness of his writings, the selfishness of the motive cancels the claim, which he might otherwise prefer to the gratitude of mankind. The great luminaries of science and literature have not been actuated in the production of their immortal works by such narrow and grovelling considerations. Though not insensible to the movements of personal interest, those illustrious men were governed by nobler impulses. Ambition, that "last infirmity of noble minds," the love of fame, the general good were their ruling principles of action, and to suppose them so covetous of gain as to prefer their own profit to the improvement of their species, is to disparage the purity of their motives and to pluck from them the brightest chaplet that adorns their brows. At the most, gratitude between man and man constitutes what, by the definition of ethical writers, is called an imperfect obligation, a mere voluntary and spontaneous tribute enforced by no system of jurisprudence; and if such claims are in their nature so vague and indeterminate, that no legislator has deemed them the proper subject of judicial interference in the relations of private life, their force is infinitely weakened in reference to governments, charged with the happiness and well-being of multitudes, and which, from the very objects of their institution, are bound to act in subserviency to the interests of the governed.

Some things, such as air and light, are essentially incapable of permanent appropriation, and have, therefore, never been considered the proper subject of ownership. In some of their characteristics the operations of mind resemble these indispensable supports of physical life. They are too subtle, too diffusive, too easily transmitted to be fixed in one spot, to be imprisoned within definite boundaries; and as they furnish aliment to the moral and spiritual world, the wise Creator of the universe seems to have designed them as the common heritage of our race. The air and light, which enter our dwellings dispensing warmth, vitality and comfort to the inhabitants, are ours so long as they remain within those peculiar limits, and no one can disturb us in their possession and enjoyment without an infraction of our rights; but when they are restored to the general circulation of those elements, the whole human family are entitled to an equal participation in their benefits.

In like manner every man may claim the exclusive use and enjoyment of his private thoughts and speculations, so long as they are confined to his own bosom and are subject to his control; but when, by his own voluntary communication, they mingle with the great mass of knowledge, they are no longer susceptible of individual appropriation. He may refuse to impart them without a pecuniary equivalent; but the veil of secrecy once withdrawn on whatever motive, his hold on them is forever relinquished, and they become the universal property of all mankind. It may, indeed, be deemed expedient, in the artificial arrangements of society, to carve out of these common blessings a temporary ownership for individuals; but to make that ownership perpetual would be treason against the laws of nature and a tyranny which no community could tolerate.

ISABELLE.

BY HENRY B. HIRST.

(Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1844, by Henry B. Hirst, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.)

A lustrous maid was Isabelle,
And quiet as a brooding bird;
She never thought of passion's spell—
Of love she never heard;
But in her lonely chamber sat,
Sighing the weary hours away,
From morn 'till fitting of the bat
Around the turrets grey;
And trembling with a strange unrest,
A yearning for—she knew not what;
She only knew her heaving breast
Was heavy with its lot.
And so she spent her maiden days,
With neither heart to laugh nor sing—
With neither heart for earthly ways,
Nor hope from earthly thing;
But lived, a being wrapt in dreams
Of passion and of Paradise—
An earthly one! lit up by gleams
Beaming from heavenly eyes.
At last she passed to womanhood,
And sat her down on Beauty's throne,
A statue, with a beating heart
Beneath a breast of stone.
And then a blue-eyed page there came
Smiling along her lonely way;
And Isabelle was all aflame
And wild as bird in May.

Her lustrous eyes grew large with love,
Her cheeks with passion flushed and bright;
Her lips, whereon no bee might rove
Undrunk with delight,

Were ever apart and jewelled o'er
With diamonds of nectarian dew;
Her fair and faultless features wore
A spiritual hue;

Her step grew certain with the firm,
Full knowledge she had past the night
Of woman's life, and reached the term,
Where, henceforth, all was light.

She felt she had not lived in vain,
She saw the Eden of her dreams
Close round her, and she stood again
Beside its silver streams.

The seed of love God's hand had sown
With life, within her human soul,
Had swollen to leaf and, sudden, grown
Beyond her will's control—

Grown to a tall and stately tree,
Whose shadows fell (as sun-beams fall)
Upon her life, and she was free
From sorrow's solemn thrall.

She sighed no more at even-tide,
She sighed no more at night or morn,
She knew not in the world so wide
A single thing forlorn.

And ever she sung her lightest lays,
And never she shed a single tear;
But roamed about in woodland ways
As merry as the deer.

Her father watched her as she passed,
And said, her mother's step was there;
Her mother's features in her glassed;
She had her mother's hair.

The servants followed her with their eyes,
And prayed the virgin, that her hours
Might ever pass under azure skies,
And o'er parterres of flowers.

But shadows fall from angel wings,
And happiest moments welcome woe;
No joy is born but brings its stings,
And nought is bliss below.

Her father, wrapped in study's spell,
At last awoke, and saw the change
That time had wrought in Isabelle,
And thought it passing strange.

And instant out he called his train,
And forth, with hawk and bound, at noon
He rode, and when he came again
There came Prince Ethelrune—

Prince Ethelrune, a knight whose fame
Shone ever fairest in field or hall,
Came circled with his shining name
At lady's feet to fall.

He wooed the maid with courtly word,
And sought her bower with royal pride,
And said, with pain the lady heard,
He sought her as his bride.

And Isabelle rose like the moon
And bent the full light of her eyes
Upon the kneeling Ethelrune,
And, sighing, bade him rise.

"My hand," said she, "I may not keep;
My heart, sir knight, is not my own;
And 'till in Abbey-vault I sleep,
It owns but one alone.

"And, as thou art an honest knight,
Strive not my plighted faith to move;
Thy hand may clasp another's right,
But cannot grasp my love.

"No! choose a better—nobler part;
My true knight and my brother be,
And let a sister's loving heart
Beat in my breast for thee."

The gentle knight arose and said,
"Lady, I kiss thy snowy hand;
The maiden loth, I would not wed
The noblest in the land.

"And tell me, who is he so blest
With love that I would die to win;
For be he knight of noteless crest,
Or princely paladin,

"In hall or field to none I'll yield
A sovran's right to bear him on,
Until his lip his love has sealed
On thine, and thou art won."

"A noble knight," said she, "art thou!
Our Lady's blessing on thy head!
And had I never plighted vow
None other would I wed.

"A simple page, my love is hight,
But fair; and braver than the best
That bears on high in knightly fight
An unattainted crest!"

"A simple page!" the lover said;
"Why Lady, this can never be!
A maid like thee may never wed
A man of mean degree!"

"But I will make thy page a knight,
And forth beside me he shall go
And gather glory in the fight
From crest of Paynim foe.

"And I will give him house and land,
And shape his rank to favor thine,
And then, together ye shall stand
Before the sacred shrine."

The lady raised her azure eyes,
Like violets, gleaming with the dew
Of glistening tears, and said, with sighs,
"I yield my fate to you."

"Then bring the page, for I would see
The lover, who hath won so well
Despite her haught and high degree,
The Lady Isabelle!"

The merry-hearted maid is gone;
The noble knight in sorrow stands;
For well he loves the dove-like one
He yields to other hands.

But little time he had for woe—
The sound of gentle footsteps fell
Upon his ears, and smiling, lo!
The page and Isabelle!

And now he stands in mute amaze,
And now he drops his wondering eyes
As though afraid again to gaze
On what before him lies.

Up spake the page, "it is no dream;
Brother, I am a thing of earth;
And, Lady, not the churl I seem,
But one of lofty birth."

Then quoth the Prince in merry glee,
"Sure Fortune never smiled so well
On maiden as she has on thee,
Sweet sister Isabelle!"

SONNET FROM PETRARCH.

"GLI OCCHI DI CH'IO PARLAI SI CALDAMENTE."

BY MARY G. WELLS.

The lovely eyes that once I praised with pride,
The arms, the hands, the fairy feet, the face
Whose beauty drew me from myself, aside,
A separate one from others of my race;
The wavy curls of pure and shining gold,
The lightning of the sweet and seraph smile
Which made this heart a Paradise of old,
Are senseless dust; and yet I live the while;
Yes! I still live, from which I grieve, and scorn
To stay without the light I loved so long
In prosperous days, or when my bark was torn;—
My amorous strains I can no more prolong;
The fount whence flowed my genius dry appears:
My harp is turned to wailing and to tears.

THE DOOM OF THE CHILDREN.

BY WM. OLAND BOURNE.

MEMBER OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE,

Corresponding Member of the National Institute for the promotion of Science, Washington, D. C.; Cor. Mem. Natural History Society of Montreal, Montreal, Canada East; of the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec, U. E., &c., &c.

"The practice of employing children only six and seven years of age to work in mines is almost universal, and there are no short hours for them. The children go down with the men usually at four o'clock in the morning, and remain in the pit between eleven and twelve hours." "I could not conceive of circumstances more prejudicial to animal existence than shutting up a little child throughout the day in subterraneous confinement at the very period when light and air are as necessary to its growth as to a young and tender plant." "The use of a child of six years of age is to open and shut one of the doors or traps in the galleries which are used to prevent the ingress or egress of inflammable air. The child is trained to sit in a dark gallery, and is literally in the dark during the whole of its confinement. It is impossible to imagine a more monotonous and dismal occupation for a child; yet I was told the child was not unhappy, although 'they did fret a good deal at first.' The truth is, that by blunting the sensibilities and deadening the faculties, the mind may be rendered callous to a lot which would otherwise be too bitter for human endurance."—"Notes and Observations," &c., by W. E. Hickson, Esq.

"I found assembled around a fire a group of men, boys, and girls, some of whom were of the age of puberty, the girls as well as the boys stark naked down to the waist, their hair bound up with a tight cap, and trousers supported by the hips. Their sex was recognisable only by their breasts, and some little difficulty occasionally arose in pointing out to me which were girls and which were boys. In the Flotten and Thornhill pits it is even more indecent; at least three-fourths of the men for whom they hurry are entirely unclothed, or with a flannel waistcoat only."—J. C. Symons, Esq., Report, §iii, et seq.: App. pt. i, pp. 181-2.

"When the nature of this horrible labor is taken into consideration, its extreme severity, its regular duration of twelve to fourteen hours daily, the unwholesome atmosphere of a coal mine, and the tender age and sex of the workers, a picture is presented of deadly physical oppression and systematic slavery, of which I conscientiously believe no one unacquainted with the facts, would credit the existence in the British dominions."—S. S. Scriven, Evidence, 48, p. 383.

"The children are called up at all hours of the night when the lace machines are at work; they are generally at work twenty hours per day; when they give over at eight o'clock on Saturday night, they lose of course four hours that day, then that is made up by their being worked the whole of the night on the Friday night."—Evidence before the Select Committee on the Mills and Factories. Testimony of Mr. Bury, Question 3321-23.

"Mrs. Houghton, Walker Street, New Trenton, is a lace drawer and has four children—Harriet, eight years; Anne, six; Mary, four, and Eliza, two years old; of these, the three older are lace-drawers. Harriet was not quite three when she began to work, Anne was about the same, and Mary was not quite two years old."—W. Grainger's Report; quoted by Charlotte Elizabeth.

Eliza Baff, aged fifteen:—"Never heard of Jesus Christ; never heard the name; never heard of our Saviour; never says any prayers; does not know one."

Henry Ward, near seventeen:—"Does not know how many disciples there were; does not know who Jesus Christ was; thinks he was an apostle; they don't learn the Catechism here; else he could tell about him, but thinks he was a King of some kind of London, a long time ago."

It is said that St. Gregory was passing through the Slave markets of Rome, one day, when he saw some children of great beauty who were set up for sale; he inquired who they were, and finding them to be English Pagans, he is said to have cried out, "NON ANGOLI, SED ANGELI FORENT, SI ESSENT CHRISTIANI!" "They would not be English but Angels if they were Christians!"

Mr. Horne says—"Many of the children told me they always said their prayers at night, and the prayer they said was 'Our Father.' I naturally thought they meant that they repeated the Lord's Prayer, but I soon found that few of them knew it. They repeated only the two first words they knew no more than 'Our Father.'"

There is an island in the sea

Where loveliest things the eye allure,
And like to Dreamland seems to be,
Where joy inhales the ether pure;
The flowing stream or gentle rill
Glides smooth or murmurs on its way,
Whose peaceful bosom fair and still
Receives the light of every ray.

There beauty in her rich attire
'Mid sparkling gems awakes her tone,
Or sweeps with gentle touch the lyre
To make Euterpe's gift her own,
And scenes of pleasure cast around
The dulcet strains of rapturous joy;
Where not one sorrow can be found
The sweet illusion to destroy:
The flashing eye delights to beam
In answer to a thousand smiles,
And sweetest oft becomes the dream
That woos the spirit with its wiles,
While Art expends her richest power
To grace the scene with lavish skill,
And 'mid the witchery of the hour
The cup of flowing nectar fill.

There Science takes her lofty flight,
And catches truth from earth and heaven,
And pours around her peerless light
Which seems exhaustless to be given;
There Truth unveils her richest springs
Whose sparkling waters glide along,
Where Fancy tips her airy wings
And soars aloft on pinions strong;
A thousand temples greet the eye
With lofty dome or glittering spire,
And seem to touch the azure sky
To bring to earth celestial fire,
And on their altars kindle there
The sweetest incense man can bring,
A type of praise and holy prayer
And heartfelt tributes that they bring;
There Faith reveals her radiant form
Baptised in glory in the sky,
And sent to earth amid the storm
Which Error ever welcomes nigh;
There touched with Heaven's resistless power
She warbles forth angelic strains,
And sheds a splendor on the hour

When man her sweetest gift obtains ;
 There Love enkindled from on high
 Pours forth her harmony of heaven,
 And hymns perpetual melody
 From Spirit-tongues to mortals given ;
 And Faith, and Love, and holy Truth
 Look up with eyes of pure Desire,
 And joying in perennial youth,
 String Hope's own silvery, chosen lyre.

But hark ! I hear a shriek of pain !
 Whence comes the sound ? and can it be
 This happy island in the Sea
 Sends forth this echo to its strain ?
 Aye ! turn thy feet from glittering halls,
 To see where sorrow ever falls—
 Where one long, deep, unbroken wail,
 Which sends its piercing to the gale,
 Reveals the vast, remorseless wrong
 That withers both the weak and strong.

Did ye not see an abject thing
 That shuddered as ye passed it by,
 And scarcely seemed to life to cling,
 Scarce spoke its misery with a sigh ?
 Did ye not see the hollow eye
 That spoke through tears of bitter pain
 A mute appeal, addressed in vain
 For aid and pity ere he die ?

There is an island in the Sea
 Whose glory fills the world with song,
 Whose most commanding pageantry
 Is gained by deep and speechless wrong ;
 And while the nation's heart is stirred
 With swelling songs, there may be heard
 A mournful, bitter undertone
 Of millions in a fearful moan,
 Which bears along the swelling sigh
 And long-drawn curse of agony !

Whence is its greatness ? Ask the grave,
 And let its slaughtered millions speak,
 Or plunge beneath the rolling wave
 And listen to the gurgling shriek ;
 Go, get the skeletons and spread
 Upon the field the countless dead,
 Then rear them in a towering pile
 And sing of greatness all the while
 Ye build the crumbling pyramid,
 In which entombed their glories lie ;
 Give Truth its tongue to speak amid
 This scene of fearful irony !

Whence is its greatness ? Ask the child
 That drags along its tearful way—
 And is in being's dawn defiled
 With sin's companionship each day ;
 "Greatness ! What is it ? I don't know !
 The great lord owns the pits below—
 The children work the livelong day
 And ne'er behold the sunny ray—
 The great sun shines, but not on me—
 The great God speaks, but not to me—
 The bright stars shine, but not for me—
 The happy spring does not cheer me—
 The great lord only is so grand,
 He drives his coach about the land :
 There's a great book, I've heard 'em say,
 That good folk read in every day,
 And tells a story about one

They call the Saviour's Lord's own son*—
 He died upon the cross to save,
 Our Saviour from the great, deep grave ;†
 But learnt folk never tells to me
 What great things in the world there be ;
 But I have heard there's one great place
 Where we shall see him face to face,
 And the great God lives there to count
 How many steps the children mount
 When we go 'hurryin' all the day,
 And drag our 'trams' along the way.
 But will He ever come to see
 In the dark coal-pits where we be,
 How many hours we toil and weep,
 And how the great lord breaks our sleep ?
 He is 'our Father' just as well
 As the great lords' of which they tell ;
 And don't He look all down the pit
 When the poor children work in it ?
 Or count how many tears we cry
 When aching on our straw we lie—
 And don't they say we shall be blest
 And we shall have a good, long rest,
 Up in His bosom by-and-by ?"

Oh ! could ye witness under ground
 That pale, dejected, withered thing,
 And hear that mockery of a sound
 Whene'er it tries to laugh or sing,
 And feel the spirit-blight that falls
 Like the dank mildew on its walls,
 And catch the breath that faints away
 From shattered tenements of clay,
 And feel the fevered pulse beat high
 The bursting heart's mute symphony.—
 Methinks that greatness would appear
 A mock, a dream, a burning lie,
 A strong deception of the ear,
 Brand of a nation's infamy.

See ye that hovel standing by,
 With broken thatch and hingeless door ?
 Dilapidation e'er comes nigh
 The cheerless cabin of the poor !
 Go, look within where squalor reigns ;
 No tones of love to sooth their pains,
 No little spot of cultured ground
 Is smiling 'neath the blooming flowers,—
 They spring not there to shed around
 A sweet perfume on childhood's hours ;
 No prattle speaks the infant's tone
 Of life's young joy within the soul,
 In golden sands of pleasure thrown
 Where spirit-streams first rise to roll,
 And give the deathless being there
 Its first fruition bright and fair.

* John Wood, nearly eighteen—"Never heard of St. John the Baptist ; never heard of King Herod ; has heard of Jesus Christ, the Saviour's Lord's Son."

† William Southern, aged seventeen—"Knows who Jesus Christ was, he died on the cross to shed his blood to save our Saviour. Never heard of St. Peter or St. Paul."

Walter Brindly, aged seventeen—"Has heard of the Apostles ; does not know if St. Peter was one, or if St. John was one, unless it was St. John Wesley ; does not know any thing about Job ; never heard of Samson ; knows about Jack Sheppard."

Samuel R. Horton, near twelve—"Cannot read, only in the six penny book. Is not afraid of any man or boy either. Thinks he is of the devil, but not particularly."

The poor men's children have no home,
No spot endeared by sacred ties,
They toil, but plenty does not come,
They weep, but none attend their cries ;
They ne'er inherit wealth or power,
They win from fortune's hand no dower,
But life is all unwelcomed still
And binds them here against their will.

Nor can the poor men's children break
The galling bond which binds them down.
Should poor men's children think to take
One useless jewel from the crown ?
Their sires were poor, and poor away—
Their sires wore rags, and so shall they—
Their sires were born in hovels here—
Their sires oft wiped the falling tear—
Their lives were spent in toil and pain—
They sought for mercy but in vain—
They died and left their rags to bear
A witness to the children there—
They died and left their cup of tears
For these to drink in early years :
And shall these children not endure
The patrimony of the poor ?

Go, Briton ! to yon gloomy mine,
Where helpless infants toil and sigh !
No gladdening sunbeams on them shine,
Or hies the tear-drop from their eye ;
But there in deep, sepulchral gloom,
Ye dwarf the spirit in its dawn,
And throw the darkness of the tomb,
In the young soul's bright hour to bloom,
Its deathless energies upon—
In which enshrouded it must lie
And bear its pent-up agony !
Go, see these infants where they crawl*
In fearful bondage day by day,
Go, see where tear-drops thickly fall
Upon their burdens on the way.
These mines are England's sin-cursed heart—
Their sinuous windings are its veins—
From which its streams of riches start,
And fill its giant form with pains ;
Pollution fills the cells within
And sends corruption through its frame,
While dark, corrosive, damning sin
Casts all its blight on England's name ;
And when its bosom heaves, ye hear
A stifled wail's sepulchral sound
Bring dark forebodings to the ear,
While blood cries out from underground !

The poor men's children do not know
What childhood is, their tearful eyes
First fall on scenes of pain and woe
And life's most stern realities ;
They breathe, but not the breath of heaven—
The coal-pit's damps of death are theirs ;
And in the joyous spring-time given
To be unknown of life's dull cares,
Condemned to toil they drag along
Their heavy burdens 'neath the thong ;
In these dark cells they eke away

* They drag wheeled carriages or sledges by a belt or girth fastened round the loins, and a chain attached to it in front and passing between the limbs to the wagon or sledge, which the child drags on all fours, through passages in some instances not more than ten or twenty inches in height.

The rosy dawn of childhood's day,
And early in their thralldom learn
What sorrow is ; for every prayer
Their lordlings and oppressors spurn,
And mete them out but vengeance there.
Hope stricken with the arrow dies
While rayless gloom before them lies,
And crushed and withered in the hour
They bow submissive to its power,
And spirit-broken humbly kneel
Beneath the bold oppressor's heel.

Would ye know more of England's isle ?
Of England's youth and England's pride ?
Go to yon vast and dusky pile,
In which a thousand beings hide !
The poor men's children labor there,
And poor men's children famish, too,
And poor men's children sadly bear
The chains their lords each day renew !
There, childhood's day is turned to night,
And night to bitter, toilsome hours—
The sun-beam brings to them no light,
And night no rest-renewing dowers ;
But moving in one endless round
The poor men's children there are found,
And daily cry for mercy's tear
To England's lords who will not hear.

See ye that infant's hollow eye
And sunken cheek and blanching lip ?
That scarce can say—" I may not try
The bitter cup of life to sip !"
See ye that feeble, faltering limb
That scarce supports his trembling frame,
And can ye mildly gaze on him,
Or will ye blush with burning shame ?
Thy greatness springs from thence, my lord !
His misery yields thy rich perfume !
But soon 'twill be to him restored
To strip away thy robber's plume !
And ere the pale, gray morning light
Streaks all along the eastern sky,
The children's slumbers take their flight
And bear with them the waking sigh ;
The spectre of the rude, rough hand,
That keeps them toiling all day long,
Is fellow to the harsh command,
The upraised arm and leathern thong ;
No balmy sleep is theirs at night
Revivifying childhood's powers,
No morning breaks upon the sight
To waft to them untroubled hours,
And bid them join in pastime sweet
With bounding heart and tripping feet,
Where'er the gaudy butterfly
Their childish arts can but defy,
And tips with golden light his wings
Whence the pure ether softly springs ;
Where mirth bedimples every cheek
And flashing eyes of pleasure speak,
And daisies spring, the heart to teach,
In nature's holiest, purest speech,
The beauty of her gentle powers,
The innocence of childhood's hours.

The poor men's children wake in pain
From fitful, dark, unwelcome dreams,
And painful crawl to toil again
Which e'er their sad fulfilment seems,
And drag along unrested limbs
While tears each lifeless eye bedims :

They have a faith in dreams, I ween,
For every day their truth is seen!

Go, follow where the children lead—
Is not that noble, rich, and great?
There poor men's children daily bleed
To gather riches for the State!
Each seeks his own accustomed part
While terror chills the breaking heart,
And soon ye hear the busy sound:
The wheels of vast machines go round—
The fires again more brightly burn—
A thousand drums more swiftly turn—
And art seems prodigal of skill
The crowded realm with wealth to fill,
Performing with her wondrous power
A week's hard labor in an hour:
For all of these I would not care,
If poor men's children were not there.

There toil they when the dawn appears
To whisper in the ear of night.
Again this gloom the sunbeam nears,
Dispelling darkness with the light;
There toil they when the morning ray
Flashes bright waves from shore to shore,
Extatic leaping on their way
Fair nature's beauties to restore;
The little lark in gladness springs
And sweet orisons gently sings,
While up to heaven it seems to soar
Its great Creator to adore;
Anon the mellow sounds are heard
That tell the tiny humming-bird
Is glancing near on quivering wing,
Capricious, yet enchanting thing;
It touches every flower's lip
The nectar from the cup to sip,
And vies with honey-bees each hour
Who most can win from every flower;
While these, of every form and hue,
Their varied tints again renew,
And analyze the passing light
To robe themselves, and all bedight
With beauty by their Author given,
They bid it speed upon its flight,
But seize their own inherent right,
Then cast their incense forth to heaven.

But, oh! the children ne'er partake
Of joy to which the insects wake,
When piping forth their roundelay
They hail the glad approach of day;
They ne'er inhale the ether pure,
Nor quaff the sweet inspiring draught,
Nor lovely scenes their eyes allure,
Nor Zephyrs pleasure to them waft;—
Immured within these dreary walls,
'Mid smoke and dust, and steam, and gloom,
The desolation on them falls,
And grief and pain their hearts consume;
There England finds her richest spoil,
Her infants offered at her shrine,
For there they ever, ever toil,
And shed their tears and helpless pine;
For night and day in mute despair
The poor men's children labor there!
Great iron wheels go round and round,
And vast machines of every name
Send forth their ceaseless busy sound
The children's labor e'er to claim;
And there the infant toilers sit

And ply their fingers' active skill,
The little pins with heads to fit,
And ply them ever, ever still;
Or each the silvery wash distils
From his own veins, to cleanse a pin—
The strangest formula that fills
The fearful chemistry of sin;
Could maidens who so freely wear
These little pins, nor seem to care,
Behold the price the children pay
Those gloomy walls all day within,
Methinks they could not throw away—
It is so cheap—a little pin:
For oft to me a pin appears
Corroded by an infant's tears.

Or here their fellows, hour by hour,
The cotton-cloths forever steep,
And terror stricken* fear the power
That brings the toil o'er which they weep;
They breathe the vapor of their tears!
Each day its sad rotation brings
Till each more drear to them appears—
Self-moving, macerated things!

Or here, another class is seen
Keeping the giant engines clean,
And every shape the frame can bear
They make their little limbs assume,
And life and vigor they consume,
And mind and soul for matter there;†
And up and down they ever turn
Each spot and blemish to discern,
And in their painful task they find
Their falling tears have made them blind;
But when they fall, along with dust,
They wipe them off for fear of rust;
Methinks, were they not wiped away,
The iron wheels would cease to drone,
For rust the gearing would decay
And leave them standing all alone;
The infant's tear-drops ever roll
While he the engine ever cleans,
And makes his spirit, mind and soul,
A spirit fire for dumb machines.

What see they in the years to come?
A blissful future, glad and free?
Oh, no! they only visions see
Of constant toil, and sad and dumb
They ever still inherit there
The infant's birthright of despair.

And when the day is past and gone,
A sweet release does evening bring?
Oh, no! the infant labors on
A crippled, blind, unrested thing!
The mellow light speaks not to him
A pure, sweet calm to soothe his powers,

* Mr. Thomas Daniel, in his examination before the Children's Employment Commission, testified—"They are always in terror; I consider that does them as much injury as the labor, their minds being in a constant state of agitation and fear." "They are constantly in a state of grief though some of them cannot shed tears."

† Mr. Daniel remarked further—"They are in all sorts of postures that the human body is capable of being put into, to come at the machines." "Their work is to keep the machines, while they are going, clean from all kinds of dust and dirt that may be flying about, and they are in all sorts of positions to come at them." &c.

He ever mid the lamp-light dim
 Toils on till midnight's dreary hours ;
 And when with pain, and toil, and sleep,
 Ye see him stop against his will,
 And sightless fountains cease to weep,
 The tiny fingers move on still ;
 And though the infant sleeps, his skill
 Has grown so perfect, toiling long,
 Were he not wakened by the throng,
 He'd ply them ever, ever still !
 Oh, Britons ! all your pride I spurn,
 For wheresoe'er I look, ye turn
 A favored isle to loathsome scenes
 And deathless babes to dumb machines !

But these were angels, did ye teach
 Their mind to know, their heart to love
 The heaven-born faith ye daily preach
 By full commission from above ?
 And these were angels, were they filled
 With that pure love ye call your own ?
 Or could they feel the showers distilled
 In spirit-droppings from the Throne ?
 Or could they in their childhood learn
 To tune their voice to angel's praise,
 And on their heart's young altar burn
 Immortal incense all their days ?
 And these were angels, were they taught
 To lisp the accents sweet of prayer,
 That on their altar may be caught
 Celestial fire awaking there ?
 And these were angels, did ye give
 The bread of heaven to feed their souls,
 Or lead them where life's water rolls
 Eternal on its shores to live ?
 But angels are not there, I ween,
 They come so few and far between.

In islands 'mid the Southern sea,
 The heathen mother learns to cast
 Her infants where they soon must be Dead prisoners in its caverns vast ;
 Or on the Orient's spicy plain,
 Where joy might woo them with its calm,
 Beneath the spreading, lofty palm,
 They madly give them up to pain ;
 Or on the verdant banks they stand
 And with the mother's cruel hand,
 Dark superstition's error slaves,
 They plunge them deep 'neath Ganges' waves !
 While ye, that have a holier beam,
 A baser sacrifice have made—
 Ye plunge them in a viler stream—
 An Acheron of bloody trade.

This is the doom of England's young !
 They wake to toil—they toil to weep,
 And sigh till nature falls asleep
 O'er toil forever from them wrung ;
 Despoiled of life's bright day to bloom,
 Their breast is Hope's cold, rayless tomb,
 Round which pale spectres danced and flit
 In apparitions of the pit :
 Within the factory's dreary walls,
 Or down in deep sepulchral mines,
 The children's lot forever falls
 To labor in their dank confines ;
 No hand of mercy comes to save
 The infant from his lasting doom,
 He sees it only in the grave,
 The toiless slumber of the tomb.

And poor men's children do not know
 Of Him who died their souls to free
 From bonds of sin, but ever go
 Untutored in their infamy !
 They think he was an ancient king,
 In London town long years gone by,
 Or some apostle who shall bring
 Strange, gladdening news before they die ;*
 They do not learn of Him who said,
 "Oh, suffer these to come to me,
 Of such my kingdom e'er must be,
 By grace unto my Father led :"
 And calling them around his knee
 Laid sacred hands upon each head.

Nor do they learn the precious prayer
 He taught disciples e'er to say,
 When, filled with joy or bowed with care,
 They turn their humble hearts to pray ;
 They do not lisp the accents sweet,
 Or raise the infant's tuneful sound,
 Or at "the family altar" meet
 A holy circle gathering round—
 But midnight hours attend their cry,
 When, aching on their straw they lie,
 They 'mid their moaning feebly sigh,
 "Our Father !"

And when the morning bids them bear
 Anew their load of pain and care,
 They utter still that hopeful prayer,
 "Our Father !"

When sunbeams bright and gentle showers
 Pour forth their streams to cheer the flowers,
 They say amid their toiling hours,
 "Our Father !"

And when at noon they ponder there
 To take their rude and humble fare,
 They offer up that simple prayer,
 "Our Father !"

When evening throws her shades around
 The infants at their task are found
 Repeating with a tearful sound,
 "Our Father !"

And though they sit unconscious there
 The fingers ply with constant care,
 And they do utter still the prayer,
 "Our Father !"

And e'en their painful slumber seems
 To plunge them still in bitter streams,
 For oft they whisper in their dreams,
 "Our Father !"

"OUR FATHER !" Thou who reignest on high !—
 Bow down to them thy list'ning ear !
 Oh, answer thou their constant cry,
 And bid redemption's day appear !
 Send mercy down on swiftest wing,
 To bid the children wake and sing,
 Beholding where thy mercies roll
 The bright fruition of the soul !

* George Causer, over sixteen, said—"There were twelve apostles ; thinks Adam was one, and Eve was two, and Jesus Christ was another. Cannot recollect any more."

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE MALTESE PEOPLE.

The Religious and Popular Superstitions of the Maltese people; their Carnival and its consequences—Duels at Malta, and Remarks on Duelling.

BY W. W. ANDREWS, U. S. CONSUL AT MALTA.

As the Maltese historians have made no mention of duelling in their ponderous tomes, I am obliged to trust to tradition, and to Millengen's researches, for the most I can find to say on the subject. Montagne tells us, "that if three Frenchmen were put into the Libyan desert, they would not be there a month without quarrelling and fighting;" and this same spirit his countrymen appear to have brought with them to Malta, though wearing the cross of Christ and clothed in priestly garments. I would not say that the many crosses which now remain on the walls of Strada Stretta, are left to mark the places where the French alone have fallen, for the monks of the other languages are said to have been as proud, as overbearing and as much disposed to settle their differences at the points of their swords, as were the knights of France. This remark would more particularly apply to the Spanish Cavaliers, who were in every age a haughty race, and ever ready to fight. The Castilians have figured in many duels, but one of the most remarkable is that which Millengen thus describes. What a strange combination of superstition and ferocity is shown by its narration.

"Italian customs (says this writer) prevailed in the Island of Malta, and duels were frequent amongst the knights of that order, although prohibited by most of the Grand-Masters. The Strada Stretta was the spot in which these meetings usually took place, and the friends of the combatants, stationed at each end of the narrow lane, prevented them from being disturbed. Assassinations at one time were so frequent in this quarter, that an edict was issued, denouncing the penalty of death on every person who was found in it armed with pistols or daggers. But by a singular regulation of the order, every person was obliged to return his sword into the scabbard when ordered to do so by a woman, a priest, or a knight. A cross was usually painted on the wall opposite the spot where a knight had been killed to commemorate his fall, and claim the prayers of those who passed by to relieve his soul from purgatory.

Although the statutes of the order of St. John of Jerusalem prohibited duels, yet a knight was considered disgraced if he refused to accept a challenge. A case is recorded of two knights, who having had a dispute at a billiard table, one of them, after much abusive language, struck a blow; but to the surprise of all Malta, after so gross a provocation, refused to fight his antagonist. The challenge was repeated, but still he refused to enter the lists. He was therefore condemned by the chapter to make an amende honorable, in the church of St. John, for forty-five successive days, then to be confined in a dungeon without light for five years; after which, he was to remain a prisoner in the castle for life.

A very curious duel took place at Valetta, between a Spanish commander, of the name of Vasconcellos and a French commander, M. de Foulquerre, the latter having had the insolence to present, as she entered a church, some holy water to a young lady whom the Castilian was following. Foulquerre was one of the most noted disturbers of the Strada Stretta; and although he had been engaged in many duels, on this occasion he repaired to the rendezvous with some reluctance, as though he anticipated the result of the meeting. As soon as his adversary appeared, he said, "What sir, do you draw your sword on a Good Friday! Hear me: it is now six years since I have confessed my manifold sins, and my conscience reproaches me so keenly, that in three days hence" — But the Spaniard would not attend to his request, and pressed upon him; when his opponent, mortally wounded, exclaimed, "What, on a Good Friday! May Heaven forgive you! Bear my sword to Tête Foulques, and let a hundred masses be said for the repose of my soul."

The Spaniard paid no attention to the dying man's request, and reported the circumstance to the chapter of the order, according to the prescribed rules; nevertheless, he was promoted to the priory of Majorca. On the night of the following Friday, he dreamt that he was in the Strada Stretta, where he again heard his enemy enjoin him to "bear his sword to Tête Foulques;" and a similar vision disturbed his slumbers every succeeding Friday night.

Vasconcellos did not know where this Tête Foulques was situated, until he learned from some French knights that it was an old castle four leagues from Poitiers, in the centre of a forest, remarkable for strange events; the castle containing in its halls many curious collections, among which was the armor of the famed knight, Foulques Taillefer, with the arms of all the enemies he had slain in single combat; and it appeared that from time immemorial, all his successors deposited in this armory the weapons which they used either in war or in private encounters.

Our worthy prior having received this information, determined to obey the injunction of the deceased, and set out for Poitiers with the sword of his antagonist. He repaired to the castle, where he found no one but the porter and the chaplain, and communicated to the latter the purport of his visit. He was introduced into the armory, and on each side of the chimney he beheld full length portraits of Foulques Taillefer and his wife, Isabella de Lusignan. The Seneschal was armed cap-a-pie, and over him were suspended the arms of his vanquished foes.

The Spaniard having laid down the sword, proceeded to tell his beads with great devotion until night-fall, when he fancied that he saw the eyes and mouths of the Seneschal and his wife in motion—and he distinctly heard the former addressing his wife, saying, "What dost thou think, my dear, of the daring of this Castilian who comes to dwell and eat in my castle, after having killed the commander without allowing him time to confess his sins!"—to which the lady replied, in a very shrill voice, "I think that the Castilian acted with disloyalty on that occasion and should not be allowed to depart without the challenge of your glove." The terrified Spaniard sought the door of the hall, but found it locked, when the Seneschal threw his heavy iron gauntlet at his face, and brandished his sword. The Spaniard, thus compelled to defend himself, snatched up the sword that he had deposited, and falling on his fantastic antagonist, fancied that he had run him through the body, when he felt a stab from a burning weapon under the heart and fainted away. When he recovered from his swoon, he found himself in the porters lodge, to which he had been carried, but free from any injury. He returned to Spain, but ever after, on every Friday night, he received a similar burning wound from the visionary Taillefer; nor could any act of devotion, or payment of money to friars or priests relieve him from this horrible phantom."

Tradition tells us of a fatal duel which took place in Malta in 1780, and in which three of the four combatants fell—the seconds on the ground having taken the part of their principals, a circumstance which at that time, in Italy, France and Germany, was not at all unfrequent. Two Italian and two French cavaliers were the persons who engaged in this deadly and desperate conflict. The quarrel originated at a card table, where the parties had been betting high, and at a game which is still fashionable among sporting men, that of ecarte. It appears that one of the French Monks was particularly fortunate in turning kings and winning his games only by the points which he scored in this way. This so annoyed the Italian, that he is said to have remarked, "Sir knight, your cards are turned by a slight of hand, and I will play no longer." The Frenchman simply told his friend as he rose from the table, that he was going to the chapel to pray, and from thence to the ditch of St. Angelo, where he might be found in less than an hour. The hint which was conveyed in these words was well understood, and at the appointed time, the four priests were in the ditch to fight. Before sunset of that same day, both of the principals, and one of the seconds were slain. This fatal duel took place in the reign of Rohan, a worthy prince who was strongly opposed to duelling, and published the following laws for its prevention. He ordained, that "in duels both the challenger and the challenged and their auxiliaries and seconds shall be punished with condemnation to the galleys for ten years, if death doth not ensue, and which punishment can be increased to a longer term than the ten years, in proportion to the excess committed." And furthermore, "if death doth ensue, then the duelling parties, as well as their auxiliaries, seconds and accomplices shall suffer the punishment of death." Severe as were these enactments, still they were just and productive of good, both to the morals of the monks and to their Christian conduct one to another. After their promulgation, no other duels ever occurred in the convent.

The first place to which a stranger is carried by a Cicerone, on entering the famed church of St. John's, at Malta, is to a pretty little chapel on the right, at the head of which, and behind a small marble altar, is a celebrated painting representing the decapitation of the saint, after whom the beautiful building is named. It was only a few days ago that I was in this little chapel with the Hon. Mr. Cushing, who remained at this place for a day when on his way to China, and standing on the slightly raised platform, from which this much prized painting can be seen to the best advantage. The surly, savage countenance of the executioner who stands holding his axe above the trunkless corse, the fountain of gushing blood, and the gory visage of the fallen saint, have all been painted with a masterly hand. The singular manner in which this painting came into the possession of the order is worthy of being recorded. Michael Angelo Caravaggio, whose many productions now so much adorn the different galleries of Florence, Rome and Naples, was once so much enraged by the declaration of Arpino, that his paintings were not of so much merit as many supposed them, that he sent the critic a challenge to meet him in a mortal combat; saying also, that if he was fortunate enough to kill him, he would have an agreeable subject for another picture, even though he should be unable to do it justice. Arpino not disposed to grant the artist the favor he asked, merely said to the person who brought him the challenge, "go and tell Caravaggio that he and his daubs are equally beneath my notice, and that if he even expects to fight with me he must first rise from the grovelling rank in which thus far he has been obliged to move." Caravaggio took the advice of Arpino, for he immediately left his studio at Rome, and, bidding adieu to his dissipated friends, came to the Island of Malta. This he did, hoping in time, by his paintings and his presents to the Grand-Master, to become a knight of the order. He was not disappointed; For, after residing three years in Valetta, and painting the decapitation of St. John and some other scriptural pieces of equal ability, he was made a monk of the Italian language, and permitted to wear the Maltese cross. His dignity, however, came too late to enable him to fight with Arpino, for the critic was already dead some months before he received it. Under the habit of a priest, Caravaggio does not appear to have improved his morals. "Seeking endless quarrels in the convent, he was obliged to fly from this Island, and going to Rome, after killing his man, ended his days in abject poverty on the high road."

Greatly is it to be regretted, that a person who was gifted with so much genius as Caravaggio should have been in his morals so debased; and also that he should have been spurred on to paint his happiest productions, and those of a religious nature merely to gratify a base and unchristian spirit of revenge. It was his wish to kill Arpino which made the knights of Malta indebted for a beautiful painting, the more valuable to them, as it represented the decapitation of the saint, after whom their order was named. Being therefore considered as common property, it had the first place in their principal church, and so carefully is it now preserved, that having outlived the order, it may yet outlive its memory. It is not surprising, that Caravaggio should have so well succeeded in painting the most diabolical expressions of the human face, when we consider that he always had present before him a living model in his own person. Being a highwayman, a thief and a murderer, he enjoyed a decided advantage over his brother artists, for while they were obliged to go to prisons and galleys to seek for their characters, he had only to look at himself. Caravaggio well knew how a murderer both looked and felt. And it must be acknowledged, that it is chiefly owing to the circumstance of his having taken advantage of this knowledge which enabled him as a painter to acquire such distinguishing celebrity.

In June, 1798, Napoleon drove the knights of Malta from this Island, which had been the venerable home of the order for the long term of two hundred and sixty eight years. During the twenty-seven months, while the French remained masters of Valetta, they were so seriously threatened with starvation, and so hardly pressed by their enemies, both at sea and on shore, that they had no time to fight with one another, even if they had been thus disposed. From their expulsion, in the fall of 1800, to the present day, the flag of Old England has been waving over the bastions of Malta, and duels of course have been of frequent occurrence. Dr. Griffiths, who so ably defended Capt. Levick when on his trial, has kindly furnished me with a list of meetings which have taken place at this Island since it came under the rule of his countrymen. It was prepared by the learned advocate to show the authorities of this place, that it was hardly just in them to take up Capt. Levick's "affair" with so much spirit, when they had, in other days, permitted duels of a still more aggravating nature to pass by wholly unnoticed.

A noble lord, by the name of Cochrane, figured in the first duel at Malta after it became a British possession. He was challenged by Capt. Andora, a Major of Brigade, and in the first fire was shot through the thigh. This occurred in 1806.

The next instance was that of an American naval officer who challenged one of General Oake's aide-de-camp, and shot him dead. This unfortunate meeting took place in 1806, at the time we were engaged in the Tripoline war.

The purser of the English frigate, "Regulus," in April, 1813, called out the First Lieutenant of the same ship. They fought in the ditches of Florian. Both having missed their man on the first shot, the only friend who was present was sent to town to purchase some powder with which to fire again. While this person was gone on his errand, the principals remained in the ditch looking at each other, though never a word passed between them. On the second discharge of their pistols the Lieutenant was killed.

Assistant Staff Surgeon, Grier, fought a duel with an officer of the 28th Regiment in the Cotonera, in 1817. Neither was wounded.

The noted duellist, Capt. Stafford, of the 10th Regiment, who was challenging people continually, was sent away from Malta, by Sir Thomas Maitland, that his diabolical wish of fighting with all his brother officers might no longer be gratified. Were this spirited measure of the gallant governor to become an established rule, we are well persuaded that few duels in this garrison would ever occur. Officers would hesitate a long time before sending, or accepting a challenge, if they knew that by so doing, they would risk the price of their commission, or be banished as a pest from the society in which they had been accustomed to move. Some such laws as these must be enacted, or duelling in the Army and Navy will never be out of fashion.

Lt. Mitchell, of the 68th Regiment, came up from Gibraltar with the Assistant Surgeon of the same corps as his second and fought at the Marsa with an officer of the Navy who had insulted him at Lisbon. Although it was publicly known, that this gentleman had taken this voyage to Valetta on purpose to fight, still the meeting took place without interruption, and Lt. Mitchell as leisurely left the Island as if he had come on a mission of peace.

It is not often that the Maltese have been engaged in duels, although we have found the two or three following instances to mar their usually peaceable character. Count Sant fought with Mr. Giammalva behind Spinola, and Ensign Consolat of the Malta Royal Fencibles was arrested by the police at Bighi, as he was going on the ground to fight with a commander of a gun brig whom he had challenged.

In 1825, the Marquis of Hastings* cancelled the appointment of Mr. Caruana in the Maltese Regiment because he had declined to fight a duel with Capt. Bussiet, who is now a Major of the same corps. It is surprising, that the Marquis of Hastings should have set so bad an example to the native population of the Island which he had been sent by the King of England to govern. The Maltese officers, if taken in a body, are a respectable set of men. If ever called into the service of their country they will never disgrace it.

We have now to record a fatal duel which took place between Col. Baylis of the 35th and Capt. Newman of the 20th Regiment. The former was the aggressor throughout, and the latter was the one who fell. Col. B. was so much enraged at the conduct of a woman who had left him to go under Capt. Newman's protection, that on his meeting this officer in the street, he struck him with a cane, and then placing his hand on the hilt of his sword, told him if he was a man to draw and defend himself. The unfortunate Captain said to his assailant that he knew his duty better than to fight with a superior officer in that way, but that in the course of an hour he should send a friend to arrange for a meeting. On the first fire Capt. Newman fell mortally wounded. After his death, Colonel Baylis was tried for murder, and acquitted because he was not the challenger.

The Honorable Lt. Perry and Lt. Hall, who were both in the 7th Fusiliers, exchanged shots on account of a Maltese belle who bestowed her smiles on each. After Lt. Hall had received his adversary's ball through his right hand, the delicate affair was amicably arranged. A few years ago, two noble lords of this same regiment, Ranclough and Chichester, had a misunderstanding at the "Union Club" about a game of backgammon. By the kind interference of the late lamented Sir Frederick Ponsonby the dispute was settled in an amicable way, and to the satisfaction of both.

At a ball which was given by Admiral Rowley in 1836, a Lieutenant of the Highlanders insulted a Passed Midshipman of our Navy by asking the English officer to whom our countryman was speaking, "pray who is your Yankee friend with his flying cravat." The Passed Midshipman hearing this remark, immediately noticed it, by handing his card, and saying to the Scotchman, that he would answer his question to-morrow. When the gallant officers of this famed corps heard of the circumstance, they obliged the Lieutenant to go on board the American frigate and apologize for his conduct. An honorable course, which created and kept alive a friendly feeling so long as our squadron remained.

We have now only to make mention of another

* Better known in America under the title of Lord Rawdon of the 5th Fusiliers, of which corps he was a Lieutenant at the battle of Bunker Hill.

noble lord who has recently fought at this Island and then we shall have done with our brief and imperfect account of the English duels at Malta within the last half century. At the very time that Capt. Levick's trial for the death of Lt. Adams was pending, and indeed at the very moment when both Capt. C. and his second were confined in prison to be tried for their lives, Lord Sussex Lennox* came out to Malta to fight with Capt. Norcott of the Rifle Brigade, who it was reported had corresponded with his lordship's wife. Major Studholme Hodgson of the 19th Regiment appeared on the ground as the friend of Lord Lennox, and Capt. Roper of the Rifles for Capt. Norcott. His lordship is considered a first rate shot, and not without reason, as he cut the cravat of his opponent and came within an inch of his life. Capt. Norcott, having discharged his pistol in the air, the duel could not be continued. Lord Lennox was not satisfied and expressed his determination to call on the gallant rifleman again on some future occasion for that satisfaction which, as an officer in Her Majesty's Army, he should be at all times ready to give him. From what we have said of duels and duelling at Malta, one may well judge of the reckless conduct of military and naval men in an English garrison town.

"A PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF REGINALD DE LACY."

FROM A MS. OF THE XVII CENTURY.

I have been a wanderer from my youth; the love of home, so strong a feeling with most men, has never found a place in my breast; restless and troubled has been the whole course of my existence; and the years which my contemporaries spent in the pursuit of lucre or of fame rolled almost unheeded by, whilst I was flying from clime to clime, in the vain hope of banishing from my memory the recollections which had embittered my early youth and frozen up the warm current of my affections in a sullen and hopeless misanthropy. Many men consume their lives in a vain chase after the bubbles of Ambition, or Love, or Avarice, which lure them afar from happiness and then burst into air before their disappointed eyes, and then they blame their "fortune" and not their folly for the result; but I have chased none of these shadows; the sole aim of my life, since early youth, has been forgetfulness of the past, and now, standing upon the verge of the grave, I am forced to own the bitter lesson Experience has taught me, that there is "no Lethe for the Heart." I have sought it in the winning smile of woman and in the fierce excitement of war; I have searched for it in the intoxicating bowl and in the delusive dice; I have traversed strange lands and mingled in the game whose pawns are men; but the busy fiend, Memory, was ever with me, and now I know that peace will never visit this wearied frame and aching brain until both shall repose in the quiet of the grave, whither a few short days will bear me now. As a Statesman and a Warrior, the name of Reginald de Lacy has filled the mouths of men, and bards have made it the theme of their lays; yet, at heart, a more wretched man has never walked the face of the earth, and as a lesson and a warning to you, my nephew and my namesake, do I now trace this brief record of the event which stamped my future destiny and sent me forth, like Cain, "a fugitive over the face of the earth." Let my experience teach you not to garner up the affections of your young heart upon one object alone, lest that one light should fail, and that rayless darkness of soul await you, which has been the doom of Reginald de Lacy.

It matters not when I first saw the light, or in what manner my days of childhood were passed; suffice it to say, that my family was noble and affluent, and that at the early age of 16 years I was left undisputed master of my own actions, without a friend or relative to counsel or advise me; my guardian, a cold ambitious man of the world, dwelt in the city, and was content with devoting his attention to the care of my property and in wielding the political influence which his situation secured him, and he encouraged my habits of study and seclusion from the world. My father, a man of powerful and cultivated intellect, who had figured largely as a Statesman and Politician, had, in the latter years of his life, sunk into a state of profound melancholy, and his own pleasure had been to instil into my youthful mind the same love for classical literature with which his own was imbued; but he died as I was entering into my 16th year, and I was then indeed alone in the world; your mother, his only other child, having married long before, and dwelling in a remote part of the kingdom. Naturally of a stern and moody temper and never having mingled much with the gay world, owing to the isolated situation in which my patrimonial residence was located, on the death of my sole remaining parent I secluded myself from society and plunged with renewed ardor into the studies doubly endeared to me by my own and my parent's fondness for them, and forgot the busy living world in the glorious productions of the past. The effect of such a course of life upon a youth of ardent feelings and imaginative temper may readily be imagined. I became a visionary enthusiast, my imagination invested surrounding objects with its own hues and I was near sinking into a dreaming visionary, had not all my energies and passions suddenly burst forth into activity and life under the influence of the most exalting feeling which can thrill the fervid pulse of youth; for let heartless worldlings sneer as they may, there can be no higher and nobler stimulus to exalted actions than the pure and absorbing sentiment of first love. All other love is mixed up with the leaven of worldly selfishness,—that is as pure as the fresh unsullied hearts in which it springs to life; mine was as a star gleaming down in pure radiance for a few brief moments upon the troubled waters of my life and then fading from the firmament forever. The quiet and sequestered life I have described I led, until I had reached my twentieth year, when new feelings began to stir within me; a feeling of restlessness and ennui—a longing desire to see and know that world of which I had heard and read so much, and a weariness of the quiet of my home. I began to pine for action, and like a young eagle longed to test my untried powers. In this feverish state of feeling my books would often be thrown aside, and I would wander afar into the forest, feeding my fancy with visions of future fame and greatness to be achieved by my efforts; and in one of these an accident occurred which influenced my future destiny; on such slight threads are the actions of man often suspended; a word, a look, a gesture, may make or mar the fortunes and the character of the most gifted among us—and in youth, the first strong passion which is awakened, often stamps the future character of the man.

The place wherein I dwelt was an ancient Baronial Castle, embowered in a thick and almost impervious grove of oaks, which gave it a retired and gloomy appearance; stretching far behind the castle was a long line of unbroken forest, the haunt of the red deer and other game, with here and there, at long and irregular intervals, the cottage of a peasant with its small clearing around it. With the neighboring lords I had no intercourse, they were ignorant and rapacious, their souls absorbed in petty feuds, or in grinding to the dust their miserable tenantry, who were at that time just beginning to feel and appreciate the fact of their degraded condition, and breaking out into occasional rebellion to improve it: with such men I could have no sympathy or communion, and therefore, my sole relaxation consisted in wandering through the forest and holding silent communion with my own thoughts. One bright evening in May, I had wandered much further than was my wont, lured on by the beauty of the scenery and the unbroken stillness which reigned around: save when the wind would agitate the leaves of the lofty oaks, all Nature seemed hushed in quiet and repose; the sunbeams were sleeping upon the verdant turf, the soft zephyr, as it stole by, seemed laden with the perfume of every flower it had kissed in its amorous progress; the hum of the ever active bee as it flitted by invited to slumber; and the clouds were of that deep azure tint, which seems by its purity to give an earnest of the delights of Heaven! The beauty of the scene sunk into my inmost soul, "This," I exclaimed, "is happiness! Let me thus commune with nature, undisturbed by man, and I will rest contented." As I spoke, I threw myself upon the verdant turf and abandoned my mind to the train of thoughts which the time and place conspired to produce. But my reverie was destined to be of short duration, and my philosophy all vanished into air, as a joyous laugh was suddenly borne to my ears from a distant part of the forest, it was a ringing joyous laugh, the outburst of a happy heart,—I was struck with surprise, could a delicate female be wandering in that trackless forest? No! it must have been a delusion, created by my own heated fancy: I raised myself, however, from my recumbent position and gazed long and earnestly around; at length, I observed at a considerable distance from me a thin line of smoke curling up from the dense undergrowth, a sure mark of a human habitation. I had just satisfied myself of the fact when that joyous laugh rose again upon the air, and died away like the rich tones of an Æolian harp when its chords have been swept by the passing breeze, and then a soft and melodious voice poured forth a song, so wildly beautiful, that I hushed the tumultuous beating of my heart, lest I should lose one note of its enchanting melody. The song at length was concluded, and then, but not till then, did I cautiously arise, and moving stealthily forward in the direction from whence the sound had proceeded, obtained a position from whence I could behold without being perceived this fair Siren whose voice had thus enchanted me. The sight which met my eye was indeed an interesting one; on a rustic bench in a retired nook sat a youthful maiden, but not alone, and with a painful thrill for which I could not account, I turned my eyes upon the youth by her side, whose eyes seemed to drink in the expression of his companion's face. He might have numbered eighteen summers, but Passion had already engraven on his face the marks of maturer age; and his eye, large, dark and fiery, roved with a restless troubled expression on the things around, denoting a heart ill at ease. But she, who sat beside him, oh! never had my eyes rested upon aught so radiantly beautiful! it was not the mere harmony of her features, or the symmetry of her form (though both were perfect) which gave her a nameless charm; but it was the mingled sweetness and intelligence which illumined her speaking countenance, and irresistibly melted the heart of him who gazed—into Love. But I will not attempt to describe her—that were profanation, for language has no word to paint the beauties of mind and heart irradiating a virgin's face—but her image is indelibly impressed upon my heart, and there will endure until this wearied frame shall slumber in the dust.

But fascinating as was the sight of so much loveliness I tore myself away, for I felt that my presence there was unauthorized, and if detected would be humiliating; so, with a heavy sinking of spirit, such as I had never before experienced, I turned away, with the conviction stamped upon my soul, that she, whom I had seen but for a few brief moments, was destined to be my guiding star through life or its haunting curse, for there is an intuition in affection, as well as in faith; and love has had its self-devoted martyrs as well as religion; for is not love the religion of the heart? I returned to my solitary home, and never had it seemed so desolate and cheerless to my eyes; with irritable impatience I tossed aside my favorite authors, for they had no longer the power of fixing my attention, or enlisting my feelings; for the first time a full sense of the loneliness of my situation pressed painfully upon me, and as if by a sudden spell the things around me seemed to have become "weary, stale and unprofitable." Fool that I was! not to know that the change was in myself and not in the things around me! I retired to rest at an early hour, but the capricious Deity fled from me the more I wooed his presence, at length, however, a heavy slumber fell upon me, but chequered by the wildest and strangest dreams! Methought I was again in that deep forest, with the same sweet voice pouring forth its melodious notes, suddenly converted into wails of agony—rushing towards the spot, I beheld her fair form encircled in the folds of a monstrous serpent, whose fiery eyes seemed to burn into my brain; with a shudder of agony I awoke, blinded by the glare, and found that the morning sun was shining in upon me through my open casement; with a feeling of relief, I rose and descended to my customary studies. That evening, mounting my steed, I slowly rode in the direction of the cottage, and under the pretext of having lost my way, entered, and soon became acquainted with its inmates; a sudden storm arising detained me for some hours, and favored by this accident, I improved my time in such a manner as to learn the history of its inmates, and to pave the way to future intimacy. The master of the household was a venerable man whose head had been whitened by sixty summers; he was a scion of a noble but impoverished family, and pride and poverty had but recently driven him into this obscure retreat. The youth, Albert Hardinge, was the son of an old friend, who dying had left him to his charge with a small patrimonial property, but his violent and hasty temper rendered collisions between himself and the old man of not unfrequent occurrence; and at such times, the only one who could restore peace was the fair Emily, whose lovely form concealed a lovelier heart. These details of course I could not gather during my first visit, but our acquaintance soon ripening into intimacy, in the course of a few weeks I was treated almost like an inmate of the house, since my society was a pleasure and relief to the old man in his isolated situation; and from his conversation I drew many an instructive lesson for my future guidance, as he had both seen and mixed much in the great world, and in his day been the idol of his sovereign and the people, who now left him to moralize in solitude over their neglect. Nor was his conversation the only attraction—in his daughter, I saw the embodiment of my early dreams of female perfection, and a deep absorbing passion took possession of my entire being.

It is needless that I should dwell long on this part of my history—it will suffice to tell you that my visits to the cottage became more and more frequent, each visit discovering some new charm in her I adored, until at length, I drew a trembling confession from her rosy lips, that she loved me, and me alone. Who can tell the rapture which swelled my heart at this avowal! I thought myself favored above all other mortals, and in my madness dreamt that unalloyed happiness might, in this world, be enjoyed by mortal man. Fool! Dreamer! Idiot that I was, to risk all my happiness upon one cast,—it has made me what I am. But there was one member of the family who shared not in the kindly feeling towards me, on the contrary, evinced from the first a marked repugnance and dislike; that one was Albert Hardinge: with the quick instinct of affection he marked the impression which Emily's beauty had made upon me; and with impatient bitterness observed our increasing intimacy, for he had himself long cherished a secret passion for her, the more intense, because of its utter hopelessness; and the prospect of the successful issue of my suit drove him almost to frenzy. At first he contented himself with a chilling reserve of manner, but as my attentions became more marked, his manner indicated that a feeling of decided hostility had taken the place of his former coldness, and his evident intention was to entrap me in a quarrel, which I avoided, partly because I appreciated his feelings, and partly from that feeling of triumphant superiority which a successful suitor always entertains for a baffled one. But the smothered flame broke out at last; one evening, after a stormy interview with his guardian, in which he had announced his determination of leaving forever the home "in which," as he said, "he had been supplanted by a stranger," I entered the room as he was turning to depart and witnessed the conclusion of the interview. Upon the noble countenance of the old man was an expression of pitying regret, while anger and shame seemed struggling for mastery on the countenance of the young one; for a moment he paused irresolute, then stood forward and bent his haughty head before the old man's seat; "Father, your blessing!" were the only words he uttered. The venerable man placed his withered hand in silence upon the glossy curls of the young one's head; and the next moment he had left the friend of his childhood forever; he cast not even a glance upon the pale face of the weeping girl, but as he passed me by with a glare of deadly hate, he muttered, "We meet again;" then vaulting upon his steed and plunging his spurs to the rowels in his side, he was borne rapidly away from the presence of the only beings on earth who took an interest in his fate. To wile away the melancholy which this event occasioned both to the father and daughter, I protracted my visit until near the hour of midnight, when reluctantly I tore myself away, leaving them both in a more tranquil frame of mind than I had hoped; and it was with a feeling of joyous exhilaration that I leaped upon my noble steed who stood pawing at the gate, impatient of my lingering adieux to the lady of my love, whose bright eyes beamed in the clear light of the moon as she stood waving me a mute farewell with her snowy hand. The night was remarkably clear and bright, and I was able to discern the surrounding objects almost as distinctly as at noonday. I was riding carelessly along, humming a joyous roundelay, when, to my surprise, on turning a sharp point in the road, I suddenly beheld the figure of a man, standing in the centre of the road over which I was compelled to pass, with his horse's bridle slung over one arm and a drawn sword in the other. The bright light of the moon fell upon his uncovered head, and in an instant I recognized Albert Hardinge—his whole position and appearance denoting his hostile purpose. I reined up my steed, and for a moment neither spoke; at length I broke silence, "What means this mummery!" said I sternly; "Is it robbery or murder that you contemplate? if neither, stand by and let me pass."

"Never," was the fierce reply. "Think you, I will forego my only hope of vengeance upon the enemy who has robbed me of all I prized in life! But one of us two leaves this spot a living man. Draw and defend yourself!" As he spoke, he cast the bridle from his arm and his trained steed stood still, while he, with his rapier drawn, confronted me. But the quiet beauty of the night, as I had ridden along, had filled my mind with thoughts of happiness and peace, and indisposed me to violence and bloodshed; so I answered him with a calmness which I myself marvelled at; but his hatred had rendered him deaf to the voice of reason, and he dared to call me, "Coward!" Then all the hot blood of my race boiled in my veins, I sprung from my steed, and confronted him with a fierceness equal to his own, and in one instant more, the peaceful quiet of the scene was broken by the clash of our swords as we met in deadly strife. The combat was short but desperate, we were equally matched in strength and skill, but my antagonist fought with a blind fury which rendered skill unavailing: my life was his object, and in gaining that, he cared not whether he lost his own:

at length, he deceived me by a sudden faint, and lunged straight at my heart—I saw it in time and parried the thrust, striking up the rapier which only grazed my cheek, and in return passed my weapon through his sword arm; the sword dropped from his nerveless grasp. As for an instant I paused to take breath, the sound of loud laughter was borne upon the night wind, and the tramp of horses and jingling of their trappings indicated the approach of a party of cavalry, numbers of whom, half-soldiers, half-robbers, had been created by the civil wars which convulsed the kingdom. To seize my horse's bridle and vault into the saddle was the work of an instant, and casting a glance upon my adversary who had fainted from loss of blood, I retreated into a neighboring thicket, where I could observe all that passed, without detection. In a few moments, the tramp of horses came nearer, and a small band of cavalry, headed by a grim old veteran, rode into the open space and halted on the spot where the wounded man lay in his death-like swoon. "By St. George, a dead man," said the leader in surprise, "how came this about?" "Look to him, Hugh, and see if thy leech-craft can avail him aught, or if his soul has gone to kingdom-come." The trooper addressed, dismounted, and after a brief examination, replied carelessly, "The lad is not much hurt, Captain; only a flesh wound,—suppose, as he is a tall young fellow, we enlist him—he will be fit for service very shortly!" "Well thought of, Hugh," was the reply, "strap him on to your belt, and we will soon attend to him! Forward;" and away went the troop, bearing with them the wounded man. I had not interfered, because under the circumstances I thought it the best thing that could be done. He had expressed his intention of joining one of the troops of cavalry which were scouring the country, and chance had thus furnished him with a good introduction; so I rode on my way with a lighter heart and reached my home in safety.

Time passed on, I had never mentioned to Emily or her father my encounter with Albert; and he had sent them the tidings of his having joined a troop of horse about a month after, without alluding to it; so my mind was at ease, and I dismissed him and his jealousy from my recollection, happy in the confiding affection of my betrothed bride, who had consented to our union the ensuing spring.

Several months had elapsed unvaried by any incident, and the summer was fast departing; yet of late, no tidings of Albert had been received by the family at the cottage; rumor too had been busy with his name; it was said that for some act of daring insubordination he had been sentenced to death by a court-martial, but had effected his escape and allied himself to one of the roving troops of disbanded soldiers who were the scourge and devastation of the peaceful citizens; soldiers in war and robbers in peace, in both characters they were equally mercenary and cruel, and tales of their savage cruelties were often related by the peasants at their own firesides. Hitherto, they had contented themselves with prowling in the vicinity of the large cities for the purpose of intercepting wealthy travellers; but of late, a whispered rumor had been circulated throughout the country that one daring band, whose chief had been outlawed and a price set upon his head, had taken refuge among the wild mountain passes, which lay back of the forest in which my castle was situated; but, for my own part, I gave no heed to these rumors, believing them to be no more than the idle inventions of village gossips.

Autumn had at length arrived, and the forest with its withered foliage and hoary rocks presented a gloomy prospect to the eye of the wayfarer; the deep green of the leaves had given place to a pale and sickly yellow, and as the wind swept with a sighing sound through the lofty oaks, their withered leaves came fluttering down, while those, which had already yielded up their verdant covering, stood like giants, stretching their mighty arms over the scene of cheerless desolation below. Such was the general aspect of the forest, when Emily and myself wandered forth one evening, enlivening the monotony of our ramble by planning the course of our future life and indulging in bright anticipations of coming happiness. Thus pleasantly engaged we sauntered on, until the sun sank down behind a mass of angry black clouds which were ominously gathering in the Western sky, and Emily, looking upward with an anxious gaze, remarked, that we had better hurry home before the storm. Scarce had the words left her lips, before a peal of thunder burst above our heads, accompanied by a flash, so vivid, as to blind our eyes for the instant, and then large heavy drops of rain began to plash heavily upon the withered leaves which strewed our path; while the wind, which had hitherto been sweeping furiously along, suddenly lulled as if collecting its strength, in that awful calm which always precedes the full fury of the storm. Taking advantage then of the brief respite afforded me, I hurried the terrified girl along, and had already gained a sight of the cottage, when I heard the wind come sweeping on like a lion roaring for his prey, and the next moment, the full fury of the tempest fell on our devoted heads.

Nerved by the danger in which Emily was placed, I dragged along her almost inanimate form, and had begun to flatter myself that all danger was over, for we were now within a hundred yards of the cottage, when a bright glare of light blazed into my eyes, scorching my very brain, accompanied by a peal of thunder which appeared to strike the oak under which we stood: stunned and blinded by the shock, the earth seemed to rock beneath my feet, I staggered for a moment like a drunken man, and then fell so heavily against the oak, that I lay stunned and insensible. How long I lay in that death-like swoon I know not; slowly I revived, and when full consciousness returned to me the moon was riding high in the heavens. At first, all that passed seemed more like a troubled dream than a reality, but suddenly the truth flashed upon my bewildered brain; weak and wounded as I was, I sprang to my feet and shrieked the name of Emily! A thousand echoes caught up the name and sent it back, but no human tongue replied. Had she deserted me! I cast my eyes towards the cottage, and my blood was frozen in my veins; where that tasteful dwelling had stood, was now a mass of blackened and shattered ruins; the thunder bolt had stricken it, and it was the concussion only which had felled me blind and bleeding to the earth. But where were Emily and her father? I looked around but could see no trace of them; the earth around had been torn up by the hoofs of horses; but I saw no trace of a human form. With a fearful presentiment of evil, I rushed to the ruins of the cottage; I tore aside, with frantic eagerness, the shattered boards which impeded my view, but they were not there. Relieved at heart, I was about to turn away, when suddenly, beneath a massive pillar, something caught my eye resembling a human form; to rush forward and heave at the massive weight until the drops stood upon my brow, was the work of an instant; but the pillar remained immovable; again, with the energy of desperation, I strained against it, and as the pillar rolled heavily aside, the crushed and mangled form of the old man met my view—the pillar had fallen upon him, and crushed him beneath its ruins!—Years have rolled away since that ghastly spectacle met my eye; I have since seen Death in every shape he can assume; I have dashed on my war horse over dead and dying wretches on the tented field; I have watched the victims of disease perishing with nameless agonies in the loathsome lazaret-house; I have witnessed the despairing struggles of shipwrecked mariners when the good ship went down amid the waters and I alone was saved; but all these scenes of woe and agony have not been able to efface from my memory the sight which met my view in that lonely forest. Calm as if in sleep the old man's body lay, save that his white hairs were stained with the blood which oozed from his fractured temple; while the death-spasm had convulsed his lips into a sardonic sneer of unutterable agony. I gazed, like one stupified, for a time upon the corpse, but my heart was hardened into stone by my loss, and I did not shed a tear for the miserable old man. I even experienced a kind of relief since I was now convinced that Emily was safe; but whither and how had she disappeared? I carefully surveyed the ground again, and was convinced that a troop of horsemen had visited the spot, and these probably had carried her away; the more I pondered upon it, the more certain did I become; until a wild scheme of tracing her suggested itself to my mind, which I departed to put in execution.

Returning to my castle, I despatched a band of my retainers to enter the body in my family vault, and having performed the last sad offices for the dead, prepared to commence my search for my lost Emily. But I determined to go alone, and therefore summoned to my side my favorite hound "Ranger;" he was a noble animal, black as jet, with a tawny muzzle; age had stiffened his limbs and dimmed the fire of his eye; but had not impaired his strength or fidelity. He had been thoroughly trained by my father, and on his sagacity I placed my chief reliance. Girding on my trusty sword and followed only by my faithful "Ranger," I again sought the cottage, and with a palpitating heart placed him upon the trail of the troops I intended to trace. Gradually, the fire seemed to kindle in the old hound's eye, he shook his shaggy hide, snuffed the breeze for an instant as if in doubt, and then bounded forward on the trail with a lengthened howl of exultation. With a throbbing heart I followed after: for several hours did the staunch hound pursue the path he had first taken, and I still kept him in sight, until, suddenly diverging from the beaten path, he turned into a narrow sheep track which led to a wild and mountainous part of the country bordering on the river frequented chiefly by the mountain shepherds, men who combined the characters of smugglers and robbers; and Emily was in the power of these lawless men! should I return for a force to wrest her from them, or trust to my own good arm and ingenuity to rescue her? My pride suggested the latter; and setting my teeth with firm resolve, I clambered with fearless intrepidity over the rugged path and leaped the yawning chasms, where a slip would have been certain death. Thus I proceeded, and already the roar of the river had broken upon my ear, when Ranger, who, for the last three hours, had followed the trail with silent pertinacity, now crouched down amid the brushwood and gave a low warning growl. Pressing eagerly forward, I found reason to praise his sagacity; for, scattered on the ground in various groups, were about a dozen men, whose swarthy and truculent countenances would have betrayed their character, had not their arms and accoutrements more plainly indicated it. Most of them appeared to be partially intoxicated, some were playing dice, others engaged in cooking their food; while at the point most distant from me sat two persons who, from the deference with which they were treated, were evidently superior to the rest of the band; and in one of these, though closely enveloped in a huge cloak, I fancied I could recognise the matchless symmetry of my own Emily. All the party were bouted and spurred, and their hard ridden horses proved to me that they were the men I sought. A rapid survey of the ground decided me how to act; cautiously creeping through the undergrowth, I neared the spot where the two principal persons were seated, and saw at a glance the truth of my surmise; but her companion's face was so hidden by his mask, as to evade my scrutiny. My plan was immediately formed, raising my voice, I shouted in a voice of thunder, "Surrender in the Kings name!" and rousing the hound at the same time, he dashed in among them with a deep bay of wrath. The astonished robbers, terrified by the suddenness of the attack, and believing themselves surrounded by an armed force, lost all presence of mind, and disregarding the commands of their leader, leapt upon their horses and scattered in flight. Finding his efforts futile, he turned to Emily and lifting her in his arms as though she had been a child, vaulted with her upon his steed and turned to fly. Rushing forward, sword in hand, I sought to intercept his progress, but plunging his spurs into the sides of the noble animal he rode, he bounded forward, and had I not leaped aside, would have crushed me beneath his hoofs; then, giving him a free rein, he darted off at full speed in the rocky path which led to the river side. As he darted by with the rapidity of a whirlwind, I heard Emily's shriek for help—the sound fired my soul, and urging the hound in pursuit, I turned aside and strained my nerves to reach a deep gorge which I knew he must pass to gain the river, and having gained it, waited with fierce impatience for the arrival of my foe. And a wild and dangerous place it was; the path winding like a thread over a narrow ridge of rocks, presenting a sheer front of two hundred feet to the river below, whose rapid current swept with a roaring sound through its narrow channel at the base, while in the gorge where I stood, the piled-up rocks on either side rendered escape impossible. Nor did I await him long, but a few minutes had elapsed, when the rapid clatter of a horse's hoofs rung upon the flinty soil, as he dashed up the narrow path, while the deep bay of the hound, as nerved by hate he followed on, came from the glen beneath. Already had the horseman gained the cliff which jutted over the precipice, and in a moment more would have been opposed to me in the gorge beneath, when the noble steed he rode, worn down by the desperate efforts he had made to outstrip the fierce blood-hound, whose sullen bay came nearer and nearer, staggered and fell, scarce giving his rider time to extricate himself and his lovely burden. Casting a wild and hurried glance around, and seeing no prospect of escape, the robber drew his sword, and awaited the attack of the fierce hound who was toiling up the steep ascent. But another antagonist awaited him, for, bursting through the impediments between, sword in hand, I confronted him, just as the mask had fallen from his face, discovering the countenance of Albert Hardinge, convulsed with wrath and hate. To Emily, the sight of a basilisk could not have been more fearful!—the adopted brother of her youth an outlawed felon! With a shuddering groan, she hid her face in her hands and turned away. But the outlaw heeded her not! the sight of his hated enemy had lashed him into frenzy; with a savage imprecation he rushed forward, and we would instantly have met in deadly combat, had not Emily sprung forward and clinging to his arm exclaimed, "Spare him, Albert! spare him! By the memory of our childhood I implore you not to stain your soul with the shedding of innocent blood! he knew you not! he could not know you in this strange disguise! and never has wrought you harm!" "Girl!" said the bandit sternly, while the fire of hate flashed from his eyes, "your prayers are idle; my enemy stands before me, and one of us two must die before yonder sun shall sink in the Western sky; plead not with me," he continued, "for I would sell my soul to the foul fiend to ensure my vengeance upon that wretch who has made my life—a curse! and has hunted me down, even now, like a wild beast with his ferocious hound."

Terrified and exhausted, the trembling maiden sunk to the earth; and the silence was only broken by the clash of our weapons, as with the stern intensity of men who fight for life, hand to hand we contended together. On one side knelt Emily, her cheek as hueless as that of the dead, her eyes strained towards Heaven, and her lips moving as though in prayer; on the other side crouched the noble hound, his fierce eye glaring upon us, and ready at a word to spring upon my enemy; while the roar of the river and the clashing of our swords alone broke the stillness of the spot, never before profaned by the unhallowed passions of man. For a time the combat had continued with equal fortune, several wounds had been given and received, and we had mutually paused for an instant to breathe, when the traitor snatched a whistle which hung at his side, and attempted to sound a call for his followers; but I saw and frustrated his purpose, ere he could sound it I was again upon him, and it was evident to us both that the conflict now must shortly terminate; for driven backwards by the violence of my assault, he retreated a few paces until he stood upon the very verge of the precipice. He was now wounded in several places, I too was wounded and bleeding at every pore, but despair gave me strength; each instant, however, I became fainter from loss of blood, and each lunge of my enemy inflicted a new wound; collecting all my remaining energies for one final effort, I parried his thrust, closed in upon him, and flung the whole weight of my body full against him. Exhausted by loss of blood and his previous efforts, the bandit could not resist the sudden shock of my fall; for an instant the wretched man braced his muscles and stood upright; and then, losing his balance, rolled heavily over the precipice, grasping at my collar as he fell, with such frantic energy as to rend the portion he had seized. One despairing cry of agony and hate burst from his lips as he hung suspended by a vine that jutted over the precipice, then releasing his hold in sullen desperation, he passed from our view, and the heavy plunge of his body as it struck the stream beneath, alone announced to us that his erring spirit had passed from time into eternity.

With a deep drawn sigh of relief, I strove to rise from the spot where I had fallen, but the excitement which had hitherto sustained me, was now rapidly subsiding, and exhausted nature asserted her supremacy; as I staggered to my feet, a mighty ocean seemed roaring in my ears, bright flashes streamed before my sight, my brain reeled, and but for the supporting arm of Emily, who sprung forward and sustained me, I would have fallen into the abyss. As it was a dream-like faintness stole over my senses, and I sunk down, as void of sensation as the enemy whom I had destroyed.

What passed for weeks succeeding I only know from the report of others, for all that period I hovered on the confines of life and death; and, when I awoke to consciousness, I was lying, weak and attenuated in my own room, at the farther end of which a female figure was bending over a table, busied in composing some draught or potion for the sick man. A glance satisfied me, that it was not Emily, and a sickening feeling of fear crept over me; as I moved restlessly upon my couch, the female turned and exhibited to my view the features of a comely woman of middle age, but a stranger to me. It was your mother, Reginald! whom Providence had sent on a visit to me, during my absence; and from her I learnt, that Emily was safe and in my castle; and then she reluctantly admitted the fact, that Emily had been ill as well as myself, but was then rapidly convalescing; which was confirmed by the Leech, who entered soon after, and who promised if I kept perfectly quiet that day that I should see her on the next. Satisfied on this subject, I then inquired of my sister the mode in which I had been found, and from her I learnt that the whole household on her arrival were plunged in the deepest affliction at my mysterious disappearance, to which they had no clue, as a day had now elapsed and nothing had been seen or heard of me. At a late hour the family had retired to rest, and my sister was still up in her cabinet, musing upon my strange disappearance, when her attention was excited by a violent scratching at the outer gate; and then the long, loud, melancholy howl of a dog rose upon the midnight air; for some time she paid no attention to it, but the noise was so long continued, that she at length sent the porter to drive the dog away. No sooner had the gate been opened, than old Ranger, covered with dust and foam, staggered into the hall, and again repeated the long howl which first had roused her attention,—which done, he turned again towards the forest. A light flashed upon my sister's mind; she summoned the steward, bade him arm a band of retainers and follow the hound, which was promptly obeyed. Need I describe how they found my lifeless body on the rock, shielded by the devoted girl who had never left me, whose deep affection had served as a protection against the unwonted exposure and fatigue to which she had been subjected; for all of which she felt repaid, when the Leech allowed us for the first time since my illness to see each other; for a time neither spoke, our hearts were too full for words, but we gazed upon each other and felt that we were happy. Happiness is a sovereign restorative, my recovery was so rapid as to astonish the Leech, and I was soon able to enjoy the pleasure of rambling again through the forest with my betrothed. Slowly and unwillingly did the conviction force itself upon me, that a change had been wrought in that perfect figure and faultless face, that her form, each day became thinner, and her step more languid and slow; while a dull hacking cough, which she strove in vain to suppress, became more frequent and distressing. I even ventured to express my apprehensions to her, but she only laughed at my fears, and when I gazed upon her cheek, where always of late there bloomed a bright warm glow, and marked the brilliancy of her eye, flashing with light, my fears did indeed seem idle; but the nameless dread haunted me still. But with the coming winter there could be no longer any doubt; that fatal crimson spot upon the cheek, the accursed hand of the insidious disease—the laboring breath, and the unnatural brightness of the eye—all told that consumption had seized its victim; the excitement and mental anxiety of that fatal night, had been too much for her delicate frame; and the Anaconda-coil of that accursed malady, which no human skill can baffle, had wound itself around that pure being, in whom was centred my only hope of happiness. Who can imagine the tortures I endured, while witnessing the fading of that pure existence, as day by day her hold upon earth was loosened; but God was merciful and she was not doomed to linger long; yet with the blessed self-deception of her disease, she would sometimes cheer up even my sinking heart with plans of happiness for days to come, and kindle up a delusive ray of hope to be quenched in deeper despair. One evening in especial I well remember, nor will it ever be forgotten until I cease to exist; it was the hour of sunset, and we sat together at the casement, watching in silence the glorious drapery of clouds which veiled the setting sun; the weather was so unusually mild, that the casement was open, and for several days she had been so free from pain, that I had flattered myself with a hope of her recovery; upon her mind, however, there seemed a settled conviction, whether favorable or otherwise I could not tell; but on this evening, as half supporting her slender form, we sat within the casement, the calm tranquillity of her features inspired me with hope, and clasping her attenuated hand within my own, with all the eloquence of true and warm affection, I besought her to become my bride, that I might bear her to the sunny clime of Italy, and baffle the insidious disease which had bowed her almost to the grave. As she listened to my earnest and impassioned words, a glow came over her pale face and she hid her face upon my shoulder; but in a moment more she raised her head and fixing her eye full of strange light full upon my own, she answered me: "Reginald," she said in a low, earnest tone that sank to my heart. "a love like yours deserves a rich return, and I have loved you as few have ever loved before; almost to idolatry,—and now that all the other shadows of earth are fading away before my dying eyes, your image mingles in my thoughts of the future, and gives me the sole pang I feel at leaving earth and its vain shows behind me!"

"Talk not of death," I cried wildly, "a love like mine should be omnipotent with a kind Creator! Be mine, and we shall yet live and be happy!" A smile of heavenly sweetness illuminated her pale face.—"We part for a time, oh, Reginald!" she said, "but we will meet again to part no more."

"Where! where!" I cried.

"In heaven," was the reply; and then, the high excitement which had sustained her, suddenly giving way, she sank fainting in my arms. At that moment, the hound beneath the casement gave a long wailing howl which thrilled through my frame, as stooping down I took the pale hand, which responded not to my pressure; I looked into her face; it was hushed in the stillness of death; with the last word she had uttered, her pure spirit had taken its flight to a better world; and I was alone with the dead! Stunned by the suddenness of the blow, I sat for a time in a state of stupor lethargy, holding that cold hand in mine. I was not roused from that state of tearless apathy until the corpse of her I loved was laid within the vault, where reposed the bones of my ancestors; then suddenly consciousness was restored to me, and with it convulsive agony; with a howl like that of a wild beast, I darted into the forest, followed by my faithful hound, and was soon lost to the sight of the anxious menials who pursued me!

For three years after, I was the tenant of a mad-house—but my family kept the secret; and when I emerged from it, I was sound in mind, but dead in heart; a cold, stern, callous man, who called no man friend; and shunned the presence of woman. Since that time I have seen and suffered much, but the events I have recorded are as fresh in my memory as though they happened but yesterday. And now, oh Reginald! thou hast heard the cause which made me the cold worldling men deem me! May my sad history be a warning and a lesson unto you. Farewell!

CHAPTER II.

"There are some who only strive themselves to raise
Through pompous pride and foolish vanity.
In the eyes of people, they put all their praise."

"Fools indeed drop the man in their account,
And vote the mantle into majesty."—Young.

With your permission, reader, we will take a few backward steps in the calendar of time, and look in upon a family circle, with whom the web of our story now, necessarily, weaves for your notice. It is then, a few mornings before the one mentioned in our first chapter, that we wish to introduce the Browns to your friendly acquaintance. In a back room of small dimensions, a breakfast table was laid, and if, when looking around, you find life's shifting panorama not quite so pleasing to the cultivated eye and taste, as when we lingered in that of the aristocratic Mrs. Clifton, you have only to wisely reflect, how constantly the axis of fashion turns upon vicissitude, and that truly one half of the world know not how the other half live. Every article of furniture in the said room was plain, rather coarse, though comfortable, as also that of the said breakfast table. Instead of a richly chased silver urn, there was a plain brown crockery coffee pot, with a set of common white china placed on a half worn waiter—before which, was seated the mistress of the house, dispensing the graceful duties of that meal. Mrs. Brownslow was a large, fat woman, whose rubicund face beamed as much with the flush of good nature as from the plethora of health; her heart was, no doubt, as warm as the freely coursing blood through her ponderous structure of mortality. A cap of multitudinous ruffles, ornamented with pea green ribbon, rested carelessly upon a foretop of light hair, which was pushed broadly from her face, displaying her large features in bold relief, while the long strings which, even in winter, proved too great a confinement for her freedom of respiration, floated over her broad neck. A dark merino shawl was pinned over her shoulders, and a once slate-colored bombazine loosely fitted her obese figure. So looked the well-meaning Mrs. B., as she briskly poured out the coffee for her husband. Glance at him readers—did you ever behold a more contradictory opposite-looking pair yoked in conjugal bondage! Mr. Brownslow was a short, lean-shaped man—his every feature sharp and keen, with a nose as red as the glaring bricks of his house, an eye quick, clear and searching, his forehead open as day, while his crown would have proved rather an unsafe resting-place for any impertinent fly, so sleek was its baldness—but no persuasion could induce him to repair time's damages, so long as the thin edge of gray hair still garnished his head piece. Every thing was in perfect harmony about Mr. B's dress—his drab coat and pantaloons were never suffered to look dull from the relief of any other colored vest or neckcloth—from time immemorial, each article had retained its original shade, unassisted by any ostentatious effort of fashion. There was, likewise, the same uniformity in his manners, which were invariably kind, though blunt to all, while a vein of good humor and sterling common sense generally marked his conversation.

"Wife," said he, taking his second cup, "I fear you are ruining our girls; they hardly think it worth while to eat a meal with us, since they returned from school. Pray where are they this morning?"

"No wonder, Brownny, you are such a plain mechanical sort of a man; breakfast, dinner and supper must be exactly with the click of the clock, and the poor things have hardly time to appear, before you are off to the shop, at least, so they say. They have been away from us so long, I dislike now to oversee them too severely."

Mr. B. drew from his pocket a large red handkerchief, and took refuge in a loud blowing of his nose, which operation had hardly been completed, when the eldest daughter, Milly, made her appearance, attired in all the negligé possible; she slightly inclined her head to her parents, as she quietly took the seat offered her by Mrs. B., who asked in the softest tone, "what will you have, dear, this morning?"

"Have you no thé vert, mamma? I told you I could not relish the café our cook makes."

Mr. B's cup was set down. "Pray what is that—any new drink for ladies—I thought this was an age of temperance for them, as well as we men folks!"

"Bless me, Papa, it is nothing more than what you call tea and coffee. You must excuse me, I have lived so long with a French family, I forget I am often using an unfamiliar language to you."

"Well, here comes Josee; I suppose she'll want some such thing abob too, for her breakfast."

"I'll promise papa, never to want any thing but what is reasonable, if he will drop the vulgar cognomen, Josee. It shocks my auricular sense, and refined taste."

The second daughter sank into a chair nearest Mr. B., looking more languidly interesting than her sister.

"Why I am sure you were named after your own mother, and I know she never was ashamed of it! What shall I call you?" added he, fondly laying his hand on her head.

"Josephine—a proud name too, since Napoleon said it was one of music to his ear. Don't you know all abbreviations are obsolete, and show a decided plebeian taste. Sister was always called Emilie by our French governess, any thing but plain Milly; I am immediately carried to the vulgar savory kitchen when I hear it."

"Well, well," returned Mr. B., placing his knife and fork systematically across his plate. "this is truly a new-fangled age of new-fangled sentiments. Every thing is turned upside down, even folks' names, the only inheritance a poor man can leave his children. I suppose Peter will put in his voice for a Frenchified alteration!"

"I think well he may," remarked Emilie, "and if you don't want to shock every nerve within me, don't call him Peter. How much more euphonious Pierre falls on the ear!"

"You-phonious? what's that? I guess it will be a long time before Pete's dull ear for music, could make him like an you-olian harp, as I suppose that's what you mean?"

Emilie and Josephine bent a frowning look of contempt upon the smiling face of the old man, while the former answered with infinite dignity:

"It is only a word, quite common, and conveying much softness of sound, which you know Pierre studies, as all of us should, to acquire."

"And pray what has become of Mr. Pare, I suppose he is lounging in his bed, indifferent about his breakfast and every thing else?"

"Mamma is always thoughtful and kind enough, to reserve our dear brother's déjeuné."

"There it is again," cried the wonder-looking Mr. B.: "I'm sure this is a very sun-shiny day, he need not wait for a brighter or clearer one to leave his bed."

"La, Mr. B., you are worse to teach French than I am. I know what Emilie means by day-shunay, it is simply what we call breakfast, and I am sure much better sounding, for I never did see any sense in the word break your fast. But the English language, as Pierre very often says, is entirely too verbose."

"And your mouth is fixed for Pare too," added the good humored husband; "the whole set of you are fast loosing the little good sense Nature ever blessed you with, by your Frenchy imitations. Well, you use a successful weapon in driving me to a more suitable place, my shop-room."

Mr. B. rose to go, but as he paused before the fire to take his accustomed warming, Josephine glided from her seat, and affectionately threw her arms around his neck, while she begged him to be seated.

"A few moments, dear Papa: I have a petition to make, which, if you grant, I'll even consent to be called Josee, provided you don't carry the name into the parlor."

"Well, what do you want; something in the way of a new dress, bonnet, or some such flummery, I dare say?"

"Neither, Papa, we want to have a soirée; say, won't you give us your consent?"

"A what!" said the puzzled Mr. B., "what the mischievous is a sworay? Is it any thing the color of my sorrell horse?"

"Oh dear! Mr. B., how you do talk, and shockingly butcher the Frarnsa language. I am sure you have often heard of swora's, for you came home last night, and said the city was in an uproar about the Hamilton party, and Pierre told you it was called a musical swora."

"It means then a party," replied the old man, giving way to a hearty burst of laughter. "Beg your pardon, Josee; I actually thought you wanted a horse, or some sort of an animal, as now-a-days you are too Frenchy to walk, or do like other folks."

"Yes, Papa, we want to give a party; but please call it soirée, and now give us your kind consent," whereupon, Josephine twined her arms closer around his neck.

"Why it will take all the coats and cloth in my shop to pay for the fixins, and then Josee (I mean your mother) and I will have to sit up long past ten—the next morning I should not be able to cross my poor aching legs upon the counter."

I did not think you were niggard, Mr. Brownlow, with all your dullness. You know very well you are free from debt, and can very conveniently incur the expense—nor will one coat or inch of cloth be missing in the store. Besides, I am sure you can retire just when you choose, there's Pare can be master of ceremonies."

Mrs. B. had almost shook off her cap in the vehemence of the moment.

"Go on, go on with your notions. I'll consent, make yourselves the biggest sort of fools while you are at it. I never like to see pretension of any sort, and always go for work being well done, the whole cabbage, or none at all, and a half made coat is no coat to come from under an honest tailor's goose."

"Then you say oui," cried Josee, rubbing her hands with delight. "Thank you ten thousand times, Papa, now give us a carte blanche, for every thing necessary, and we will be satisfied."

"That I can't exactly do, for I don't own a coat in the wide world, save a small trundle one, used in the shop. But you can send Dick to my friend, the coachmaker's, and hire one of his best, as I suppose you want every thing of the latest cut. Will that suffice, Josee?"

It was Josephine's turn to laugh, for she was too happy to look her usual frowns when her father misunderstood her French phrases. She was about to correct him, when her mother impatiently observed:

"Do pray let him go to the store, for out of it he knows nothing, not even refined words. I really thought, Mr. B., you were a man of quick parts. I'm surprised we have such intelligent and well-informed children."

"You need not, love, for you know while I was courting you, Jim Porker, the butcher, said you were entirely too smart for any but a genteel tailor."

like myself, so our chicks took after you." In spite of Mrs. B.'s stout resistance, the good man gave her a loud kiss on her flushed cheek, and took refuge from the evidently aroused elements, in a speedy exit.

"I do declare, though your father is a good sort of a man, and we have managed to live very peaceably together, yet I always thought he cared more about making coats, than cultivating his mind. He never will lose his blunt natural ways, which actually make me ashamed of him now, especially when you all do every thing to appear genteel."

"I sincerely wish Papa would 'sink the shop in company,' as the old adage says. We never can forget he is a tailor; and just think, Emilie, they were a calibre Napoleon said, should only consist of the lame, impotent and worthless, while he always selected for his army, mechanics of all grades, but who could boast of manly vigor and bravery of character, declaring that such requisites were incompatible with a tailor's occupation. I do believe I had rather be the daughter of any other tradesman or mechanic, than what I am."

"Well, we can't help it, quietly replied Emilie; it remains for us to use every exertion to appear the smoother pure ourselves—if we can only manage to keep Papa out of the way when we have our soirée. Mamma, can't you make him retire early, and you know when we are fairly introduced into société, he can sit in this room, while we occupy the parlor!"

"Leave all that to me," said the acquiescing Mamma. "I can do more with the good soul than any body else, because, in general, I don't rouse him from his lair of ignorance, by using French words. Come let us talk about the sworay. Who are to be invited? I suppose, as we have a pew in a genteel church, and I belong to it, we could very properly invite some of the families we sit near, and have heard something about."

"Never mind, we'll manage all that, only let us consult about the preparations. As we have no French cook, and you, Mamma, are so ignorant of that style of cooking, we must hire one, and order a good deal from a French confectioner."

"Pray what do you want, that I don't know how to make?" asked Mrs. B. in a defying tone.

"There's a blanc-mange and floating island, that I've heard you say, you never even saw."

"Don't call the thing blarny-marnge, I always am reminded of Jim Porker's talk about the Irish and his hogs. If you have the nick-nackries cooked at the confectioners, I know enough of meats, to have them served at home."

"No, no, Mamma, that would be still worse, for you know gentlemen always go more for well-dressed meats, than the ornamental things. We can very easily send for Mons. Nicola, and have it all done by him."

"Well, draw off the list of necessary things; as we are acquainted with the butcher, we can probably get them cheaper, for I begin to be sensible of the terrible expense the business will cost."

Emilie commenced—"Ragoûts of all kinds, Petits pieds, Cotelettes de mouton, Gibier, Fricassée, Agneau, Jambon, and"—

"I never heard of such curious named meats," interrupted Mrs. B.

"They are in French, Mamma, which you know Mons. Nicola will understand."

"Well, I suppose you don't want any vegetables, though I think you are making a fair dinner of it."

"Now we'll enumerate the ornamental things. Gâteaux of every variety, Confitures, Des-glaces, Gelée, Dragées, besides Morceaux friands of every selection."

"I wonder if the people will be able to swallow such queer stuffs; do pray send them to a sure enough Frenchman, for fear of any mistakes," rejoined Mrs. B., with an anxious face. "Well now, what are you going to have in the way of drinkables, or must it be a cold water affair?"

"Never," exclaimed Emilie; "it would be too niggard and plebeian not to have wines. By-the-by, Richard, (turning to the servant who had entered, I wish Papa would not call our sommelier, Dick) go to your young master's room, and tell him your mistress desires to speak to him. Pierre will arrange the beverages."

In a few moments he returned, saying, Mas Pete had just got up and would be down soon as he dressed his-self.

"Bless me! Richard, we will have to give you a few fashionable drillings too! What a trouble it gives one to appear genteel, when they have not been raised so," said Josephine petulantly.

After a sufficient time spent in dallying at his morning's toilet, Peter Adolphus Brownslow descended to make his appearance in the breakfast-room. A calico robe de chambre, lined with plush flannel, was folded around his Apollo-like limbs, which almost concealed their slender proportions. Light hair hung around his low, narrow forehead; not a wavy line marred its sleek straight fall, from which peeped pale blue eyes deeply sunken, while his whole face was sicklied o'er with a paler "cast of thought." Slippers of silken softness contained his small but misshapen feet—on his delicate looking hand, there glistened a ring of immense size and brilliancy, which he gracefully exhibited when pushing back the hair from his brow, while he slowly took the chair, Mrs. B. bustlingly placed for him by the fire.

"What is the cause of my being aroused from my slumbers so early?" drawled he. "The gray dawn peered above the Eastern horizon, ere I sought 'Nature's soft nurse,' and even then, my thoughts were so active, my imagination so restlessly brilliant, I found no repose in her sweet arms. It seems I have scarcely slept an hour."

"We'll not trouble you until you eat your da- shunay; it is quite warm and tempting, you have only to say what you want," tenderly remarked the fond Mrs. Brownslow.

The two girls, with difficulty, restrained their impatience, while Pierre continued without deigning to speak, slowly sipping his coffee. No sooner had he whirled his chair from the table, announcing that he had finished, than they eagerly commenced.

"Papa has given us permission to have a soirée, and as we have arranged the preparations, you must assist us in setting down the necessary beverages," said Emilie.

"I must first know for whom and what sort of people the beverages are to be selected. I hope you will only invite the elite of société—those styled the first in standing. As it is the first we have ever given, we should be very cautious about this important step." Peter actually manifested some animated interest in the matter.

"That we certainly mean to do—to night we'll write the invitations—it is necessary to attend to the preparations before any thing else."

Peter took the offered pencil from Josephine's hand, to set down what was required. Mrs. B.'s eyes dilated with greater astonishment than at what her daughters had named, when he slowly read it to her.

"Eau de vie,"—"dear me!" interrupted she, "what is the use of having any cologne?" Peter went on, "vin de Madère, vin de Bourgogne, vin de Champagne, vin de Bordeaux, vin d'Orporto, besides lemonade and ponche."

"Well, I never heard of so many vins; I suppose they are composed of vinegar and something else. Suppose we have brandy and gin in the place of some, for you know your father don't drink watery or self-made liquors!"

"Mamma, the first is the French for brandy, but for heaven's sake abandon gin, I would fancy our sitting room converted into a liquor shop."

Peter almost raised himself from his reclining position at the very idea of gin.

"Your uncle Tom will be here, and as he keeps such a sh—store, he'll be sure to criticise so many vins."

"Not he," returned Peter disdainfully; "we have only to send the order to a wine merchant, and all will be as it should. I cannot spare any more of my time from the delightful labor of study. I have a good deal of writing to do, and several letters from fellow students to answer, so you must go on without my assistance. I may have a few leisure moments this evening, when we will make out our list of guests." Mr. Peter Adolphus gathered around his person the folds of his robe de chambre, and with an air of kingly dignity he left the room.

The day was spent in removing this and that piece of old-fashioned furniture, and replacing those more modern, some borrowed, but the greater number hired.

"This vulgar gilt mantle mirror must come down; who ever heard of such being in any gentle house, they are only seen in taverns, and all those coarse pictures of horses, hounds and daubed female faces must be swept from the room. Those windsor chairs are intolerable, so are the carpets; but, however, the former are not required now, it is the fashion to stand altogether, and as we will have dancing, the latter can be removed out of sight."

Emilie and Josephine made every necessary arrangement with all possible despatch, while poor Mrs. B. stood by petrified with astonishment at the fate of her "dear high priced mirror," and Brown's pictures, that had hung up ever since their marriage, but old things and old people must give way before the rapid tide of modern inventions. Evening found them seated around a table, consulting about the most important duty, enumerating those to be invited. Pierre Adolphus had emerged from his morning's dishabille, and now appeared in the full blaze of parlor costume, also Emilie and Josephine, who, to tell the truth, were quite pretty and delicate looking girls. The old man sat beside another table, engrossed in the interesting details of "prices-current" in his daily paper, while Mrs. B.'s fingers were dexterously seeding some plumbs, "which," as she said, "did not require any knowledge of French to understand." Richard, much to their relief, soon entered with a large basket filled with beautiful embossed cards, paper envelopes, seals and ribbons. In a few moments the girls were rapidly calling a host of names for Peter to write.

The Hamiltons, Montaignes, Greys, Westons, Cliftons and Mr. Sinclair, whom you know very well.

Mr. Brownslow's paper fell from his hand.

"What the deuce are you talking about, children. Those big fish never troubled you any, and what should you be bothering yourselves about them?"

"Papa, we did not insinuate having been troubled by any of them, we intend inviting them to our soirée," remarked Josephine.

The old man nearly turned his didapper person out of his chair.

"And pray are you fools enough to think they will belittle themselves so much as to come here. Why, I suppose Miss Almeria Clifton would not hesitate to trot your invitation back, and ask you what was meant by it. Indeed, I think she would serve you right, and I actually would not be sorry."

"True politeness pertains less to rank than to real goodness of heart, and fashionable, aristocratic people generally possess it—therefore, we need not fear such an impolite act from the well-bred Miss Clifton, who smiled upon me most graciously when I told her Mr. Sinclair was a ci-devant friend of mine." Peter's pale blue eyes looked volumes as he bent it upon his amazed father, who was immediately silenced. The cards were all closed in envelopes, which were directed in the most delicate hand possible, and that very important business was completed. Mr. B. finished his paper.

"Well," said he, "I only want to know what I am to do for company. I suppose, as I have to bear the brunt of the expense, I may cabbage in a few old friends, for I am sure I do not know any you've mentioned, save in a business capacity."

"Who do you wish, Papa?" asked Josephine, anxiously.

"Why, there's Jim Porker, you know, wife, it would not do to slight him, he was your old beau, and he might think I still had a grudge against him. Tom Jones, my fellow tradesman, who has done me so many favors; John Shanty, the carpenter; Bob Fletcher, the coachmaker; Bill Dixon, the grocer, and—"

"Mon Dieu! I should never have courage to show my face," warmly exclaimed Peter, "if such vulgar specimens of mechanics are permitted to mingle promiscuously with the ton of société. The world would cry 'Molloy was the mean' at Mr. Brownslow's soirée."

Josee had recourse to her usual coaxing, for she certainly appeared to be the favorite with Papa, and notwithstanding Mr. B.'s sincere friendship for his old chums, he was forced to resign his will by resigning them, his wife adding the consolatory remark:

"You know, old man, we can have a scrap dinner and invite those you desire, besides many more—for I dare say they would enjoy a good warm meal in the day time much more than the flummeries at a soirée."

Calling them a set of run mad Frenchified apes, the good unpretending soul retired for the night.

All was arranged to the entire satisfaction of Peter, the girls and Mrs. B., and early the next morning, Richard was rigged out in an old cast off suit of Pierre's—a fine basket given him, filled with the precious, beautiful and highly scented invitations, to be duly delivered. The Brownslows were determined to astonish even the Hamiltons and Cliftons.

To inspire proper esteem and consideration should be the grand object of our conduct; for without it, the relations of society would be a humiliation and punishment, but no one can secure such, unless he is "armed within" and self-sustained by true principles, for 'tis only

"Moral grandeur that makes the mighty man."

Blank and crest fallen would the aspiring Brownslow have felt, could they have followed Richard, and have beheld the looks of astonishment, the smiles of scorn, the shrugs of contempt, the words of ridicule manifested by those invited, when their glossy cards were received. But ignorance was indeed to them a bliss—that gift to "see ourselves as others see us" was denied them, and with eager fluttering hearts, they awaited the day of their surpassing soirée. It came—Sol arose in all his glorious radiance—even the heavens looked propitious—but the morn had not basked long in his sunny rays, ere there poured in a number of apologetic cards and notes for the Misses Brownslow—until the few left who had accepted, would indeed be too few to term the gathering, a soirée. All they could do, was to hurriedly write invitations to the most genteel of their acquaintance amongst the tradesmen and mechanics—as it would never do, after Mons. Nicola had succeeded so admirably in his preparations, and after all their trouble and expense, not to make some sort of a display. Mrs. B. declared it would be an unheard of waste of French good things—and at any rates, there was some consolation, that Miss Almeria Clifton had not declined the invitation, neither had Mr. Sinclair. Never mind, the Hamilton and Montague's notes would show to wonderful advantage in the card basket—people would see they were acquaintances of theirs—and that was some honor in the eyes of many. Poor Richard's second tour was not so extended, but certainly his success was greater, for he even brought back answers, which were highly favorable, and still hoping, that all would pass off as it should, the girls, jaded and worried almost to exhaustion, retired to their chamber to array themselves for the soirée; and whilst they are attending to the onerous duties of the toilet we will return to Almeria Clifton.

Happy indeed is that man who "Is pleased with his own state, and were he free to choose Would make his fate his choice."

CHAPTER III.

"Vain show and noise intoxicate the brain, Begin with giddiness, and end in pain."—Young.

"The bubble bursts,—and we are what we are."
Wordsworth.

Although it is not altogether compatible with American refinement and common usage, to be introduced into a ladies' private dressing room, but then, reader, as we have fallen in so sociably by the way, during our narrative we'll still continue our reserved familiarity, and daringly enter the sacred precincts of Miss Almeria Clifton's boudoir, where we will no doubt become initiated into some of those mighty occult doings, which the unweary finger of vanity never fails to perform. Before a small table, with a looking glass before and one behind—covered with pomatums, perfumery, little boxes, and all the various paraphernalia of a lady's toilet, sat Almeria Clifton, preparing for the Brownslows soirée. Notwithstanding she had selected one of her plainest dresses—saying "any thing would be good enough for such a party"—yet the same artful array of her face and head-gear had to be as carefully studied, as if she was to appear in the saloons of the most fashionable aristocrats. Her art even compelled and taught her to become her own coiffeur, for not even to one of that dexterous race, would she have dared to expose her natural deficiencies. Are you a phrenologist reader? because I do not know a finer head than hers to give a practical illustration of the organ of secretiveness, whose size was exceeding belief, while that of conscientiousness was lamentably deficient. The rouge was rubbed in—then the white powder—the tweezers and crayon made the brow perfect—the vermilion tint clearly defined the fresh lip—and those polished ivories were securely fixed—while the delicate hand and correct eye carefully adjusted those dark glossy ringlets in a-la-mode style, as she twined a wreath of white moss roses, so emblematic of youth, in the rich plaits behind. It was finished—and that to perfection—at least so thought Almeria, when she rose to ring her bell for a servant.

"Send Evora to me," said she impatiently, "I am waiting for her to arrange my dress."

She was quickly obeyed—Evora stood by her with the dress in her hand, and never had a queen a more beautiful waiting maid—for, even in her plain, every-day dress, she looked more lovely than all the most studious art could ever have rendered her imperious companion. After enduring, with angelic patience, her many petulant flouts—unkind remarks, and discontented airs, Evora at length had the satisfaction of seeing Almeria give the finishing touch to her toilet.

"I never saw you so plainly dressed," said she gently—"I think Edward Lorimor's eye will be attracted by your charming simplicity, for he always admires such in a lady's appearance."

Had not the rouge been so thickly laid upon Almeria's cheek, a slight increase of color would have been perceived on hearing Evora's remark. She unkindly pushed away the soft hand from her arm, that had just then assisted in clasping her bracelet.

"I suppose such is the bait you always use to lure him," replied she, tauntingly, "as also that 'eternal smile' you wear, and naïveté of manner. I do despise so much of art and intrigue in a young girl—especially when it is practised on one so old as Edward Lorimor."

More changing than the evening sky of an Eastern clime, was the face of Evora Beaufort, as she listened to so unmerited a charge. At first, her mild hazle eye beamed with a dazzling lustre, and her playful smiling lip was curled with the deepest indignation—but the emotions of anger or revenge were not permitted to impress their seal long upon a face formed to be a mirror of every amiable feeling—those expressions passed away, giving place to the same sweetness that always lingered there. She silently clasped the other bracelet, and as she lifted her head, a gem, brighter than those gleaming on Almeria's arm, was the only trace of aroused feeling, resting on her changing cheek.

Mrs. Clifton met her daughter in the parlor, saying "she only awaited her departure, to attend her regular prayer meeting, as she supposed she did not care how early she went to the Brownslows—for they would doubtless think every thing she did was right—I am glad," added she, "you have wisely spared an elegant dress from the contamination of such rough people as you will probably meet there."

"Oh! I dare say some of the first will accept, as I understand every body is invited,—if I did not think so, I can assure you I would not go. I have promised Mr Sinclaire to pay a visit with him before we drive there, as it will be immaterial how short a stay we make in such an element. Here Evora, while I'm gone, trim my pelerine with lace, I shall want it to-morrow."

"Yes, rejoined Mrs. C., if you finish it time enough, don't forget my handkerchief—you have been very idle lately. Be sure to put out the hall lamp after we leave—for oil is so very expensive."

Mr. Sinclaire was punctual to the hour appointed, and soon the mother and daughter left Evora alone with her own sad thoughts and a plenty of work to employ her time. But solitude nor work could ever have so shaded her bright face with such sadness, as she leaned it upon her fair hand, while the long curls fell unrestrained o'er her bedewed cheeks.

"Ah, what an unenviable lot is mine," murmured she,—"treated little better than a menial—the target for unwearied scorn and petulance—while a kind word scarce ever bids me forget the many so wounding to my feelings. Can it be my fault? Perhaps I am not so grateful as I ought to be, and do not evince it in my conduct towards Mrs. Clifton—and sometimes I am heedless and resentful towards Almeria—but really she is so very unkind, and often unjust in her remarks to me. Well, I'll make renewed exertions to please them more than I have done, so I won't despair yet awhile. But oh! mine is indeed a heart-wearing and a heart-aching servitude—it is truly a sad thought, that not one being in the wide world cares for me now."

"Will you not except me?" said a kind voice, as a hand was laid gently upon her bowed head.

Evora started, as if some horrible apparition had appeared before her—but when she beheld those friendly eyes beamingly bent upon her face, she smiled joyously, and eagerly seized his hand, exclaiming—

"How you alarmed me, Mr. Lorimor—a voice from the tombs could scarcely have horrified me more. I was in the very depths of the deepest blues, and giving vent to an unusual fit of discontent—I am glad you have dispersed it, for I by no means delight in such. Pray, how did you enter the room so silently, without even ringing the bell?"

"I met a servant going out, who told me I would find no one at home but yourself, in the parlor, and so great was his hurry, that he permitted me to be my own usherer. Your vaporous fit was so absorbing and spell-binding, I might probably have heard some interesting and tell-tale soliloquy; however, your last words were all I heard—what a lament for one so young and lovely as you, in which I hope you will admit of some exceptions. He then drew her to a sofa like some favorite child and seated himself beside her.

"Certainly," replied she, looking innocently into his face, "I always except you—at least I do in my heart, if I dont in my expressions. Would that every one were as kind to me as you."

"One must indeed have a heart destitute of all those refreshing springs of kindness and affection, and a nature colder than an iceberg, not to feel an interest and love for you."

"Ah! you view me with a too partial eye," said she, taking his hand and pressing it to her soft round cheek; but why are you not at the party to night, for I understand the world and his wife are invited!"

"An hour hence will be time enough to go, as it is already early. I came for the purpose of spending the interim with you, thinking I would find you alone."

Edward Lorimor's voice and countenance expressed an evident embarrassment, that caused Evora to look at him inquiringly.

"How old are you, Evora?" asked he, musingly. "I presume you are not of that particular age, to deem the question impertinent!"

"Not I indeed," said she, laughing—"though Mrs. Clifton sometimes says I am too old to be so full of childish fancies and ways—and then she tells me I am too young to be in the parlor, or to think of dressing fashionably. Let me see (counting her fingers) I shall soon be sixteen—dear me! it seems but yesterday when I heard the last injunction of my dying aunt, bidding me to be an obedient, respectful child to Mrs. Clifton, who had kindly promised to take charge of me. That was three long years ago."

How beautiful even when sad and tearful was the face of Evora Beaufort! It would have been difficult to have decided when she looked most lovely. She was one that charmed the gaze because a soul was there, and who seemed "To know no language, save the language of the heart."

Her companion remained silent.

"And pray," continued she, after a pause, "may I put the same question to you; for if Almeria thinks you so very old, I know I do not."

Edward Lorimor's handsome face lost its deep shade of seriousness, when he put back the falling curls from the smiling Evora's brow—saying, earnestly,

"Will you promise not to change your opinion when I tell you my age—but probably I had better not, for fear you would then think me too venerable to sympathize with all your joys and sorrows."

"Oh no! you need not fear any such change in me. If you were a Methuselah I would not care, so old father Time spared his sear on your kind heart."

Something trembled upon Edward's lip—but a moment's reflection restrained its expression, and he replied, with some gayety—

"Like you, I will soon see another birth-day, which will be my thirty-sixth. Am I now transformed into an old grand-father, fit only to tell you simple tales?"

"Really you are right old, but not so decidedly ancient as all that. You would be just the age for Almeria Clifton," said Evora, thoughtfully.

"Why not for Evora Beaufort too? Look not so surprised, dear girl, when I add another confession—viz, that I do truly, wholly love you, and would prize this little hand above the value of worlds." He took it and pressed his lips upon it, but no answer fell from Evora, whose look was full of puzzled incredulity. Her young heart lay pulseless, as her hand rested motionless in Edward's, while the power of speech seemed utterly denied her parted lips.

"Yes, Evora, strange as my confession may seem, 'tis as true as truth itself, that I love you; and I find concealment can no longer be preserved, when my happiness is so centred in another. Although more than twice your age, yet the fountain of feelings within my bosom has never before been moved by the spirit of Love. I have looked upon beauty with only a passing admiration—I have mingled with the busy gay in the shining throng of fashion; I have basked in the sparkling light of wit and intellectual fascination—nay, I have seen life in its every phase, but never has my heart been so wholly and magically bound, as by that nameless power, which you alone possess over me. Say then, Evora, that you do not think me too uncongenial for a return of your own fresh and youthful affections?"

Gradually Evora's head fell—while o'er her pale cheek there rushed the tide of eloquent crimson. Edward felt the pressure of his hand gently returned—a few muttered words escaped those beautiful lips—they were sweetly low—but not too faint to escape the eager ear that hung upon each one—whose import doubtless justified the warm caress he bestowed upon the fair girl.

"Truly is my past life of solitary coldness more than fully cancelled by the bliss of this moment," said the happy looking Lorimor.

Perchance, reader, you may not be one to sympathize with the ecstasy of two so happy in mutual love, because there may not thrill an answering echo within your own bosom—and as nothing saddens us more than to turn from mirth and glad faces to our own internal gloom and desolation, we will therefore leave the lovers alone, with their bliss and tender outpourings, for they doubtless, (as all do) desire it.

That night, Edward Lorimor left Evora as her betrothed—and well might the latter fear a reprimand for not finishing her allotted task, yet I am pretty confident those of her own fair sex, (always so sympathizing) who have ever sought that dear retirement, to ponder over an agitating proposal, and indulge in Elysian dreams, will readily excuse the forgetful Evora. As to the judgment of those of sterner moulds, they are too ignorant of the delicate structure and labyrinths of a woman's heart, to be capable of passing a just sentence. We will therefore leave her, to roam through those flowery fields of fancy, as she again and again asks herself, "can it be, that one like him loves so thoughtless and childish a being as myself," while we follow Edward Lorimor to the Brownsnows soirée.

"You are unusually fashionable, Mr. Lorimor," said Almeria Clifton, as Edward greeted her with more than ordinary cordiality. "I congratulate you upon the exercise of such good taste and judgment, in not inhaling such an atmosphere as this so long as I have." She glanced around the room with ineffable contempt, while she leaned with all her graceful ease upon the arm of the Parisian looking Sinclaire. Edward's eye followed hers, but not with the same expression, for his heart was the seat of too much true nobility, and his mind of a cast too elevated to look down upon any fellow being with disdain, when he was the recipient of their courtesy and kindness.

"Your dizzy height of fashionable notoriety has probably subjected you to attentions, that would never be bestowed upon one so humble as myself," remarked he gallantly. "'Tis a dangerous elevation, Miss Clifton, you occupy, which, to many of your worshipped sex, often has proved self-destroying."

"You are likewise unusually complimentary," replied the flattered Almeria. "I had just unwillingly consented to prolong my revolution in this strange orbit until after supper, which consent I do not regret now, that your familiar face beams upon me in this motley crowd. I believe you are slightly acquainted with our hostess and daughters?" Almeria's dark eyes flashed the deepest scorn.

"Yes, and your question reminds me of my neglect in not paying my devoirs to them."

Edward moved from her side.

"Pshaw, they would never be sensible of your remissness. I dare say they know nothing about such forms of civility. I never thought of honoring them thus—for I had no sooner entered the door, than the old lady obsequiously took my shawl and furs, assailing me with a thousand thanks for accepting their invitation. Mons. Pierre begged the honor of being my usherer, and the two simpering girls looked unutterably grateful when I swept past them in all my dignity. Poor things, they also looked imploringly to me for an introduction to Mr. Sinclaire, but I was resolved not to gratify them, or subject him to such an annoyance."

"Is it possible, that any one, of the slightest pretensions to common politeness, could be guilty of such an act of wilful neglect—and permit me to be candid in adding, unkind rudeness," exclaimed Lorimor, with evident disgust. "Excuse me, I cannot incur a similar imputation, by any longer delaying my greetings."

"Pon my word," cried the chagrined Almeria. "Edward Lorimor looked quite ferocious, as if the Brownsnows were worth a resentful feeling. Do mark Mrs. B.'s furnace-like face as she receives his respectful devoirs. If innate nobility depended upon the richness of one's blood, I fancy she would be a pretty full specimen, judging by the mantling color of her peony face. All the lumber of learning, which the small head of Mons. Pierre could contain, would never make him passable—and all the polish of accomplishments, or the highest touch of fashionable dress, would never banish that plebeian stamp of the smirking daughters."

"O scandal, thou sweetener of a feast." Almeria's haughty lip had hardly thus vented her boiling spleen, when Mr. Peter Adolphus Brownsnow reverentially made his obeisance, requesting the honor of her hand, as they "were about to trip the light fantastic toe." Minerva must now drop her helmet, and the rest of her sisters resign their several sceptres to Terpsichore, whose all potent sway would alone be acknowledged.

"Excuse me," replied she, not deigning to look at his stately majesty; "I never dance quadrilles, they are too obsolete since the dear delightful waltz was introduced—besides," added she, "I wish to reserve myself for Gen. Staunton's ball to-morrow night; I prefer being now merely a looker on in Venice."

"Ah! then, I will claim the honor of a waltz with you, as doubtless I may saunter in and flutter for a while in that bright circle, if it be only to escape the tedium of oppressive study." (Poor Peter, what a misfortune to be blessed with so brilliant an imagination, for surely to it alone you are indebted for an invitation to Gen. Staunton's.)

"How delightful, Miss Clifton," continued he, "to 'peep from the loop holes of retreat' upon a giddy world, and still not partake of its follies or weaknesses. My books are my principal companions—no draught is so delightful to me, as those I sip from Hippocrene's pellucid fountain, but occasionally a physical exhaustion subjects me to atrabilariousness, which, however, soon evaporates, when I sun myself in beauty's eye, or deign to jostle amongst the 'mighty stir of this babel' pour passer le temps. By the way, entendez vous le Français?"

Peter carelessly smoothed down his Byronic collar. Almeria drew herself up with all her exclusive dignity, while she scanned Mr. Peter Adolphus from his elaborately curled head, which often caused his doating parents and sisters to wonder "that one so small could carry all he knew," down to his sharp pointed, high heeled boot. At length, as if fully satisfied that that one look was answer enough, she turned to Sinclaire saying—

"Hélas! Monsieur, do you not think a 'little learning is a dangerous thing'?"—and with a loud laugh, she again bent her eye upon the immovable Peter, asking—"Savez vous quiest ce, Monsieur-là, vis-à-vis to your sister Milly?"

"Mr. Jenkins," quickly answered Peter; "you know, Miss Clifton, politeness, interest and unto-ward circumstances often compel us to mingle with uncongenial people gregariously. I dare say poor Emilie is now suffering mentally, in consequence of her present juxtaposition and apparently homiletical intercourse with those around her."

"Pray, who and what is Mr. Jenkins," said Almeria; "he looks very like a shoemaker I have seen in Bonde street. I do believe he is the very identical one, who furnishes our servants shoes. What girl is that dancing with Edward Lorimor—if he is not actually listening as respectfully to her conversation, as if she was a" — Peter interrupted her from finishing her invidious comparison.

"Miss Sawdust is indeed quite a savant young lady, highly accomplished and recently returned from the same boarding school, my sisters were educated at."

"Is that Mary Sawdust, the carpenter's daughter? I might have thought so, for her stiff, straight figure looks as if it had been ruled and lined by her father's measuring rule. I vow there's a milliner's daughter, with her plentiful garden of artificial flowers and dangling ribbons, the fac simile of her mother's last block, and I suppose next to her is the heiress of a mantua-maker, judging by the tight whaleboned fit of her dress. Really, Mr. Sinclaire, you ought to submit to an introduction to some of these ladies, doubtless Mons. Brownlow will perform the ceremony of your presentation."

"It would be supervacaneous for me to assent, as Miss Clifton must be aware her law is my delight—in willing chains she binds me, for 'beauty always draws us by a single hair.'"

Mr. Sinclaire was just at that moment called to another room, and as Almeria reluctantly withdrew her arm from his, Peter bowingly presented his, but she declared the heat of the room was too oppressive to endure such an approximation. Not at all daunted, he still maintained his position, and had just resumed the conversation, when his arm was roughly pulled, while a stentorian voice saluted him:

"How-dye-do, Pete—I'm duced glad to see you at last, for your mother and I had trouble enough in forcing our way through this big jam of a crowd—well, how are you old fellow? I did not expect to see such a grand party when I dropped in to pay you a social, every day visit; I hope I'm nice enough looking, aint I?"

Peter's easy flow of speech was lost in wonder at the vexatious interruption, which was considerably increased, when his eye fell upon his panting mother close behind. Her sleeves were rolled half up, disclosing to view her large red arms, her cap, decorated with orange colored ribbon and flowers, was set more jauntily upon her head, while the longest sort of strings hung upon her broad expansive bust—in her hand, she held a tremendous turkey feathered fan, which she flapped with all the vehemence of a whirlwind across the face of the shrinking Almeria.

"Indeed, you may well complain of the heat," said she, puffing like some steam engine, "the girls would have more coals than usual put in the grate,—we dont mind expense in any thing for our sworay, but I reckon 'tis the breaths of so many persons that makes the heat so overpowering. But grin and endure it my dear, we'll soon be cooled by some des-glaces. Dont you dance? La Pet—Pierre I mean, what in the world has become of your politeness? why dont you ask Miss Almira to join the same cotillion with Emilie and Josephine? I am sure you need not fear being too conspicuous, for your coat fits as well as Mr. Sinclaire's."

Almeria had in vain retreated from the good bustling Mrs. B., until she felt the wall would prevent another move, and she resigned herself to the terrible approximation of mother and son, although the latter's attention had been somewhat monopolized by his intruding friend. "I am glad," continued Mrs. B., "you were so complaisant as to stay and see our supper, for I think you will enjoy the eatables, every thing, meats and all, were cooked by a Frenchman. I thought as every thing was done different now-a-days, and the crowd would be so great the people wouldn't know what to call for, that we ought to have bills of fare, but Pierre wouldn't hear of it. We old folks have to give way. I dare say, Miss Almira, your pious, godly mother has to do the like by you, especially respecting having dancing in our houses, when we are members of the church. The best way to get over our strict parson is to let it all appear accidentally done. I do wish our ministers of the Gospel would grant us some sort of a thing, (I dont know the name, Pierre called it too the other day,) that they say the biggest Pope in Rome does to his great people, and let us do as we choose about dancing, for it is a monstrous inoffensive amusement."

If Almeria's every look betrayed the most supreme disgust for the mother, it was not at all diminished or relieved on seeing Peter move nearer, as if about to introduce his friend. And never had her eye rested on a more unique, queer looking figure. His square-built, cumbrous person, was encased in "righteous blue;" the coat was garnished with countless huge brass buttons, and the pantaloons were of a paler shade, which, in their fit, somewhat resembled the Turkish trowsers. A collar of knee deep dimensions, surmounted a yellow neckerchief, which was carefully tied in a double knot, and then crossed over pompous ruffles, whose undulating motions were not a little restrained by the weight of a saucer breast pin, on which was elaborately painted two loving doves, sipping from a bowl of Cupid's nectar. A vest of marigold tint, over which shone a massive large linked chain, completed his dress. The head piece of this bust of god-like man, was of Herculean size, boasting a luxuriant abundance of carotty hair, that hung in heavy array over a face as redolent with good humor, as it bore the visible stamp of exposure to the sun. He flourished a handkerchief of divers colors in his hand as he approached Almeria.

"Allow me to introduce Mr. Dobbins to you Miss Clifton," said Peter, with an angular bow.

"Very glad to see you Miss—tho' I may be a strange chap to you—yet I've heard about you, when you used to live in the place where I went to college. I tell you what, I did fool the old folks at home, also, the old professors, for they thought I was a monstrous hard student."

"You have mistaken my name probably—for I am confident you never heard of, or saw me in any such place,—we reside in this city."

"Yes I know you do now, at least Pete tells me so—but that's no reason you never lived anywhere else; however, if I never saw you before, the students used to talk about a Miss Almiray Clifton; but surely you can't be the same one, for they called her rather old maidenish, and you look as fresh as a clover shining in the dew."

"You are very familiarly complimentary. I am well convinced, that were you once seen, one could hardly ever forget the vision."

"Much oblegged to you Miss. Pete told me you were very civil to young men, and the students said the same; but, as I never like to impose myself on any lady, I always am pretty free spoken. You see as how, my father was an overseer, who, feeling often the plaguey disadvantages of having no book-learning, when my uncle left me a legacy, (he was a bachelor, thanks to reading so much of Mr. Pope's notions about the tender sex,) he advised me to go to college. Now, I had often thirsted to drink from that wonderful spring Squire Nonsense's son used to call education; and as I used to let the horse guide the plough, while I read some tattered book, I thought I might turn out something great, like one of our statesmen who used to do the same, so I determined not to trot through life as hard as my poor father, and off I started for the college. I managed to wheedle a license out of the old professor, while I fooled the whole set by my lavish expenditure of money. The dear girls, who were as plenty as blackberries in them parts, were completely gulled, for you know they always give more smiles to a lawyer and doctor, and poor things they never dreamt all the time, I was only an old overseer's son."

"I thought you never imposed yourself upon any lady?" said Almeria, as he paused to take breath; and I can assure you, a stranger like myself, cannot feel interested in a history of your parentage, or classical career."

"Classical," echoed Mr. Dobbins, with a hearty laugh; "bless you, Miss Almiray, I never dipped into them sort of secret sciences. All I cared for, was a placard with the gilt letters 'Mr. Timothy Dobbins, Attorney at Law,' which now hangs pretty staringly at the court-house, a few miles from here. I thought, before I entered into the clatter and clash of my professional career, that I would step into the city, and see what my old friend Pete was doing. Never mind, old fellow," added he, slapping Peter on his back, "If our good fathers are tailors and overseers, we can trip it away now with the ladies as well as any body, for we can boast that placard, you know;—those big letters 'Attorney at Law' are very precious—aint they?"

Peter replied with surpassing dignity—

"You evinced good judgment and taste in the selection of your profession. I myself had rather be even an obscure defender of my country's civil code, than to bask in all the wealth and purchased splendor of an ignoble mechanic, or a successful speculating tentative dealer in cloth and woman's gear. What science could be more ennobling than that of litigation—the preservation of man's liberties and rights!—who so deserving of the pedestal of eminence, as he who pleads for, and supports those unalienable rights, without which we would be levelled with the savage and forever tossed on the estuating waves of anarchy, discord and inhumanity. To ascend this great apex is my daily aspiration."

"I have no doubt such eloquence as you possess, Pete," replied Mr. Dobbins, slapping him more furiously than at first, "will ensure you success, and future generations will own you a real ignis fatuus light through the bogs and quagmires of law and justice. Come, let us banish all professional cares, and as Bill Shakspeare says, 'throw law as well as physic to the dogs.' Pon my soul, I feel in for a job of love; I mean to flutter awhile in the court of Cupid, and I think (glancing around the room) I will have a first rate chance here among such a host of pretty girls,—what do you think of my determination, Miss Almiray."

This inquiry was followed by the action of pulling up his plentiful collar and drawing off his buskin gloves, displaying a hand of no small size, and not unlike the speckled surface of a guinea's egg.

which he passed through his pendent locks, causing every golden hair to show its exact length by a setaceous obedience.

Ere Almeria could reply, Mrs. Brownslow approached, loudly announcing that supper was ready. Mr. Timothy Dobbins extended his hand, while Peter Adolphus, bowingly offered his arm to Almeria, who gave an agonizing glance around in quest of Mr. Sinclaire. What was she to do, for she certainly would go forever without a supper—nay, she would die before she accepted the escortage of either. But her fears were allayed when she saw her own elegant, refined Sinclaire making his way towards her.

"For Heaven's sake come to my rescue and take me home, or any where, so I am released from such bores and uncouth creatures aping man. Positively my every nerve is unstrung, and I am exhausted with the clatter of vulgar tones."

Mr. Timothy Dobbins' large white eyes grew larger with astonishment, and shrugging his shoulders, he turned to ask Peter "if that tall, whiskered animal-looking man was a lawyer or doctor, to cut them out so nicely?" But Peter's motions had been as rapid in leaving Timothy as Almeria's, so he was forced to follow on with the crowd to the supper room. As they entered, or rather poured into the small back dining-room where the tables were arranged, Mrs. Brownslow's voice was heard above that of every one—

"You all must excuse the smallness of the room, the girls and Pierre would have a set down table, and I thought as many as could chock in might come along—so make yourselves at home, and just help to whatever you may fancy."

"Yes, rejoined a voice equally as loud and clear, and you all may cabbage too just as much as you choose, for these French flummies will be of no service after this great sworay is over."

Just think, reader, it was Mr. Brownslow who had, unperceived by his better-half, entered the room, having been disturbed in his bed by the dancing below; he said he thought it would make him feel young again to shake his old feet, so down he came, full of delight and ready for a jig.

A dead pause followed his entrée and remark, but soon the clamor of voices and the bursts of laughter told that a reaction had taken place; all hands, as well as mouths, were busily obeying the injunctions of their kind host and hostess. Mr. Brownslow no sooner perceived Almeria, than he pushed his way towards her, dragging the horrified Peter with him.

"Here's Pete, Miss Clifton, who can serve you to any thing, for he understands all the Frenchifications, and you need not fear eating what he recommends, for I dare say he has tasted them all."

"What shall I do," cried Almeria, clinging to Sinclaire's arm; "if I ever get clear of this scrape, Heaven defend me from such another."

"Dont mind your coat so much," continued the old man, as Peter endeavored to dodge him when he presented a glass of ice cream to Almeria. "You know I can cut another just as good a fit, and while we are in for a penny, we can throw in a pound, not even counting the cabbage."

If looks of entreaty, displeasure and various winks could have silenced the more than usually garrulous Mr. Brownslow, those that Pierre bestowed upon him would have done so completely—but it seemed as if he had entered into the very life and spirit of the great sworay, which he took every opportunity to comment upon. The supper passed off, and with it the exhausted Almeria, who gave one long breath of relief as she threw herself in the carriage, declaring, "that all the blood of all the Howards" would never make the Brownsnows even passably genteel. It was a most apropos moment for Sinclaire, seated beside one so fair and languishing, in the full enjoyment of an uninterrupted tete-a-tete, how could he refrain an unreserved confession of his ardent love and devotion?

The offering of his enchained heart was laid at her shrine—it was in her power to crown his life with unspeakable bliss, or to blight its promising bud forever, by a cruel rejection. Ah! anxious reader, it was not in the nature of one so kind and considerate as Almeria so to act towards the handsome and refined Sinclaire. All the annoyances and mortifications she had that night been subjected to, were fully compensated by the happy denouement. Never, no never would she forget the Brownsnows party, for the first proposal of marriage was the result. Though she was twenty-five, still 'twas even so. Mr. Sinclaire was the first offer; many had been caught in the magic circle of her charms, but then, they managed always to make a speedy retreat, ere Cupid had very seriously wounded them in the conflict. But Sinclaire was an offer not to be spurned—his mustache, whiskers and Hyperian curls, were irresistible—and, provided "ma chère mère consented," was her own soft, sweet answer. Had you been in Almeria's situation, fair reader, I am sure you would have done likewise; and it would be better for many, did they but look well and regard thus carefully their first offer. But our interest and sympathy must not be wholly bestowed upon Almeria—we will therefore return to our friends the Brownsnows.

The guests had all departed—the numerous lights flickered into waning dimness—crushed pieces of cakes and nutshells, instead of faded garlands, strewn the floor, and all the consequent confusion and desolation after a giddy revel reigned in the parlor; still the family lingered there. The two girls, pale and haggard, sat in the sofa, looking the picture of the deepest mortification. Pierre Adolphus paced the room with an air of elevated indignation—while Mrs. Brownslow stood before the expiring fire, a shade of anxiety having displaced her usual look of jolly good humor.

"Oh! Mamma, how could you say such coarse things to Miss Clifton; what must she have thought of our gentility, and why in the world did you permit Papa to come into the supper room? You might have been sure he would have exposed us by his vulgar ignorance and shop-like sayings, 'What will become of us? We may now give up all attempts or hopes of ever getting into the first société.'"

Poor Emilie entirely forgot all her exultation of feeling when she stood before her mirror, a few hours previous, arrayed in her beautiful white satin, as she thus gave way to a paroxysm of wounded pride.

"I am off to-morrow from this now hateful place," said Peter. "I could never show my face in public, after so signal a defeat. Timothy Dobbins was the apex of vulgarity and preposterous pretension; he completed the tout ensemble of my chagrin and disappointment. I must hie to some more congenial cycle, where I can gather honors for myself, and forget my father is a plebeian tailor."

"What, Peter, leave your loving mother and family for such a trifle? Indeed, I never tried so hard to do my best and genteelest, but the more people try, the worst is always sure to happen. You all are very ungrateful children, to upbraid me for the fauxes passes of others. I do believe, as Shakspeare says, 'ingratitude in a child is the biggest sort of a monster.'"

"Oh! mamma, you even butcher the apothegms of the immortal Shakspeare. If you have any respect for my learning and cultivated taste, spare me that profanation. Yes, I am resolved to leave you all after this tremendous downfall of every cherished hope, whether you deem me ungrateful or not." Peter was about retiring in all his resolute importance, notwithstanding the tender expostulations of his fond mother and sisters, when the short, lean figure of his father confronted him.

"What's all this colliky about? Why wife, what are you blubbering about, and if Milly and Josee aint doing the very same thing after this great and mighty French sworay. If this is the way that dandified, slick-haired race do, after they give their grand parties, then I'll never give another. Dear me! I shall never be able to set things to rights in the shop, or get to work quietly, after sitting up so late."

"Oh, Papa," cried Josee, "we are undone, completely exposed, and I fear we will never be ranked among the genteel."

"Well, well, I could have told you as much. You may rely on it, my children, you would do better and be happier to know, and never quit your proper place. Hereafter, take my advice, and never appear what you cannot with truth and propriety support. All the sworays, French jabberings, strummings on the piano, and the furbelows of finery, will never make the world think any more of you, for forgetting you are a tailor's daughter. Though this may be an insupportable stroke of mortification to you, yet I won't regret it if it will bring you all to your reasonable senses. As to you, Pete, if you choose, you may go just where your plaguey learning will be of some service. I begin now to think I was the biggest fool of the two, in not teaching you to cross your legs on the board and learn the tailors stitch, instead of all your dabbling in law and languages."

The family cabal ended by all retiring to rest. Had we the power of reading the hearts of Pleasure's devotees, when exhausted satiety bids them seek refuge in the calm repose of solitude or slumber, what a map of infinite variety would be sketched out for our warning instruction and beneficial improvement. Oh! that insupportable aching void! How the grim spectre of disappointment obtrudes his repulsive visage, banishing the sweetest fancies, and bearing on his head Folly's cap of jingling bells, instead of the firm and all enduring helmet of Reason, while he casts his sardonic smile on the wreck he has wrought. Too often do men in their weakness

— "play such fantastic tricks before high Heaven
As make the angels weep."

LINES.

BY MRS. MARIA G. BUCHANAN.

"Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest."—Mat. xi. 28.

Bright words of Love, ye're like the tears
Which midnight sheds for faded flowers—
Sweet as the chord untouched for years
Of mem'ry's harp—our childhood hours,
When in the opening bud of life
No blight was found to mar its brightness,
But all its leaves with Joy were rife,
Fanned by Hope's wing of fairy lightness.

Or like the beam that struggles through
The lonely captive's cell of sadness,
Awak'ning with its blessed hue
Within his heart some thoughts of gladness;
Welcome as breeze that fans his brow,
When Earth on Night's dark breast is sleeping,
And trees and flowers in murmurs low
Are for the golden sunshine weeping.

Sweet as the music of the breast,
When o'er its chords roam Hope's bright fingers.
And wild despair forsakes the rest
Where oft, alas! too oft he lingers;
Or, like Joy's smile of cloudless light
Affliction's darkest gloom dispelling,
When, on the storm-toss'd seaman's sight,
A sail appears of succor telling.

Fall not these precious words of love
Like dew upon the soul's crushed flowers?
In softest tones they breathe—above
They'll bloom again in fadeless bowers.

And are they not to erring heart
As sweet as thoughts of childhood's hour,
When sin was as a thing apart,
As yet unfelt its Demon power?

And steal they not like sunbeam glad,
To cheer the soul in sin's dark prison;
Chasing all anxious thoughts and sad,
And breathing Christ thy God has risen?
Yes! and sweet as midnight's air of balm
To those in Satan's chains enfolded,
Telling of fair Religion's calm,
Salvation's path by Jesus moulded.

And breathe they not the fairest lay
Which Hope sings to her lyre of gladness?
Herald they not the brightest day
That dawns on sorrow's night of sadness?
O yes; beneath their spell so bright,
The soul by Sin's fierce light'ning riven
Awakes to life and hails the light
Of Mercy by a Saviour given.

PROFANE GENESIS.

BY C. B. HAYDEN.

The brilliant developments in every department of science and research, which so strikingly characterise the present age, constitute it a golden era, both in the annals of the world and of the human mind. The discoveries of the age, which have so richly rewarded the labors of the artisan, student and philosopher in every path of their varied research, are intellectual achievements displaying the far-reaching power and in-dwelling strength of the human mind. In these revelations of the gigantic strength of the intellectual man may be discovered faint traces of that divine and bright original, in whose image man was first created. If, as men, we claim with conscious pride a natural brotherhood with the master minds who have achieved these triumphs of human genius; if, as philanthropists, we hail these blessed results as the harbingers of social improvement and civil and political happiness; with what feelings of prayerful, heart-felt gratitude must we as Christians regard those developments which have so signally advanced the cause of natural and revealed religion by illustrating the word and the works of God? Every portion of Holy Writ has derived confirmation and support from modern research, but particularly Genesis. This book, so long the rallying ground of the skeptic and infidel, now enjoys an enviable preëminence from the confirmation it has derived from the deductions of astronomy and geology respecting the origin of the planets and the physical history of the earth, and the researches of the historian, antiquarian and philologist into the primitive history of the human family. The external evidences derived from these and other sources, are so full and conclusive, as to constitute a Profane Genesis, corresponding with, and corroborative of the Sacred Genesis. The evidences afforded by this Profane Genesis are the more conclusive, from their entire freedom from bias, as, in many instances, they have been derived from the labors of the avowed enemies of the Bible: not unfrequently they have been the result of researches professedly hostile to it, and generally, they have been developed by those indifferent to the cause. They hence, from their independence, appeal with equal force to believer and skeptic—to all, they convincingly prove the divine origin of the Bible, and conclusively show, that this magna charta of the Christian did, in truth, emanate from heaven, and that it bears the impress of the Great Seal of the King of Kings.

As these evidences are now generally inaccessible, from the scarcity, costliness and technicality of the works containing them, it is proposed to present them in a popular form, in a series of articles in the Southern Literary Messenger.

CHAPTER I.

The Sacred Genesis informs us of the existence of a primitive people, and makes us acquainted with their religion, philosophy and history, previous to their dispersion and consequent peopling of the earth. The information here given us respecting this people is that which all nations are most solicitous to preserve. From the importance which every people attach to their origin and early history, traditions respecting them are treasured with religious care; they constitute the chief subjects of the legendary songs and traditionary poetry which, among all nations, are the repositories of primitive national history, which is thus handed down to after ages. An examination into these sources should, therefore, if the Mosaical account be true, show a general agreement between the primitive history and religion of the different nations of the earth, and that given in Genesis of the primeval nation from which all others have descended. The coincidences with the Sacred Genesis derived from these and other sources, as already mentioned, constitute a Profane Genesis, which illustrates and confirms the Sacred. The better to compare the two, the different subjects as they respectively occur in the Sacred Genesis, will be collated with the parallel portions of the Profane.

(A.) The Creation of the World by God and His Attributes.

We learn from Genesis, that God created Heaven, earth, and sea; and all that in them is. The earth, and every living thing that moveth upon it; the green herb of the field—the fish of the sea, and the fowl of the air,—the firmament of the heaven, and its two great lights to give light upon the earth—all, originated in his will, and were created by his power. All things were made by him; and without him was nothing made that was made. We further learn from this and other portions of Scripture, that this "Great First Cause" was in the beginning—that he is eternal, omnipresent, omnipotent and omniscient.

In referring the material world to the creative energy of a Supreme Being, eternal, immaculate, self-existent, and all powerful, Genesis agrees with the Theogonies of the Greeks, the Hermetic Books of the Egyptians, the Zendevesta of the Persians, the Vedas of the Indians, and the King of the Chinese, respectively the sacred books of these different nations, and also conforms to the sagas and creeds of many other nations, both ancient and modern. The savage of Madagascar, though he does not make him the subject of his prayers and adorations, yet believes in a "Creator who has created all things."* The Tlascalan creed, though polytheistic, yet recognizes a Superior God, without designating him by any particular name. The Mexicans, amidst the multitude of their gods, acknowledge a Superior Deity, "Teolt, or Ipalnemoani,"† to whom they attribute the creation of the heavens and the earth, and signify their knowledge of him by looking toward heaven with veneration, and giving him the name of Ineffable. The Supreme God of the Peruvians is Pachacamac, sometimes translated "Creator of the World,"‡ at others, "the Soul of the Universe." The Shoo-King, one of the five Canonical Books of the Chinese, acknowledges Shang-ty§ "the Supreme Ruler"—"an animating intelligence, which presides over the world, rewarding virtue and punishing vice." Similar opinions obtained in the Egyptian Mythology respecting Ammon, the Supreme God of the Egyptians. He is thus spoken of in the Hermetic Books. "Before all things that essentially exist, and before the total principles there is one God"—"self-begotten, the only father, and who is truly good"—"the fountain of all things."|| Ammon thus alluded to was worshipped under a variety of forms and names,—Nef—Nouv, or Chnouphis—Noub, or Choubis;¶ all, according to Champollion, representing the male nature of Ammon, and signifying God. The female representative of nature was Neith, an emanation from Ammon. Upon one of her Temples in Sais, is a hieroglyphical inscription thus interpreted by Champollion; "I am all that has been, all that is, all that will be. No mortal has ever raised the veil which conceals me; and the fruit I have produced is the sun." The language here used, strikingly corresponds with that used in the Scriptures to describe the Supreme Being. Which was, and is, and is to come—Rev. iv., 8. The same yesterday, to-day, and forever—Heb. xiii., 8. I am that I am—Erodus, iii., 14. No man hath seen God at any time—John i., 18. Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen—Timothy i., 18. According to the ancient Persian creed, God, or Zeraune Akérène,* created Ormuzd, who created the world. Zoroaster, the Moses of the Persian theology, thus speaks of the Deity;—"He is the first, indestructible, eternal, unbegotten, indivisible, dissimilar; the dispenser of all good; incompatible; the best of the good; the wisest of the wise: He is the father of equity and justice, self-taught physical, and perfect, and wise."† Speaking of God as creator, Zoroaster says, "He made them (planets) six in number, and for the seventh, he cast into the midst the fire of the sun." The earlier creed of the Greeks, as contained in Theogonies and other Orphic Poems, recognizes the same belief, as will be seen from the following quotation by Eusebius, from the Orphic Poems;—"Zeus is the first,—Zeus the thunderer is the last,—Zeus is the head,—Zeus is the middle, and by Zeus all things were fabricated. Zeus is the foundation of the earth and of the starry heaven,—Zeus is the King. He is the author of universal life."‡ The later opinions of the philosophers, respecting the Deity and his attributes, though similar, were somewhat modified, as has been repeatedly shown by modern scholars. Plato taught, "that there is an intelligent cause, which is the origin of all spiritual being, and the former of the material world."—"God is the Supreme Intelligence, incorporeal, without beginning, end, or change, and capable of being perceived only by the mind."§ While the philosophers conformed in their opinions to those of the earlier creed and of Genesis, respecting the existence of God and his attributes, yet they use the word Maker, in reference to God, in a modified sense, signifying that God did not originate the matter, out of which the world was created, but that he only rearranged it.¶ This opinion was a necessary consequence of another notion of the same school, that "nothing can be produced out of that which has no existence." Sophocles says,

"There is really but one God,
The maker of heaven and earth,
And sea, and winds.

The following quotation from the "Phænomena" of Aratus, a Grecian poet who flourished about 270 B. C., contains similar views—

"Begin with Jupiter, whose essence is Ineffable by mortal man, whose presence
Does all things fill; assemblies, courts and marts,
The deep abyss and ports are filled with him.
We all enjoy him, all his offspring are,
Whose nature is benign to man; who stirs

Them up to work, shewing the good of life.
 'Tis he appoints the time to plough and sow,
 And reap the fruitful harvest.
 'Twas he that in the heavens fixed the stars,
 Allotting each his place, to teach the year,
 And to declare the fate us men attends;
 That all things are by certain laws decreed.
 Him therefore, let us first and last appease,
 O, Father, the great help we mortals have."

It was to this poem that St. Paul alluded, when, from Mars Hill, he declared unto the Athenians the "unknown God" whom they ignorantly worshipped as him of whom certain of their poets had said: "For we are also his offspring." This ingenious allusion by the Apostle to a poem whose doctrines so singularly agreed with those which he was about to declare unto them, was a ready passport to the favor of his audience. The resemblance of the doctrines of this poem and those of the Platonic school already alluded to, with those which St. Paul made known to the Athenians, was so intimate, that we are not surprised at learning that some said, we will hear thee again of this matter, or that certain men clave unto him and believed. Raffaele, in his Cartoon of Paul preaching at Athens, has justly given to the Platonists among the group of listeners an air of deep attention and an expression of countenance, which says to the Apostle, almost thou persuadest us to be Christians. Opinions still more strikingly in accordance with those of the Scriptures are to be found in the Indian Sacred Books, as the following quotations from Robertson's India will show. "The Pundits assert that it was the Supreme Being who, by his power, formed all creatures of the animal, vegetable and material world, from the four elements of fire, water, air and earth, to be an ornament to the magazine of creation; and whose comprehensive benevolence selected man, the centre of knowledge, to have dominion and authority over the rest; and having bestowed upon this favorite object judgement and understanding, gave him supremacy over the corners of the world."

"As God is immaterial, he is above all conception; as he is invisible, he can have no form; but from what we behold of his works, we may conclude that he is eternal, omnipotent, knowing all things, and present every where." These opinions can not be regarded as modern interpolations in the Indian creed, as they are found in the Baghvat Geeta, an episode in the Mahabarrat, a sacred poem referred to 1000, A. C. The following extract from this poem possesses a beauty and sublimity approaching that of the Inspired Writers.

"O, Mighty Being, who art the prime Creator, eternal God of Gods, the World's Mansion! Thou art the incorruptible Being, distinct from all things transient. Thou art before all Gods, the ancient Pooroosh (i. e. vidual soul) and the Supreme Supporter of the Universe. Thou knowest all things and art worthy to be known; thou art the Supreme Mansion, and by thee, O, infinite Form, the universe was spread abroad! reverence be unto thee before and behind; reverence be unto thee on all sides: O thou who art all in all! Infinite is thy power and thy glory. Thou art the Father of all things, animate and inanimate. Thou art the wise instructor of the whole, worthy to be adored; for thou shouldst bear with me; even as a father with his son, a friend with his friend, a lover with his beloved."

SKETCH OF A VISIT TO WESTMINSTER ABBEY

AND

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

Westminster Abbey and the Tower, the two great objects of curiosity and renown of London, attract the first attention of all strangers at all acquainted with the English history. I entered the Abbey by the most common entrance, at the Poet's corner, and after paying the usual fee to the money changers who occupied the Temple of God, proceeded toward the main body of the building. I had often heard that the architecture and external appearance of the building were overrated; that its principal lustre was derived from its age; and that most of the admiration in which it was held sprang from historical associations, and the gorgeous spectacles of which it had been the theatre; and, consequently, was not so well prepared to be pleased with the structure itself as I was. From floor to ceiling it is grand. Of course I speak of the inside. The exterior, with the exception of Henry VIIIth's Chapel, is not worthy of the interior. The adjacent grounds, embracing a large number of tomb stones which form the pavement of a public promenade, as much frequented as the side walk of a business street, are in a state of dilapidation, disgraceful to the Parliament which sits on the other side of the street and votes away thousands every year for less worthy objects; neglecting this, only because they are familiar with it from daily observation. The Chapel of Henry the VIIth which stands like a sort of wing at the end of the nave or main body of the building is, both within and without, above and below, roof, floor, walls, windows, carving, tracery, woodwork and all, one of the most elaborated pieces of Gothic art that can be imagined. An architect, not long since, expressed it as his opinion, that such a work could not now be erected for less than £2,000,000, an estimate which seems incredible when we consider the dimensions of the structure. It is made the depository of a number of the banners of ancient knights, and is not used as a chapel unless the chapel in the main body of the Abbey be undergoing repair, or otherwise rendered unsuitable for service. The monuments in it are numerous, and constructed with a profuse disregard of expense. There are other chapels (of course very much smaller) to the number of six or seven throughout the Abbey; all of them tenanted by the illustrious dead, and adorned according to the varying tastes of the ages in which they and the monuments within them were finished. I passed through them all, and had no hand-book with me except the account of Westminster Abbey contained in Leigh's picture of London. There was a guide, or "Verger," as he was called in old times, along, who, mechanically, and as fast as he could speak, pointed out the various monuments. He was dressed with studied neatness, and wore a black gown in token of his office; but his information did not extend beyond the inscription upon the tombs and what might have been gathered from a penny guide pamphlet. He did not know as much as a Frenchman, who was among the party, made known in broken English. We got into an apartment in which were kept two chairs of rough materials and rude construction. One of them was the chair in which the monarchs of England have been crowned for several centuries, and in it the stone on which the kings of Scotland were made to stand when receiving their crown. The Verger invited the party to sit "where her Majesty sat when she was crowned."

The North Transept contains monuments of more modern construction than those in the chapels. Some of the most elaborate and conspicuous are erected in memory of persons whose names are never mentioned in the history of the past, except of the British peerage, and who would not be known but for their cenotaphs. Pitt and Fox, the rivals in Parliament, and the leaders of two great parties, which alternately swayed the destinies of the British Kingdom at the most eventful period of its existence, lie almost side by side; a few feet only separate the slabs which point out their resting places. Chatham and Lord Mansfield are there—the virtues and excellencies which endeared them to England perpetuated in the best of marble.

Major Andre, whose remains were brought here from America in 1821, also has a monument; and a pathetic inscription tells his accomplishments and his end. But it is useless to attempt to specify names,—the whole building is full—still less can I describe them. If the attempt were made, I should have to tell of every shade of art and taste from the Pagan images, which look so odd in a Christian Church, to the unpolished stone slab with its old style inscription. The nave for near two hundred feet is studded with them.

The "Poets Corner" is a crowded mausoleum of genius. The most unpretending portion of the national edifice, it contains the monuments of men who are now more thought of than all the royal inhabitants who occupy the statelier recesses. I went out of the Abbey, as I had entered it from this consecrated precinct. The last name my eye fell upon was that of Addison, the scholar, the moralist, the wit, the poet, the liberal politician and enlightened benefactor of his age. I thought of the words he had written, "When," said he, "I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion dies within me; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out; when I meet with the griefs of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tomb of parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying by those who deposed them; when I consider rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men that divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment upon the little competitions, factions and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates of the tombs, of some that died yesterday, and some six hundred years ago, I consider that great day, when we shall all of us be contemporaries, and make our appearance together."

And whilst on the subject, I will notice a visit to St. Sepulchre's Church, (erected by Sir Christopher Wren in 1670 in Skinner Street,) where our Virginia John Smith lies buried. Pocahontas was buried at Gravesend, 28 miles below London, where she was about to embark for America. I learned the locality of Smith's tomb from an old work which says, "The famous Capt. John Smith, who, perhaps, underwent more romantic adventures and deeds of arms than any other man who ever existed, rests here from his turmoils. I refer to his history for his wondrous acts of chivalry; for the kindness he experienced among the Turks, from the beauteous lady Tragaby Sanda! the charitable lady Calamata! and the blessed Pocahontas, the great king of Virginia's daughter!!!"

The tower of London continues to attract as many visitors as it ever did. It is daily seen by hundreds and at the gate are sold guide books to it in three languages. Some of the buildings were destroyed a year or two ago by fire: Still, so many others remain, that the parts destroyed are scarcely missed from an area of five acres, covered with barracks, armories, offices, a church, store houses and even shops. Visitors are conducted over such parts of the establishment as are open to the public, by warders, dressed in red frock coats, with a profusion of buttons, stars and devices upon them. You are at first ushered into the Horse Armory—a large apartment at once commemorative of feudalism, knighthood, battles and tournaments, and the progress made in the art of war, during a period of more than four hundred years, from the time of Edward Ist to that of James IInd. There is a group of equestrian figures ranged along the whole of the apartment in chronological order, accoutred in the very armor which was worn by the kings and warriors of England in those days. Among the most prominent, I observed the famous John of Gaunt, from whom sprang so many kings; the suit worn by the black prince at the battle of Cressy; the armor of Henry the VIth showing what was worn when the contest between the houses of York and Lancaster were raging, when Jack Cade and Joan of Arc became famous, and when the imperishable art of printing was invented; the steel of Henry Vth the companion of Falstaff and of Edward IIIrd, who added the words "Dieu et mon droit," to the Royal Coat of Arms. The armor appears highly polished, and from the protection it afforded against arrows and lances, I deem it nothing marvellous that the heroes of chivalry were bold to lead their followers to onsets, in truth, perilous only to the poor soldier who could not encircle himself with metal. The horses were likewise coated, and, therefore, the strongest were required. Some of the suits of armor were pointed out by the warder as having been worn by noble knights of latter-day creation, who tilted at the Eglinton tournament in 1839. The walls of this great apartment, or Horse Armory, are lined with arms of every description, arranged in various shapes, and representing different devices. Above it is what was once called the Spanish Armory, from the number of trophies it contained which were taken from the Spanish Armada. They show you a quantity of instruments of Spanish invention and manufacture intended to have been used to torment the English prisoners, which that "invincible" expedition expected to take—such as thumb screws, poisoned pikes, a machine for compressing and fastening a man into the space of about three feet; yokes, cravats of iron, &c. The relics of the age of Elizabeth are very numerous, many of them very curious, and some reflecting as little credit on the English as did the thumb screws on the Spaniards. There was the axe which severed the head of Ann Boleyn from her body—a deed which was performed by an executioner, specially brought from Calais. I held it in my hand. Raleigh's room was there, where he was confined before his execution, where he slept and wrote his history of the world. But the limits of this sketch leave no room to tell of many other things in this apartment; nor of the antique cannon in the yard; nor of the crown jewels and regalia, more than that, I saw them in the strong room, in the large glass case in which they are preserved. They consist of several crowns, sword of State, sceptre, staves, salt cellar, bracelets, spoons, wine fount and other paraphernalia. I need not say anything of the lustre of the polished gold and the glittering diamonds and precious stones. The contents of the room are valued at £3,000,000, and the crown made for Queen Victoria of itself at £1,000,000. What a sum to pay for the dazzling reflection of a little concentrated light! Such is the sole use of the diamond upon a monarch's brow!

POETICAL SIMILARITIES.

TO B. B. MINOR, ESQ.

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

DEAR SIR: The Poetical similarities, which I have here collected and send you, may serve the purpose of adding variety to the pages of the Messenger, and of amusing that class of your readers who are, like me, lovers of good poetry. Farther than to amuse has not been attempted. It is still farther from my intention to arraign the authors here quoted, for the sin of literary larceny or plagiarism. The imitation, and still more, the similitude, either casual or intentional, between passages of different authors, is certainly not plagiarism. If it were, there is not an English author of my acquaintance, who could not be convicted of appropriating epithets, images, and sometimes entire passages, the property of others. Indeed, as Sir Walter Scott has remarked, [Intro. Min. Scottish Border] Homer is only entirely original, because we have lost the compositions of those bards who must have preceded him, and from whom he must have borrowed many thoughts, turns of expression, images, hints, &c. For surely it were absurd to suppose, that such an art as Poetry ever sprang into existence full grown and armed like the goddess of Wisdom from the brain of Jupiter; or, that such splendid structures as the Epics of Homer could have arisen, like the castle in the fairy tale, in one night, without having been perfected after models, and designs and rules of art, resulting from the attempts and experience of ages.

If I had more space and were disposed to investigate this subject thoroughly, I would divide it into these heads: Plagiarism, Imitation, Similarity, and Coincidence. I would say, that the first must bear sufficient evidence of motive or purpose. That it must be an intentional appropriating of something of value—such as an argument, an image, or some remarkable epithet belonging to another. Imitation is of two kinds: that which is casual, or usual and customary among authors, and that which is servile, which latter does not strive to combine thoughts and beauties, so as to impress a conclusion or result that is new, but is a mere reproduction of the model which otherwise ought to be brought out improved or altered to answer some end not known to the original artist. Similarity needs no definition, and Coincidence differs from it in this, that it consists in the employment of the exact image or expression by two authors who could not have known each other. And I would proceed to furnish examples under each head. But I am not attempting anything so extensive; endeavoring merely to write something that will amuse, in a light gossiping sort of way. The quotations found here, would be generally ranged under the head of similarity and the reader must not look for much system.

This similarity, though generally pervading the whole Republic of Letters, is particularly observable among contemporaries. Two great authors, both master spirits in the style peculiar to each, have not been ashamed to acknowledge the influence of contemporaries upon the general conception as well as upon particular passages of their poems.

Mr. Shelley, in his preface to the "Revolt of Islam," says "I have avoided the imitation of any contemporary style. But there must be a resemblance, which does not depend upon their own will, between all the writers of any particular age. They cannot escape from subjection to a common influence which arises out of an infinite combination of circumstances belonging to the times in which they live, though each is, in a degree, the author of the very influence by which his spirit is thus pervaded." * * * * "And this is an influence which neither the meanest scribbler, nor the sublimest genius of any era can escape, and which I have not attempted to escape."

After the publication of the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," there appeared in the newspapers of the day, an article over the initials of Coleridge [S. T. C.] accusing Sir Walter Scott of plagiarism. Coleridge having, at that time, but slight acquaintance with Scott, requested Southey to write to him and inform him, that he was not the author of the accusatory paragraph. Sir Walter, (then Mr. Scott) in answer to Southey's letter, replies—"As for the imitations, I have not the least hesitation in saying to you, that I was unconscious at the time of appropriating the goods of others, although I have not the least doubt, that several of the passages must have been running in my head. Had I meant to steal, I would have been more cautious to disfigure the stolen goods. In one or two instances, the resemblance seems general and casual, and in one, I think it was impossible I could practice plagiarism, as "Eithwald, one of the poems quoted, was published after the Lay of the Last Minstrel."—Lockhart's Scott.

I may as well observe, that though this amusement is not despicable, and is frequently resorted to by literary men, as is observed by the "researching" D'Israeli, [so my Lord Byron calls him] and therefore I am not ashamed of indulging in so elegant and intellectual an entertainment, still I have not set me down with pen and ink at my side for the sole purpose of detecting similarities. Those here offered, are such as have occurred to me, and are such remarkable passages, as fixed themselves in my memory, either by the beauty which they possess, or the obvious similarity they bear to each other. As soon as any passages occurred to me, I turned to the author, and have preferred generally to quote them entire, without marring their beauty by cutting them up, or abridging them, in hopes that the splendid gems of poetry with which I have adorned my pages, would afford pleasure to those who may peruse them, should my own short observations fail to arrest or merit their attention.

If this should prove too long an introduction for so unimportant an article, it must be attributed to the influence of taste in the West, where porches are not unfrequently seen larger than the houses they are intended to adorn.

To commence, then, with Shakspeare. It is remarkable, that many of the most admired passages in our poets are to be traced to the inspiration of his muse. As an instance, take the following celebrated and often quoted lines of Pope—

"Honor and fame from no condition rise,
Act well your part, there all the honor lies."—Pope.

The germ of this thought, and similarly expressed, is to be found in the following—

"From lowest place, when virtuous things 'proceed.'
The place is dignified by the doer's deed."—Shakspeare.

Young says in one place—

"How blest is he who first gave tongue to time!"
Night Thoughts.

And in another—

"The bell strikes one. We take no note of time
But from its loss: to give it then a tongue
Is wise in man." Ibid.

The thought seems to have arisen quite naturally in his mind on hearing the tolling of a bell at midnight, as he lay oppressed with those bitter and intense thoughts which are the characteristics of his poetry. But there is a line in Hamlet very similar—

"The iron tongue of midnight has tolled twelve."
Hamlet.

Horatio in the same play says

"I have heard
The cock, that is the trumpet of the morn,
Doth, with his lofty and shrill sounding throat,
Awake the God of day," &c. Hamlet, Act I.

Mr. Gray was perhaps thinking of the cock, as here described, when he wrote—

"The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed—
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed."
Elegy.

And from Mr. Gray, Mr. Rogers may have borrowed the feature of the swallow in the picture of quiet happiness he draws in his popular little poem, "The Wish."

"The swallow oft beneath my thatch
Shall twitter from her clay-built nest;
Oft shall the pilgrim lift the latch,
And share my meal, a welcome guest."

There is also some similarity between two very beautiful passages of Shakspeare and Shelley.

"But look, the morn, in russet mantle clad,
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastern hill."

Hamlet.

Shelley's, whose poetry in many passages frequently reminds me of the richness of Shakspeare, is similar, though sufficiently unlike to prove its originality.

"The grey morn
Dawns on the mournful scene! The sulphurous smoke
Before the icy wind slow rolls away,
And the bright beams of frosty morning dance
Along the spangling snow." Queen Mab.

This is taken from that most splendid battle-scene in Queen Mab, which is not excelled as a piece of poetic painting in any poem that I am acquainted with in the English language.

Mr. Shelley in the same poem seems to have borrowed an image from Gray—

"Ah whence yon glare
That fires the arch of heaven—that dark-red smoke
Blotting the silver moon?"

Gray has it thus—

"Horror covers all the heath,
Clouds of carnage blot the sun:
Sisters! weave the web of death:
Sisters! cease, the work is done."

Fatal Sisters.

The "wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower"—the mountain daisy, which has been immortalised by Burns, has also been celebrated by bards as noble, Shakspeare and Milton, in strains very similar and of great beauty. Milton writes

"Meadows trim with daisies pied, Shallow brooks and rivers wide."—L' Allegro.

And every one remembers the delightful song of Shakspeare commencing

"When daisies pied and violets blue
And lady-smocks all silver white
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue
Do paint the meadows with delight," &c.

Love's Labor Lost, Act V.

There is a fine example of the similarity, [without the slightest grounds for suspecting imitation, far less plagiarism.] which is almost sure to exist between authors who draw their inspiration from the same source—nature's inexhaustible fount—to be found in a description of the death of a stag in Thompson's "Season's" and in "As You Like It." They are however too long for quotation, and I am not inclined, where it can be avoided, to garble and mutilate a beautiful passage for any purpose.

Moore, though the first Lyric Poet of the age, after Burns, is certainly at times very loose in his literary morality, appropriating without a word thoughts and entire sentences of others. I will give two instances, which seem to be surely more than mere similarities.

"There's not a garden walk I tread,
There's not a flower I see, love!
But brings to mind some hope that's fled,
Some joy I've lost with thee, love!"—T. Moore.

Unquestionably taken from Burns.

"There's not a bonnie flower that springs
From fountain, shaw, or green;
There's not a bonnie bird that sings
But minds me of my Jean!" Burns.

These extracts show the characters of the Great Lyrists. Moore's flowers bloom in the garden amidst trimmed borders and cultivated vistas, which invite to the voluptuous softness of "Love's Young Dream." Burns' flowers are the mountain daisy, the violet "by some mossy stone," and such as spring spontaneously upon the rich and varied fields of nature. Moore is however not less natural because he is the poet of elegant society. Nor is Burns more so because he has selected for the source of his inspiration the tangled wildwood, the richness of mountain scenery, and the enchanted streams of his native land. They are students only of different pages of the great book of nature.

If my memory does not deceive me, it was Horace who wrote

"Quo semel est imbuta recens, servabit odorem Testa diu."

Almost literally translated by Moore,

"You may break, you may ruin the vase if you will,
The scent of the roses will cling round it still."

Speaking of Lyric poetry, I am reminded that the last line of this beautiful picture of Virgil,

"Et jam summa procul villarum culmina fumant Majoresque cadunt altis de montibus umbræ," has afforded a fine image to one of our popular hymns—

"My span of life will soon be o'er
The passing moments say,
As lengthening shadows o'er the mead
Proclaim the close of day."

The least said of the expression the better, but the figure is certainly good, and recalls to mind the myetic lines of Campbell so much admired by Scott—

"'Tis the sunset of life gives him mystical lore
And future events cast their shadows before."

There occurs also great similarity between two descriptions of Scott and Moore.

"Of broken arms and banners tore
And marshes dark with human gore."

Lord of the Isles.

Thus adroitly altered and adapted by Moore—

"The crags are red, they've clambered o'er,
And rock-weeds dripping with their gore."

Fire Worshippers.

Perhaps when Scott wrote the concluding lines of Marmion,

"To all and each a fair good-night,
And rosy dreams and slumbers light,"

he had in his mind the almost identical lines of Gray—

"Their buxom health of rosy hue,
Wild wit, invention ever new.
And lively cheer of vigor born;
The thoughtless day, the rosy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly the approach of morn."

Ode.—"Prospect of Eton."

There is great similitude, almost identity, between two passages of Byron and Shelley.

"Even the instinctive worm, on which we tread,
Turns, though it wound not—then with prostrate head,
Sinks in the dust and writhes like me—and dies."

Revolt of Islam.

Byron has improved upon this, for his poem was published sometime after the Revolt of Islam, and his verses are free from the blemish in the last line of the above in the allusion to self—the morbid sentimentality of men determined to be unhappy under any circumstances and yet continually complaining—which mars so much fine poetry of both these authors. The rhythm of Byron's is as noble as Pope's, or indeed any in our language.

"Man spurns the worm, but pauses ere he wake
The slumbering venom of the folded snake.
The first may turn, but not avenge the blow;
The last expires, but leaves no living foe."

It is not improbable, that Lord Byron had another passage of Shelley's in his mind when he wrote a celebrated portion of the Seige of Corinth. Alp, the renegade, is met by the spectre of his betrothed at a tower outside the walls of Corinth. She persuades him to return to his allegiance to his country and his religion, and concludes with these remarkable lines—

"There is a light cloud by the moon,
'Tis passing and 'twill pass full soon.
If by the time its vapory sail
Hath ceased her shaded orb to veil,
Thy heart within thee is not changed,
Then God and man are both avenged;
Dark will thy doom be; darker still Thine immortality of ill."

Siege of Corinth.

Shelley has these—

"Alas what strength! Opinion is more frail
Than yon dim cloud now fading on the moon
Even while we gaze, though it awhile avail
To hide the orb of truth," &c.

Revolt of Islam.

I consider Shelley's the better poetry. The "dim cloud fading on the moon" is better, I think, than the "light cloud" with its "vapory sail." Besides, he uses the figure to heighten the impression of an abstract truth—a noble sentiment. The concluding stanza of Byron's gives me no distinct idea.

Night has been very beautifully, nay, grandly, personified in a similar manner by three great Poets. We quote in the order in which they were written.

"Lest Philomel will deign a song,
In her sweetest, saddest plight,
Smoothing the rugged brow of night," &c.

Il Penseroso.

Shelley's are from the battle scene in Queen Mab already alluded to,

"Hark to that roar, whose swift and deafening peals
In countless echoes through the mountains ring,
Startling pale Midnight on her starry throne!"

Scott's are to be found among his smaller poems.

"Far in the bosom of the deep
O'er these wild spells my watch I keep;
A ruddy gem of changeful light
Bound on the dusky brow of night," &c.

Pharos Lequiver.

The same figure occurs in Dr. Darwin's Botanic Garden, where he describes the invading army of Cambyzes as overwhelmed by the sands of the desert agitated by a storm—

"Wave over wave the driving desert swims, Bursts o'er their heads, inhumes their struggling limbs."

And one great earthly ocean covers all.
Then ceased the storm,—Night bowed his Æthiop brow
To Earth and listened to the groans below."

I might quote many similarities in different authors on the subject of love of country. Particularly might this be done from Goldsmith and Montgomery—"The Traveller" of the one and "The West Indies" of the other. The comparison of the character of the inhabitants of a country with its natural appearance, productions, &c. is another favorite subject with Poets and has been more so since Byron wrote the Giaour, where it is beautifully done in the commencement of that poem. Goldsmith is not behind Byron however—for numerous splendid examples can be found in "The Traveller." But I am afraid of extending my pages to too great length.

Mr. D'Israeli in his article on "Poetical Imitation," in his "Curiosities," points out an instance in "the train of thought and imagery," of two passages from Beattie and Norris. I quote the first as I think it may have suggested a striking image to Moore.

"Fond fool, thou deem'st the streaming glory nigh,
How vain the chase thine ardor has begun;
'Tis fled ere half thy purposed race be run," &c.

Minstrel

Moore has it—

"The babe may cease to think that it can play
With Heaven's rainbow," &c.—Veiled Prophet.

I may as well mention, in passing, an instance where Mr. D'Israeli's "critical sagacity" has over-shot the mark. Upon the lines of Goldsmith—

"Princes and Lords may flourish and may fade,
A breath can make them as a breath has made"—

he suggests this reading as perhaps that intended by the author and more elegant—

"A breath unmakes them as a breath has made."

Now this would be inadequate to express the author's meaning, and would destroy the beauty of the antithesis, as is apparent by reference to the entire passage, which reads thus—

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey
Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
Princes and Lords may flourish and may fade
A breath can make them as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry their country's pride
Where once destroyed can never be supplied."

Deserted Village.

The Poet simply means, that the safety of a land does not depend on its Princes and Lords, for should they be destroyed they could be easily again supplied, for "a breath can make them as a breath has made." But a bold peasantry, "who constitute the State,"* who are the nerve and sinew of the nation, "where once destroyed can never be supplied." This last assertion seems startling at first, but it may not be found incorrect when looked into. It, at least, seems warranted by the fact, that in all those countries of ancient grandeur where homely industry and manly fortitude have been banished from the land by habits of luxurious ease and voluptuous effeminacy, though there exist Princes and Lords in abundance, there are now no hardy peasantry with stern honesty to guard the rights and sustain the grandeur and integrity of the Nation.

There is to me striking similarity in the structure and harmony of the verse, though not in sentiment or imagery between two very beautiful passages of Scott and Bryant. At least, I can never read the one without being reminded of the music of the other. The first is the opening couplet of one of the Cantos of the Lay—

"Call it not vain: they do not err,
Who say that when the Poet dies
Mute Nature mourns her worshipper
And celebrates his obsequies."

Mr. Bryant's are these—

"Truth crushed to Earth shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are her's;
But Error wounded writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshippers."

The Battle-field.

There are not the slightest grounds for supposing Mr. Bryant guilty of even a slight and allowable imitation. Yet, I think, [and the thought is by no means derogatory to the great American Poet,] that the lines of the immortal Scotsman may have been ringing in his mind when he penned the more beautiful lines I have quoted. I say more beautiful, because the first, though very beautiful, contain a thought which is fictitious, [though of that kind of fiction allowed to Poets generally,] and therefore cannot, I think, be equal to those of the great American which are not inferior in cadence and have the higher merit of embodying a noble moral truth. I do not pretend to be an adept in the "ungentle craft" of criticism, as Southey calls it, and I may be incorrect in my standard, but I have always considered truth as a most essential ingredient in the highest kind of Poetry. Truth I mean of sentiment and opinion—moral truth—and not merely truth of incident. To fairy tales and poems, such as the Curse of Kehama of Mr. Southey, where we meet with little else than mere glitter, and are bewildered by useless splendor and unintelligible allegory—and to such poems as are designed only to amuse and captivate, I have ever preferred those poems from whose perusal I could arise better and wiser—more prepared to oppose to "the peltings of the pitiless storm" a breast nerved by virtue and a high and lofty sense of honor—the "Justum et tenacem propositi virum" of the Latin satirist. This seems to me to be the true object—the utility of poetry.

Let us turn now to the much admired, much questioned, and only half genuine Ossian, and open at the first page of Fingal. There is a kind of simple sublimity in the beginning of the poem which will attract our attention. It opens thus—

"Cuthullin sat by Tora's wall: by the tree of the rustling sound."

The "tree of the rustling sound" was undoubtedly the Poplar or Aspen. I have been amused by observing the frequent use of it by Poets to beautify their descriptions and illustrate their sentiments. A few instances from the most celebrated poets will answer my purpose. I may first observe, however, that whatever be the opinion as to the authenticity of the entire translation of McPherson, it has been generally conceded that the opening of Fingal is among those portions which have been considered by all the genuine production of Ossian himself. If I do not mistake, Sir Walter Scott and the indefatigable Malcolm Laing are of the number who entertain this opinion. So that if there be any merit in introducing the Aspen into poetry, it rests with this ancient Bard of Scotland. We have seen that "daisies pied and violets blue" have not wanted great Poets to celebrate them, and the Aspen has, by no less master hands, been wedded to immortal song.

I must quote an entire stanza of Spenser.

"But when as none of them he saw him take,
He to him brought a dagger, sharp and keen,

And gave it him in ban : his hand did quake,
 And tremble like a leaf of Aspen green,
 And troubled blood through his pale face was seen
 To come and go with tidings from the heart,
 As it a running messenger had been.
 At last resolved to work his final smart.
 He lifted up his hand that back again did start."

Fairy Queen.

Brutus says to his wife Portia—

"You are my true and honorable wife;
 As dear to me as are the ruddy drops
 That visit my sad heart."—Julius Caesar, Act 2.

Does it not seem strange that the imagination of Spenser and Shakspeare should have comprehended the alternate flowing of the blood to and from the heart long before medical science was enriched with the discovery?

Thompson has also introduced the Aspen.

* * * "Gradual sinks the breeze
 Into a perfect calm that not a breath
 Is heard to quiver through the closing woods,
 Or rustling turn the many-twinkling leaves
 Of Aspen tall." The Seasons: Spring.

Perhaps Gray derived from Thompson his epithet of many-twinkling—

"With antic sports and blue-eyed pleasures,
 Frisking light in frolic measures:
 Now pursuing, now retreating,
 Now in circling troops they meet;
 To brisk notes in cadence beating
 Glance their many-twinkling feet."
Progress of Poetry, 1, 3.

Scott makes the leaf of the Aspen "quiver" instead of "rustle" or "twinkle" in those well known lines—

"Oh, woman! in hours of joy and ease
 Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
 And variable as the shade
 By the light quivering Aspen made!"—Marmion.

Shelly also has it. He is describing a little child pleading to the tyrant for the life of Laon, and says—

—— "She trembled, like an Aspen pale Among the gloomy pines in a Norwegian gale."
Revolt of Islam.

Scott compares to the shade and Shelley to the tree itself. This is artistically done, for the one speaks of the character, and the other represents the person.

There is of course no plagiarism in all this. But I find a passage in James Montgomery almost identical with that from Ossian.

"As through the forest's breathless gloom I strayed
 Upsprang the breeze in this delicious shade;
 Then while I sat beneath the rustling tree,
 I waked this pipe to wildest minstrelsy," &c.
World before the Flood.

There is some little similitude between the two elegant extracts with which I shall close the poetical specimens that have enriched this rather protracted article, and which I hope have not proved an unacceptable regale to the lovers of intellectual and refined viands. The first is from the pen of Mr. Meek, a gentleman justly celebrated at the South for the delightful lyrics he from time to time gives us.

"Ne'er did on mountain lake,
 Swan the wild mirror break,
 Gliding in motion so graceful as thine.—
 Lark in the summer sky,
 Breeze 'mid the hending rye,
 Fountain through flowers are not so divine!"

Girl of the Sunny South.

In a ballad of Wm. Shenstone I find a figure similar to Mr. Meek's comparison of the motion of a girl to that of the swan. Shenstone compares to the wild duck and also to flowers.

"Soft as the wild-duck's tender young,
 That float on Avon's tide;
 Bright as the water-lily sprung
 And glittering near its side;

"Fresh as the bordering flowers her bloom;
 Her eye all mild to view;
 The little halcyon's azure plume

Was never half so blue."—Nancy of the Vale.
Doddsley's Collection, Vol. 5.

At the conclusion of this article, will you permit me to say one word on the subject of the contempt with which many persons regard the pursuits of literature, and particularly poetry, holding it unworthy the attention of sensible men. Mr. Jefferson has written that "all men are born equal" and the Nation has adopted this as the grand fundamental principle in our political creed. But this equality has been misunderstood by all foreigners, without exception, and many of our own citizens are lamentably ignorant of its true tendency. It means simply legal or political equality, and no intelligent Republican will for a moment resist the doctrine of inequality in a natural or social point of view. Men are not born equal in tastes, in physical or in mental power, and in society there must exist classes, depending upon these differences, and as unequal as are the physical and intellectual endowments of those innumerable and discordant masses which compose the great integral of the Nation. In rights they are equal—in tastes and pursuits and social organization they must be dissimilar, disunited and unequal. Their own happiness requires that the fabric of society should not be composed of parts unsuited to each other united in too intimate association.

The great majority of men are mere feeders—animals—whose great business in life is to accumulate money that they may, in the language of the Dean of St. Patrick's,

"Eat, and drink, and sleep—what then?
 Why eat, and drink and sleep again!"

To this every thought is devoted. They pursue wealth with all the energies of their nature, as though man was alone created for so noble and laudable a purpose. The souls of such men are bounded by the circumference of "the Almighty dollar." Such men despise poetry—though the Bible is full of poetry. They despise literary men, literature and literary avocations, though they are indebted to such men and to such pursuits for the freedom in which they enjoy their own gross and sensual employments.

To the innumerable achievements of science and to the pervading influence of literature, and more particularly to the lofty aspirations of poetry, how much do we not owe that is useful in commerce and manufactures, that tends to increase the comforts and diminish the misery of man, that is noble and salutary in principle and practice? There is utility in poetry. The verse which the despised and solitary poet pens in his poverty-stricken chamber incites to noble actions, induces to lofty character. Its influence is felt through the whole frame-work of society, long after the hand which wrote is mouldering in the dust. And when some blow is stricken for human liberty, or some sentence uttered causing a whole people to vibrate, perhaps its unseen and incalculable power may have animated the arm that struck or moved the tongue that uttered it.

Honor and honesty and patriotism and love of right and repugnance to wrong, respect for ancestry, care for prosperity, veneration for age, fortitude in adversity, temperance in prosperity, are all the inculcations of poetry. Its legitimate object, in connection with science and prose literature, is to ameliorate as far as possible the condition of man, to emancipate him from the shackles of error, and by enlarging the liberality of his judgement and his affections, to contribute to his liberty of pursuing that course for happiness which his taste may desire and his reason select.

There is another class of men, greatly in the minority, however, who are the antipodes to those of the leaden soul of whom I have spoken, who are literary men, who write and who read—who think—whose pleasures are intellectual, whose aspirations are high, whose souls are alive with all those nobler sentiments which make the gold of human nature.

There is and always has been a deadly hostility between these two classes confined to no country and to no age, but raging with as much rancour under the Dominion of the Cæsars and in the remotest days of Pericles, in the palmy days of Athenian splendor, as at the present day, in Aristocratic Britain or Republican America. It is the case in Edinburgh* as well as in New-York, though it has been erroneously attributed to some peculiarity in our institutions. It exists every where in civilized society, because it arises from a principle in the character of man which will not permit him to love or appreciate that which he cannot understand and with which he is incapable of feeling any congeniality of taste or disposition.

I would that the thousands of men who are now going on in their ceaseless march to eternity, without one thought elevated above the mere necessities of this life, were capable of understanding, of loving and of appreciating poetry! It is such a resource to fall back upon—it so elevates the mind, ennobles the heart—is such a solace in misfortune, such a comfort in solitude, such a strengthener of the bonds of honor and virtue, and contains so great a store of quiet and peaceful happiness.

Poetry has been called light reading, and considered on that account unprofitable. Are the wonderful story of Job, the mystical song of Solomon, and the flaming pæans of Isaiah and Habakkuk, light reading intended merely for amusement? Can that splendid and complete treatise on philosophy and theology, the "Essay on Man," be read without profit? The soul of the chivalric Sidney, by the reading of a simple English Ballad of the olden time, was, as he himself has said, aroused as by the blast of a trumpet; and how is it possible to calculate the heroes that have been made, the souls that have been attuned to lofty daring and noble deeds, by the innumerable grand poems in our own language and in the language of every nation where the art of writing has been known. Poetry, so far from being light reading, is the utmost perfection of thought and language—the concentration of reason—the embodiment of ideality—the vehicle of religion and morality; clothed with the spirit of harmony and beauty it is an angel whose mission is to expand the intellect and to attune the soul to something higher and nobler than the "eating, drinking and sleeping" of mere mortality.

We have seen a Great British Minister cheering his hours of exile with literary avocations, and I will end this gossiping epistle with a quotation from the great Roman Lawyer and Orator whom that minister has characterised as "That great man, who had been the savior of his country; who had feared in the support of that cause neither the insults of a desperate party nor the daggers of the assassins."^{*}

Cicero in his "Oration for the Poet Archias" says, "Sit igitur, judices, sanctum apud vos, humanissimos homines, hoc poëtæ nomen, quod nulla unquam barbaria violavit. Saxa et solitudines voci respondent, bestię sæpe immanes cantu flecuntur, atque consistunt: nos instituti rebus optimis non poëtarum voce moveamur?"

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

We must own, that we are devout believers in the well-known dictum of Horace

"Mediocribus esse poetis
Non homines, non di, non concessere columnæ."

Or, as Byron has it,

"The middling poet's miserable volumes
Are cursed alike by gods, and men, and columns."

And, if it be true, we fear that Mr. Tennyson and his works stand a strong chance of being condemned forever, although, indeed, he can scarcely come under the category even of the "poetæ mediocres." In reading his verses, we are continually reminded of Swift's lines, in his "Rhapsody on Poetry,"

"From bad to worse and worse they fall,
But who can reach the worst of all?
For, though in Nature, depth and height
Be equally held infinite,
In Poetry the height we know,—
'Tis only infinite below."

Thus, we speedily ascertain the height of Mr. Tennyson's poetry, but the depth is a more difficult question. We are continually cheated into the hope, that we have reached the lowest pitch of folly and bathos,

"But, in the lowest deep, a lower deep,
Still threatening to devour me, opens wide."

We find that we have to begin our search anew, and, after various efforts, settle down in the conviction that "the worst of all" is not to be found.

For instance, when we meet with an inanity like the following, we sincerely hope that there can be nothing worse.

CIRCUMSTANCE.

"Two children in two neighbor villages
Playing mad pranks amid the heathy leas;
Two strangers meeting at a festival;
Two lovers whispering by an orchard wall;
Two lives bound fast in one with golden ease;
Two graves, grass-green, beside a gray church tower,
Washed by still rains and daisy-blossomed;
Two children in one hamlet born and bred;
So runs the round of life from hour to hour."*

* It may be as well to inform the reader, that the above is in rhyme, or, at least, is meant to be so; a fact which we did not discover until we had perused it for the third time in the hope of extracting some meaning from it. We found, at last, that it was merely a kind of double of Shakespeare's "Seven Ages."

But this well-founded expectation is immediately dashed to the ground by the following sportive lines on a

SKIPPING-ROPE.

"Sure never yet was Antelope
Could skip so lightly by.
Stand off! or else my skipping-rope
Will hit you in the eye!
How lightly whirls the skipping-rope!
How fairy-like you fly!
Go, get you gone, you muse and mope,
I hate that silly sigh!
Nay, dearest, teach me how to hope,
Or tell me how to die.
Here, take it, take my skipping-rope,
And hang yourself thereby!"

This is exactly such a conversation as we might expect to pass between a man like Mr. Tennyson and his Dulcinea, but it is hardly worth putting forth to the world.

Our search after "the worst of all" is again renewed by lighting on the two songs to the owl. Of these elegant compositions, the first is sufficiently characterized by its first and last line—

"When cats run home, and light is come,—
Alone and warming his five wits
The white owl in the belfry sits."

To the second, we should render injustice, did we copy less than the last stanza.

"I would mock thy chaunt anew
But I cannot mimic it.
Not a-whit of thy tu-whoo
Thee to woo to thy tu-whit
Thee to woo to thy tu-whit,
With a lengthened loud halloo
Tu-whoo, tu-whit, tu-whit, tu-woo-o-o!"

The reader will mark the exquisite puns contained in the third and fourth lines, which we have italicised for his convenience.

These extracts are sportive, and, in intention at least, witty. But Mr. Tennyson's command over the pathetic is even more remarkable than that over the humorous. How deeply does he not call upon the finest sympathies of our nature by the following inimitable instance of climax, from the affecting ballad of "Oriana!" A lover in battle, aims an arrow at a foeman, but, somehow or other,

"The bitter arrow went aside,
Oriana!
The false, false arrow went aside,
Oriana!
The damned arrow glanced aside,
It pierced thy heart, my love, my bride,
Oriana!
Thy heart, my life, my love, my bride,
Oriana!"

By this masterly selection of adjectives, we are brought to observe the almost maniac earnestness with which the unhappy being dwells upon the fatal accident which has bereaved him, and how, in repeating it, his feelings are gradually worked up from "bitter" to "false, false," and from that to "d—d." Mr. Tennyson, with great skill, has perceived that such profanity finds its own excuse in the terrible anxiety of the unfortunate lover to lay the blame on anything but himself. In all the range of modern poetry, we remember but one passage which will bear the slightest comparison with this. We, of course, allude to the celebrated and beautiful scene in which King Arthur is informed of the tragic end of Tom Thumb, by the villainous Red Cow.

Mr. Tennyson appears to be a man of slender intellect, who has inflamed his imagination by believing himself a poet, and has supplied its numerous vacuities by studying the works of others. Thus, as might be expected, his works are one long imitation, sometimes of one poet, and sometimes of another, according to the state of his mind, or the nature of his reading. We trace it in the plots of his ballads, the cast of his thoughts, and in his very style and diction. A few striking instances of this will be noticed as we proceed, but we may as well throw together here a few minor ones which have occurred to us in glancing over his volumes. He has taken divers old women's tales, such as every child has by heart, and cooked them up into long, prosy ballads, completely extracting all the naive spirit that is in the original. For instance, the worn-out incident of a nobleman's wooing a maiden in humble guise, which has served all such unfortunate poetasters, until it ought, in common charity, to be set aside as superannuated, is made to do duty, in naked simplicity, in a poem more than a hundred lines long. A child changed in the cradle constitutes another of five pages; an old fairy-tale, saddled with prologue and epilogue, moral and "l'envoi," occupies nearly twenty pages; and Mr. Tennyson has even gone so far as to give us, in the "Miller's Daughter," as original, a wretchedly paraphrastic translation of Anacreon's beautiful little ode "Ἡ Ταρτάλου πορ' ἐστὴν. κ. τ. λ."

As an instance of pilfered thoughts, we may give the following from one of his numerous addresses to his various lady-loves. It is nothing more than an amplification and degradation of Byron's exquisite lines in his description of Zuleika.

"Who hath not proved how feebly words essay
To fix one spark of Beauty's heavenly ray?
Who doth not feel—until his falling sight—
Faints into dimness with its own delight—
His changing cheek, his sinking heart confess
The might—the majesty of loveliness." &c.

Now for the tinsel, after the real gold.

"How may full-sailed verse express,
How may measured words adore
The full flowing harmony
Of thy swan-like stateliness,
Eléanore?
The luxuriant symmetry
Of thy floating gracefulness,
Eléanore?

Every turn and glance of thine,
Every lineament divine,
Eléanore?" &c. &c.

There is a good deal of melody about this, and the words are disposed so as to sound very much like sense: but it is the sense of the eye and the ear, not of the mind, for if we analyze it, we will find that it is merely Byron's idea, almost smothered beneath an enormous pile of meaningless words.

By the way, his odes to his numerous Dulcineas are usually of a somewhat singular nature. Here, in the commencement and conclusion of one addressed to a maiden whose nomme-de-guerre is "Lilian," and who appears to have been so much amused at his peculiar manner of popping the question, that his dignity was outraged.

"Airy, fairy, Lilian,
Flitting, fairy Lilian,
When I ask her if she love me.
Claps her little hands above me
Laughing all she can.
* * *
Praying all I can,
If prayers will not hush thee,
Airy Lilian,
Like a rose-leaf will I crush thee,
Fairy Lilian."

He is certainly sanguinary, when he wishes to crush young ladies "like rose-leaves," because they cannot, for their little souls, help laughing at him. Were he to follow out this destructive plan to its fullest extent, he would be a second Nero, and would wish that his readers were collected in one rose.

But, to resume the subject of Mr. Tennyson's originality, we may observe, that his usual style is a kind of dreamy imitation of the worst parts of Coleridge and Wordsworth, occasionally throwing in an antiquated word or phrase. In a happy manner, peculiarly his own, he has managed to mingle, in one common abortion, now the cloudy mysticism of the one, and now the impoverished simplicity which marked the earlier efforts of the other. To make the composition complete, he has adopted Keats' style of rhyming, bringing in ideas for the sake of the rhyme, and contenting himself with a faint jingle of sound; but of this, more anon. Coleridge, however, would seem to be his favorite. The attempted imitation of him may be seen in several of the extracts already given, and we might quote dozens more, although our limits will admit of but one.

He has an almost interminable poem, entitled "The Palace of Art," of which the style is affectedly Coleridge's, and the design a base imitation of Thompson's inimitable "Castle of Indolence; but

"Hei mihi! ——— quantum mutatus ab illo Hecore"———

*Even this idea is but the line in the same passage of Byron,
"The mind, the music breathing from her face," carried to a pitch beyond all taste.

It commences thus—

"I built my soul a lordly pleasure-house,
Wherein at ease for aye to dwell.
I said, 'Oh soul! make merry and carouse,
Dear soul! for all is well.'

"A huge crag-platform, smooth as burnished brass,
I chose. The ranged ramparts bright
From level meadow-bases of deep grass
Suddenly scaled the light."

He must have searched long before finding a "location" so singularly adapted to his purpose. But, granting this, we must accompany him through a long and verbose description of the said "lordly pleasure-house," in which Thompson's is used as a ground plan. When that is safely accomplished, we find his soul, by way of making merry and carousing, begins to metaphysicize in the following profound, yet lucid stanzas:

"From shape to shape, at first, within the womb,
The brain is modelled," she began.

"And, thro' all phases of all thought, I come Into the perfect man.

"All Nature widens upwards. Evermore
The Simpler Essence lower lies:
More complex is more perfect. Owning more Discourse, more widely wise."

This is worthy of the author of the "Biographia Literaria" himself. But, to return. It is not to be supposed, that a course of such dissipation and carousing could last forever. Accordingly, though three years passed away happily enough, during the fourth—

"But in dark corners of her palace stood
Uncertain shapes, and unawares,
On white-eyed phantoms, weeping tears of blood,
And horrible night-mares,

"And hollow shades, enclosing hearts of flame,
And, with dim-fretted foreheads all,
On corpses three months old at noon she came,
Standing against the wall."

And this is worthy the author of "The Ancient Mariner." But we must own, that we have no very clear idea what were these three-months-old corpses, uncertain shapes and hollow shades, with their white eyes, tears of blood, dim-fretted foreheads, and hearts of flame; still, we are willing to believe that it was all very terrible, and are, therefore, not at all surprised that it brought his unhappy soul to her senses, and that she left her "Palace of Art," as we do, with disgust; although, unlike us, she looked forward to returning to it at some more auspicious period, when these "day night-mares" should have taken themselves off.

Now, in the above poem, Mr. Tennyson is evidently laboring under the remarkable delusion of supposing that he is illustrating an important psychological fact. As in this singular opinion he appears to be supported by some of his admirers, (the Edinburg Review, among others,) we would recommend it as an interesting subject to Mr. Mackay, for the next edition of his amusing book.*

Again, here is the commencement of another poem, meant, we presume, to be in Wordsworth's style. It is a natural colloquy, or a colloquy between two naturals, John and James, and is entitled

WALKING TO THE MAIL.

John. I'm glad I walked! How fresh the country looks!
Is yonder planting where this byeway runs
The turnpike?

James. Yes.

John. And when does this come by?

James. The Mail? At one o'clock.

John. What is it now?

James. A quarto to.

John. Whose house is that I see

Beyond the water-mill.

James. Sir Edward Head's, &c.

And this is called poetry! It is worse than Southey's worst Juvenile Eclogue.

Having now described some of Mr. Tennyson's borrowed plumage, we will proceed to examine the peculiarities which mark his own feathers, and should any inconsistency appear to exist in the faults that we find with him, we beg the reader to bear in mind that he has so skilfully contrived to mingle the most opposite errors, that it is almost impossible, in exposing them, to steer clear of apparent contradictions. For instance, we have just quoted a passage as an example of the most naked simplicity. Now, in what appears to be Mr. Tennyson's natural style, one of his greatest faults is a certain vague redundancy of words, which he piles on each other, without eliciting the slightest sense. He will thus ramble on, page after page, perpetually beguiling us with the hope that we are on the brink of something, until, tired of exclaiming "quo tendis," we retrace our steps, and find that the whole consists of nothing but nonsense-verses. We can almost believe that Horace had him in view in the beginning of his Art of Poetry.

"Credite, Pisones, isti tabulæ fore librum
Persimilem, cujus, velut ægri somnia, vanæ
Finguntur species; ut nec pes, nec caput uni
Reddatur formæ.

* * * Amphora caput
Institui; currente rotâ, cur urceus exit?

As examples of this fault, we may mention a long collection of double-trochaics entitled "Lockesly Hall," which occupies twenty pages; "The Two Voices" of thirty; "The Lady of Shalott;" "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue," of thirteen pages, and "The Vision of Sin," of as many. By the way, we cannot resist the temptation of quoting a few lines from this said "Vision of Sin," it is such a piece of "rhetoricke sweete." In it, we certainly cannot accuse Mr. Tennyson of having imitated any body or any thing. It is a feather of his own, and let him put it in his cap and wear it.

* * * Memoirs of Popular Delusions, by Charles Mackay.

"Wrinkled Ostler! grim and thin!
Here is custom come your way.
Take my beast and lead him in,
Stuff his ribs with mouldy hay!

"Bitter Barmaid, waning fast!
See that sheets are on my bed.
What! the flower of life is passed;
It is long before you wed.

"Slipshod Waiter, lank and sour
At the Dragon on the Heath!
Let me have a quiet hour,
Let me hob-and-nob with Death!" &c.

Had Mr. Tennyson followed the antiphlogistic diet he prescribes for his horse, his brain could never have become so inflamed as to imagine himself a poet.

Even in his smaller pieces, we are often at a loss to discover his object. He never seems to know when to stop, and yet he always seems to stop sooner than he had intended, and before he had come to the middle of his poem. Our limits forbid us to extract any long piece to exemplify this properly, but we give a short one which will serve as a specimen of the usual meaning, or rather no meaning, of his verses. As in nearly all of his pseudo-ballads, it is stolen from the nursery.

THE BEGGAR-MAID.

"Her arms across her breast she laid,
She was more fair than words can say.
Barefooted came the Beggar-Maid,
Before the king, Cophetua,
In robe and crown, the king stepped down,
To meet and greet her on her way.
'It is no wonder,' said the lords,
'She is more beautiful than day.'

"As shines the moon in clouded skies,
She in her poor attire was seen.
One praised her ancles, one her eyes,
One her dark hair, and lovesome mien.
—So sweet a face, such angel grace
In all that land had never been.
Cophetua sware a royal oath,
'This beggar-maid shall be my queen!'

Now, how much paper and ink would not Mr. Tennyson have saved, had he merely remarked, "A Beggar-Maid came before Cophetua; she was beautiful and he promised to marry her." We should have had quite as much poetry in fewer words. And yet this is better than many of his other pieces.

In one place we have between seventy and eighty stanzas entitled "A Dream of Fair Women." The idea is a good one, and, in the hands of a poet, might have produced a pleasing performance, yet, in his, it is but a silly abortion. Among other "fair women" he sees Cleopatra, and surely Shakspeare's exquisite impersonation of her might well have warned him off the premises, and spared us such verses as the following. Cleopatra loquiter.

———"But prythee, friend,
Where is Mark Antony?"

"By him great Pompey dwarfs and suffers pain,
A mortal man, before immortal Mars.
The glories of Great Julius lapse and wane,
And shrink from suns to stars.

"That man, of all the men I ever knew,
Most touched my fancy. Oh! what days and nights
We had in Egypt, ever reaping new Harvest of ripe delights," &c.

In reading this, we are strongly reminded of Horace's

"Pindarum quisquis studet æmulari," &c.

Mr. Tennyson has endeavored to imitate Shakspeare's delineation of Cleopatra; her exaggerated praises of Antony, her fiery voluptuousness, and the indescribable charm which that master hand has communicated to a character not naturally pleasing to us, and see what he has produced with his "ope Dædalea!"

And again, how beautifully and philosophically he describes the changes of his visions. We could almost believe that he had Coleridge at his elbow while composing it.

"All those sharp fancies, by down-lapsing thought,
Streamed onward, lost their edges and did creep Rolled on each other, rounded, smoothed and brought Into the gulfs of sleep."

We here see how sharp fancies can be streamed onward by down-lapsing thought until they lose their edges, then creep while rolled on each other, rounded and polished, and finally brought into the gulfs of sleep. One would think that he was, in reality, filling up the cavities of his imagination with rubble-stones. Compare, for one moment, this labored effort with Byron's majestic simplicity.

"A change came o'er the spirit of my dream," and we shall see the spanless "gulf" that exists between a real poet and a versifier like this.

Then again, how exquisite is Iphigenia's description of her own death! He apparently forgets, what every school-boy knows, that she was carried by Diana to Tauris.

"The tall masts quivered as they lay afloat,
The temples, and the people, and the shore.
One drew a sharp knife through my tender throat,
Slowly,—and nothing more!"

And what more would she have? But we may safely defy any one to make sense of the stanza. Did the tall masts, as they lay afloat, quiver "the temples, and the people, and the shore?" And what was it that did the bloody deed, one temple, or one tall mast, or one people, or one shore? The form of the sentence, certainly would indicate the last, yet we shrewdly suspect it must have been the first. But let him give up the pen and read

Euripides and Lempriere and he will have a better idea of it than all his own writings can give him.

These, however, are but as the playful lashings of the tail of the Great Leviathan of the Deep. Mark him when he comes, in the full consciousness of irresistible might, to exterminate a puny and unfortunate foe.

TO CHRISTOPHER NORTH.

"You did late review my lays,
Rusty Christopher,
You did mingle blame and praise,
Crusty Christopher.
When I learned from whom it came
I forgave you all the blame,
Musty Christopher.
I could not forgive the praise,
Fusty Christopher!"

With this piece of unrelenting severity, and the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers" before their eyes, it will be long before the Northern critics will again venture to dissect an unfortunate Southron.

It will readily be seen from the extracts which we have given, that Mr. Tennyson finds what Byron calls

"Those buoyant supporters, the bladders of rhyme," to be any thing but a support or assistance. Indeed, they seem to press on him like the fetters of a galley slave, and he can no more sustain them with ease or credit, than that respectable personage can perform on the corde-volante. Yet, in spite of all this, he is continually burdening himself with the frequent and useless recurrence of a rhyme and the necessity of bringing the same line at the end of every stanza. Instances of the former may be found in the "Skipping-Rope" and "Beggar-Maid," quoted above; of the latter, we will only mention one of his least silly poems, "The May Queen," in which every quatrain stanza ends with this snake-like line.

"For I'm to be queen o' the May; mother, I'm to be queen o' the May!"

This, of course, subjects him to the necessity of finding a rhyme for it in every verse, and the shifts to which he is put to sustain this are truly ludicrous.

And again, he delights to bring in the same line or couplet into each verse, whether it bear any relation to the context or not. For instance, take the first stanza of a piece called

"THE SISTERS."

"We were two daughters of one race,
She was the fairest in the face:
The wind is blowing in turret and tree,
They were together, and she fell;
Therefore revenge became me well.
O the earl was fair to see!"

* In justice to Mr. Tennyson, we must observe that he appears to have been made sensible of the exquisite folly of this and has omitted it in his late editions.

Now this is ridiculous.

"The wind is blowing in turret and tree,
—O the earl was fair to see!"

is brought into each verse of the poem in the same head and shoulders-manner. This fault may be found in very many of his pieces, such as "Orana," whose name alternates with every line; "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," whose title thus commences each stanza; "The Lady of Shalott" in which the refrain is ingeniously varied from "The Lady of Shalott" to "Down to Camelot," and occasionally to "Brave Sir Lancelot;" "The Dirge," where the burthen is "let them rave," forced, against its own will, to enter continually, after this fashion—

"Crocodiles wept tears for thee!
The woodbine and the eglanters
Drip sweeter dew than traitor's tear.
Let them rave."

Another peculiarity of Mr. Tennyson's manner of writing is, that he has managed to join, with felicity essentially his own, unbearable prolixity to a style completely impoverished by the shortest possible sentences. Thus, in the verse just quoted from "The Sisters," it will be seen that every line constitutes a separate and entire sentence; and the same will be found, on examination, to be the case in nearly all the extracts given above. It occurs, indeed, throughout his writings.

Mr. Tennyson's versification partakes of the same irregularities which distinguish his style; but with this distinction, that it is sometimes good. We occasionally meet with passages of considerable melody, such as the lines on "Eleanore" extracted above, but he is, in general, exceedingly careless, and we not unfrequently come across passages in which he seems to have collected all the "dissonant consonants,"* and impracticable vowels in the language, and which set our teeth jarring to repeat them; as the following couplet from "Sir Galahad":

"My good blade carves the casques of men,
My tough spear thrusteth sure."

Besides all these, Mr. Tennyson has faults of language in abundance. He manufactures words, alters them, and frequently uses them in the most singular manner. Thus he says, "my sense undazzled" for "my sight became undazzled," "great Pompey dwarfs," "a gemmy belt," "vary-colored shells," "dazed vision," "twisted silvers," "a many tears," "lovesome," "anight," "anear," "atween," "anadems," &c., &c. He furnishes Cupid with "sheeny vans," and dignifies the sun with the appellation of "captain of my dreams." It is the same with respect to rhymes. Every page teems with half-rhymes, barely admissible, and many that are no rhymes at all. Thus "palaces" is

* "Some Russian, whose dissonant consonant name Almost rattles to fragments the trumpet of Fame."

Moore.—The Twoopeny Post-Boys.

forced to jingle with "sanctuaries," "sloe-tree" with "coterie," "air" with "sepulche," "lattices" with "breeze," "tendons" with "attendance," a "tear" with "eglantere," "more" with "evermore," "heavenness" with "weariness," "stateliness" with "gracefulness," "Shalott" with "Lancelot" and "Camelot,"—but our list is growing too long, "I'll see no more!" We are not of those who would always had the poet down to a perfect rhyme, but these are carried beyond all license. And another thing which the reader must have remarked, even in the few extracts given here, is the profusion of double epithets, a fault very striking in our language, and one in which a careless writer is very apt to fall.

Again, from his affection of old words and obsolete phrases, he evidently wishes to imitate the older writers, and, no doubt, flatters himself that he is doing so: but he should remember that they atoned for ruggedness by strength, and for occasional vulgarity by force and fidelity to nature, while his verse is completely effete and unnatural. Thus we see a mixture of turgidity and poverty which is often striking. In short, he is one of those who cannot originate, and who, in imitating, manage to catch all the defects of their models, and to let slip all their beauties. There is hardly a poetical fault, collected from the most opposite sources, which cannot be pointed out in some part of these volumes.

We had marked for extraction a great part of some truly exquisite lines addressed to the Old Year, but we are already exceeding our limits and must be content with the following elegant adjuration:

"Shake hands before you die.
Old year, we'll dearly rue for you,
What is there we can do for you?
Speak out before you die!"

How encouraging! It sounds like the first attempt of a melancholy school-boy on his tenth New-Year's Day.

It would seem, however, that Mr. Tennyson has anticipated criticism, for he thus enters his caveat against it:

"Vex thou not the poet's mind
With thy shallow wit.
Vex thou not the poet's mind,
For thou canst not fathom it.
Clear and bright it should be ever,
Flowing like a crystal river,
Bright as light and pure as wind."

What can he know of the poet's mind? Indeed, we suspect, from the general character of his poetry, that with him it is not "out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh." He would seem to sit down to compose, not that he feels the estro, the inspiration, but that he thinks it necessary to write, because he has the reputation of poet. Indeed, we should not be surprised if he imposed a certain number of lines per diem on himself as a task. Thus it is, that we so constantly find words without thoughts. He takes up the pen in order to bring ideas, instead of allowing the ideas to call on the pen.

Still, notwithstanding all these multitudinous faults, when Mr. Tennyson throws off the fetters of rhyme, which he has not sufficient command of language to master, and releases himself from the restraints imposed by the complex form and frequently recurring rhyme of his stanzas, he can sometimes write well. There are good and even beautiful passages in "Ænone," "Godiva," "Dora," and one or two others, but to exhibit them in their prolixity, would require more space than we can afford.

Mr. Tennyson might, also, very likely please if he would only condescend to be more natural, but he rarely calls on us for sympathy with humanity. Almost the only instances in which he has done so are "Dora," "The May-Queen," its continuation, "The New-Year's Eve," and "The Miller's Daughter," and these are, by far, the most pleasing pieces in his volumes. The following lines from the latter are good, but their beauty is clouded by the neglect of harmony and of elegance of language, which is one of his characteristics.

"Look through mine eyes with thine, true wife,
Round my true heart thine arms entwine.
My other, dearer, life in life,
Look through my very soul with thine.
Untouched by any shade of years,
May those kind eyes forever dwell.
They have not shed a many tears
Dear eyes! since first I knew them well."

If he were to confine himself to such simple expressions of natural feeling, his poetry would be pleasing, but all his "Claribels," "Adelines," "Fatimas," "Marianas," "Eleanores," et hoc genus omne, are creatures which have never existed anywhere out of his distempered brain, and which, in their mysterious attributes, such as

"Mystery of mysteries,
Faintly smiling Adeline
Scarce of earth, nor all divine," &c.

are so entirely removed from us in every thing, that all his raptures concerning them can excite but a smile. And this is the general peculiarity of his poetry. It has, usually, the same dreamy misty character, as if it had been fashioned during a summer afternoon nap, under a tree, after too much dinner, while his brain was humming with the rustling of leaves and the buzzing of bees. It is, accordingly, particularly destitute of force and vigor, and, therefore, when he would be satirical or witty, his failure is ludicrously wretched. As instances of this, we may mention "Amphion," "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," and the lines quoted above on Christopher North.

In conclusion, we may be permitted to observe, that Mr. Tennyson might confer a benefit, not only on the world but on himself, if he would only convert his pen into a pruning-hook, and his inkstand into a watering-pot; for, though his vanity would no longer be gratified by seeing his own name in print, except as the cultivator of enormous pumpkins and gigantic strawberries, yet he might gratify a spirit of enlarged benevolence by raising two blades of grass where one grew before, and his rest would be no longer broken by remorse at sending "such reams of blank among the sons of men." Indeed, we have no doubt but that in a short time after the enjoyment of these placid pleasures and the delights of a quiet conscience, he will look back to his past life with regret and repentance.

We feel that we owe some apology to the reader who has accompanied us thus far, for having detained him so long over so poor and fruitless a subject; but the fact is, that in the present dearth of poetical talent, many false prophets arise who are not without that honor which should be reserved for worthier objects. Mr. Tennyson's poems have been successful in England. They have been republished here, and we are informed that they have met with a ready and extensive sale. They have been considered worthy of all the elegancies of typography, in a manner rarely accorded to authors in this country; and they have been read, and no doubt admired, by many who should have had more critical judgment, for poetry like his is apt to beget an agreeable confusion of ideas, which careless readers mistake for an evidence of the power and depth of their author, when, in reality, it but shows his looseness of thought. These facts we consider to be a sufficient excuse for the space we have bestowed on him, and, if we are mistaken, "humanum est errare."

SONNET.—ENDURANCE.

BY ANNA M. HIRST.

Some writhe—some sink—some die in this rude world

Beneath the rough blows of their brother man;
But there are those that scorn his envious ban,
Who, with high hearts and lips serenely curled
In honest scorn, laugh at the slanders hurled
Against the armor of their honesties—

Who, flinging out their banners on the breeze,
Walk on; their noble eyes with tears impearled
That flesh should be so base—who, as they go,
Scatter the seeds of honor o'er the land,
Knowing that after-times will see them stand
Tall trees, whence shades shall fall and music glow
To glad some way-worn brother's heart—some soul
Who seeks, with trust in truth, Fame's golden goal.

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

No. III.

"An Army is a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man."—Locke.

TO THE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON.

For fear of an incorrect and unjust inference which may be drawn from my preceding numbers, as they expose abuses without suggesting remedies, and to check, if possible, what I conceive to be an erroneous move in Congress in regard to the interests of the Army, I must so far modify my plan as to explain before hand what I had intended to prove, so clearly as to require no further elucidation. Before commencing to build on an old site, I had intended to remove the ungainly and almost irreparable edifice, with its attending rubbish, and then, upon a foundation unincumbered, rear a structure of the same material which would do honor to the country, and relieve it from a burden now imposed for attendants and furniture which the improvements introduced would render unnecessary. This can be done with a saving of at least half a million to the treasury and at the same time increase the efficiency and usefulness of the Army.

I regretted to perceive one of the inquiries of the Hon. Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and through you I will suggest to him a delay of action on that one point until I take it up, when, I doubt not, he will see the advantages of the plan I will propose to him. I refer to his inquiring as to the propriety of disbanding a number of the youngest of our officers, the most competent, physically and mentally, to enter upon the duties of a soldier's life. They are just arriving at the vigor of manhood, and, in the event of there being a necessity for an Army at all, they are the men we shall want. The amount which will be saved by disbanding these young men will be very inconsiderable in itself, but if it be a consideration, and it is believed the country will be benefitted by a reduction in the number of officers in the line of the Army, let it be done upon a plan which will not only save the same amount of money, but secure efficiency to our service. A plan has been several times pressed on Congress by the Commanding General, Secretary of War and President, for establishing a retired list for old and invalid officers. It was proposed to allow those unfitted for duty by age, or other infirmities, to retire from active service and to fill their places by the young men below them in such a way as not to increase the Army, unless additional officers were appointed at the bottom of the list. A bill was submitted by General Macomb, in 1840, for this purpose, accompanied by a tabular report from the Pay Master General showing that a saving would be effected by it though the vacancies created should be filled by new appointments of Second Lieutenants. If these appointments are not made, but those now in service be retained to fill vacancies thus created, you must readily see the advantage which must result to the Army, and that a greater saving will be made than by dropping the same number of junior officers from the foot of the list. And if any further action be necessary, suspend the operation which supplies these young officers, but I cannot believe that Congress will think of discharging from the service men whom they have educated at a considerable expense, and who are rendered doubly valuable by experience principally acquired in the field, and continue the education of more to supply vacancies which the disbanding of those now in service must soon create. I had intended making this the subject of a separate letter and must now refer you to General Maccomb's and Mr. Poinsett's reports of 1840 for the particulars of the plan submitted; which, with a few modifications, will effect more than Mr. McKoy seems to aim at; and, in the end, leave us in a healthy and vigorous condition instead of palsied and enervated by years and disease. What would be thought of the man who should go into his orchard and trim out all the young, healthy and thriving shoots from his fruit trees, leaving behind him decayed, windshaken and diseased trunks, which can scarcely bear their own weight and are unable to afford sustenance to the fruit with which nature cloths them! But apply the case: it is precisely similar. I would not be understood as expressing a desire to cast aside the veterans who have spent their lives in support of their country—they deserve and have a right to demand more. The plan to which I refer you fully provides for them. If the Hon. Chairman will give me his attention, I promise to convince him he is but “penny wise.”

On one of his inquiries, Congress should act at once. Cut off all double rations—and reduce the appropriations thirty thousand dollars. Such is their cost. I will give you reasons and good ones hereafter.

I find, from official documents, that in 1838 the line of our Army was increased in numbers about fifty per cent.

The Staff at the same time was increased in numbers about two hundred and seventy-five per cent.

The expenses of the line at this time were only increased about twenty-five per cent., owing to the additions being made entirely to “the rank and file”—the number of officers was actually reduced.

The expenses of the Staff were increased from one thousand to fifteen hundred per cent., owing to the additions made to the number of officers, nearly all with increased rank and every one with greatly increased pay.

What is the result in 1842, when the Army is again reduced?

I find from official documents, that the line is reduced from twelve thousand four hundred and ninety-five, to seven thousand five hundred and ninety—nearly forty per cent.

The Staff is at the same time reduced about seven per cent., and that, too, by cutting off the most useful and necessary part—the Medical, Pay, and Inspector's Departments. The increase in 1838 required an addition to our Staff, at least we were told so, and I can discover no reason why their own arguments for an increase will not bear against them when a reduction is effected, unless our late Secretary has discovered one in “the extent of country over which they are spread.” We find too, in less than five years after this small reduction has been made by Congress, it is more than counterbalanced by the addition of Brevet Second Lieutenants to the different Staff corps, whose services are about as valuable and necessary as the thread lace is to a lady's cambric handkerchief. Including these supernumerary and unnecessary officers, our Staff is as large and expensive now, with an Army of seven thousand five hundred and ninety, as it was when the Army was twelve thousand four hundred and ninety-five. This may be necessary from “the extent of country over which the Army is spread,” but I doubt whether Congress will be willing to keep up a large and unnecessary Staff, composed of indolent and useless officers, in order to supply every large city in our wide spread country with one of these drones who lives upon the reputation of the working bee, and who is of about as much use to the Army as the fop of Broadway, or Chesnut street is to the society of New York or Philadelphia.

Before proceeding to my task of examining these Staff Departments, corps by corps, I must in candor say to their members, individually and collectively,

“A chiel's amang ye takin' notes,
And faith, he'll prent it.”

The table in No. 2* shows that in 1821 we had a Quarter Master's Department which was considered sufficient for the wants of the service at that time. It consisted of a Quarter Master General, two Quarter Masters and four military store keepers. Since that time three regiments have been added to the eleven we then had in service and with them we find two Colonels, two Lieutenant Colonels, two Majors and twenty-eight Captains added to this department, an increase of seven hundred per cent. Why were these offices created? This question would be easily and plausibly answered by the department if referred to it; but ask any officer of rank and standing in the Army, disconnected with the loaves and fishes, which the department distribute, and the answer will universally tell against them. The increase of the Army has not demanded it—"the extent of country over which the Army is spread," which our late Secretary tells us should regulate the Staff, has not demanded it—nor has the public service demanded it. It is evident that Congress became infatuated on the subject of our Staff in 1838 and yielded to the importunities of an Army of office seekers, whereby they destroyed the efficiency of the service and increased its expenditures so enormously, that the cry of extravagance has been raised throughout the country, and efforts are now being made to shift the responsibility from our unwieldy and unnecessarily expensive Staff, where it is and must rest, to the shoulders of the weak and oppressed line which has no friends at court, and no means of counteracting the influence brought to bear upon the minds of our legislators.

The Quarter Master's Department is but one of the six Staff corps which received an impetus in 1838, which must and will lead to its downfall, or entire reorganization. Let us examine the additional expense to which this increase subjected the country in 1838. Previous to the acts of the 5th and 7th of July of that year, the department was organized as follows :

1 Brigadier General, pay and allowances	$3,600
4 Majors " " " "	8,900
(Temporary appointments) 20 Asst. Qr. Masters, in addition to line pay	7,200
2 Store keepers, pay and allowances	1,920
Total for pay, &c. of officers	$21,520

In 1844, the organization as allowed by existing laws is :

1 Brigadier General, pay and allowances	$3,600
2 Colonels " " " "	5,860
2 Lieutenant Colonels " " " "	4,900
4 Majors " " " "	8,900
28 Captains " " " "	47,500
2 Store keepers " " " "	2,500
20 Forage Masters " " " "	15,480
Additional rations for length of service by law of 1838	7,760
Total for pay, &c. of officers	$96,400 !!!

Behold the result ! An increase from twenty-one thousand five hundred dollars to ninety-six thousand four hundred dollars, and in the item of pay alone. Could I but form an estimate of the additional expense on account of office and clerk hire, office furniture, fuel for offices, transportation of these officers from point to point—for you find some of them continually travelling, and never without orders—the above sum would be increased beyond one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And where is the benefit resulting from it ! I can suggest but one. The department in Washington has less trouble in settling their accounts, and for two reasons. In the most of our Staff Departments it is believed that the "crown can do no wrong," and an account rendered by an officer holding an appointment in the department is readily passed, which would require reams of paper to explain if rendered by a young subaltern disconnected with these "scientific corps," as they are modestly called by one of their own number in some recent publication. Again, if an officer of this department meets with the slightest difficulty in settling an account, he is forthwith ordered to Washington for the purpose of attending to it in person, and the government pays his expenses. Examine the register of arrivals in the Adjutant General's office for proof of this assertion. Our Army has about one half as many Staff officers as it has officers of the line, and not more than one third as many of the latter will be found visiting Washington, or any other attractive city, as there will be of the former. No small item in the expenditures of this department is thus made out.

That the duties of the department are as satisfactorily and economically done at the different military posts by these officers of high rank and pay as it has been, and can be, by subalterns of these posts, I utterly deny and call on commanding officers of posts to sustain me. Such has been my experience, and I have heard the opinion so often repeated, that I believe it to be universal.

Some good and practical reasons existed at the time of this increase for a slight addition to the department, and for a more perfect organization, but at no time has the service required the unwieldy department which was created. The two principal reasons for this increase no longer exist. The Army has been again reduced to what it was before 1838, and the Florida war has died a natural death : let its offspring, an abortion, follow.

It would seem natural, too, that the officers of the line should be excused from performing these duties after the creation by Congress of so large a corps for the express purpose ; yet such is not the case—as many line officers now perform duties in this department as before the increase in 1838. We will find in our large cities and at some of our largest and most agreeable military posts an officer of this department, but in most instances you will find but little or nothing to do, or if there should be occupation, a subaltern of the line will be found encumbered with the disagreeable duties, and the Quarter Master living at his ease and only attending to what agents and commission merchants would willingly do for the custom without compensation. One half of our Army, or seven of the fourteen Regiments are stationed west of the Mississippi, but we find only ten out of thirty-two officers in the Quarter Master's Department on duty with that portion. There are but few very agreeable posts West of the Mississippi, however, and Lieutenants of the line can do the duty there ; but in our large cities, on the seaboard, a Captain of cavalry at least is deemed necessary. The presence of officers of the Quarter Master's Department is more necessary in the West, too, where all works are put up by that department, as well for defence as for accommodation, whereas on our seaboard both are done by the engineers. But these are by no means the most serious evils attending the present organization of that department. Twenty of the twenty-seven Captains now in that department are taken from the heads of their companies which are left in the hands of Lieutenants, many of them young and inexperienced, and but few possessing rank and age enough to make competent company commanders. This system will break down any Army in the world, and especially our Army, where there is no stability in its Lieutenants. A company whose Captain is thus transferred to a Staff corps often changes commanders several times in a year, and owing to the necessary details for detached services from the subalterns, I have often known companies in Florida without a commissioned officer for months and even years. The place for a Captain is properly at the head of his company, and no one of proper military pride will ever consent to leave that place; but the policy of our government has been such as to destroy that high military tone, without which an Army is worthless, by offering high pay and pleasant stations to officers for abandoning their appropriate duties and assuming those which foreign services seem to consider as beneath officers of scientific education and high standing, and as appropriate rewards for old and faithful non-commissioned officers.

Upon this point I cannot more fully express my views than by an extract from the published opinions of a field officer in the British service.

"The Quarter Master is one of the earliest appointments in all standing armies; his name implies his duties—the distribution of quarters in barracks and cantonments, with the charge of all regimental camp equipage and baggage; but his functions and avocations are, besides these, numerous and various. He is the acknowledged chief of that little dirty-looking band that leads the van of every infantry regiment and looks like its grave-diggers; but the Quarter Master is too modest to place himself at its head. He is also the dictator of the regimental tailors and armorers, and the Rhadamanthus of the washerwomen. He is on good terms with the Barrack Masters, hand and glove with the corn and coal merchants of the town, and is looked up to as a great man by the contract butcher and baker. He has a perfect knowledge of every thing that goes to making up a soldier—arms, ammunition, clothing and accoutrements; intimate acquaintance with the value of all the miscellaneous articles, packs, straps, buckles, shirts, shoes, &c., even down to a soldier's millinery; his cap, plate and tuft; his combs, his razors, his brushes, pipe-clay and blacking. At those solemn meetings called Clothing Boards, consisting generally of the three oldest Captains, the Quarter

Master is present as a sort of hook-and-eye judge advocate. I recollect one of these occasions, when some alteration was expected in the form of the clothing, the commanding officer was present at the unpacking. When the drummers' jackets were produced, the commanding officer put the question to his Quarter Master, "what do you think of these, McB——?" "They are certainly very handsome," was the reply; "but, Colonel, don't you think there is a great deal too much tautology about the lace?" The word certainly would have applied with more force to drumsticks than to lace; but it was not a bad Quarter Masterish phrase, to express his contempt for that superabundance of frippery and gingerbread on the jackets of the drummers of the British Infantry, which make them look more like merry-andrews to a quack doctor, than heralds authorized to rouse gentlemen's sons out of their beds before day-light. On active service, the duties and responsibilities of the Quarter Master are much increased; he is here allowed money to purchase a horse, and forage for his keep—an article indispensable to the journeys he is obliged to make. He requires to possess diligence and activity, as well as a fair knowledge of the country and its roads, and to keep a sharp look out that his supplies are in no danger from marauding parties of the enemy. He has occasionally to add the duties of commissary to his own; to provide the food, as well as to serve it out, which doubles his labor and anxiety.

"In recompense for these, as well in regard to the trust committed to his charge, the pay of Quarter Master has been gradually raised to its present rate 6s. 6d. per diem; after ten years on full pay, to 8s. 6d.; and fifteen years, to 10s. It is the best possible gift to a deserving non-commissioned officer, (generally the Quarter Master Sergeant,) more particularly if he is married and not obliged to live at the mess. In all the range of barracks, no room is found so snug and cozy as that of the Quarter Master; and no man in or out of the Army sits down to a more comfortable and plentiful Christmas dinner."

A comparison with our service at a glance exhibits the ascendancy which Staff influence has gained over our legislation. Offices, which in the British service are considered as proper rewards for non-commissioned officers, are eagerly sought by our Captains, and he who obtains one is considered a lucky if not a favored man. The reason is very plain. In the British service there is no rank attached to the appointment, and the pay is only commensurate with the duties performed and the standing and respectability of the office. At no time is the pay of a Quarter Master increased beyond seventy-five dollars per month, and it is only fifty dollars to those first entering the service. In our service an officer is selected, generally some favorite, for promotion. The appointment of Assistant Quarter Master confers on him the rank of a Captain in the Army with the pay and allowances of a cavalry officer of the same grade, at no time less than one hundred and fifteen dollars per month, and by the addition of a ration every five years, it increases in the same ratio as in the British service. The duties of a Quarter Master in our service are the same as those in the British, and I am unable to discover a reason for giving additional rank and pay to commissioned officers in our service—men of scientific education—for performing duties which more appropriately belong to the capacity and grade of non-commissioned officers, and which are performed by men of that standing and capacity in the British service. In that service, too, we see that a Quarter Master is supplied with a horse and forage for him when on “active service.” In our Army the lowest grade in the Quarter Master's Department, a Captain, is allowed forage for three horses when in garrison, where his duties do not even afford exercise.

I deem it utterly unnecessary to offer further reasons in support of my opinions against the present organization of our Quarter Master's Department, and must delay for a future number a few remarks on the unequal, unjust and unprecedented anomaly of allowing officers to hold two commissions at the same time, with the privilege of exercising the rank and authority conferred by either at their discretion, and to receive promotion in two different corps. This system is particularly unjust to those officers who hold but one commission and who consider that military duty is more honorable than that which renders it necessary for them to be “hand-and-glove with the corn and coal merchants of the town,” and to act as “hook-and-eye judge advocates to Clothing Boards.” And the esprit du corps of any Army must be destroyed by a system which throws grey haired veterans of twenty years' hard service upon boards and courts martial as the juniors of men who but yesterday looked up to them for counsel, advice and instruction, and who have thus early overreached them by no other merit than ability to write up neat and legible accounts, purchase hay, corn, oats, lumber, &c., with facility, and, above all others, the possession of influential friends at court.

To remedy these abuses will require a very simple act of Congress. Repeal the law of 1838, so far as it relates to the Quarter Master's Department, and reestablish it upon an entirely different plan. Give us the same able and distinguished Quarter Master General who now presides over the department, with five or, at most, six Quarter Masters without military rank, and with a salary of one thousand five hundred dollars a year each; one of them to superintend the clothing bureau in Philadelphia, the others to perform the duties now done by the Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels and Majors of the department. In addition to these, give us one regimental Quarter Master to each regiment with the pay of one thousand dollars a year, without military rank, and to be stationed at the post occupied by the greatest part of his regiment. At other posts have the duties performed as they now are by the Lieutenants and Assistant Commissaries. The department, thus organized, would be more efficient than the present and will cost the country one hundred thousand dollars a year less. When on active service in the field, allow these officers the use of a public horse and forage to keep him, and in barracks place them on a footing with Pay Masters and Medical officers in regard to rank; allow the Quarter Masters to assimilate with Majors, and the Regimental Quarter Masters with Captains.

The Quarter Master General is fully aware of the necessity for a change in his department, and recommends one which would be far preferable to the present organization, though it would be more costly, and I think less efficient than the one I propose. The strongest proof that he considers his department too large, and that there is too much rank in it, is to be found in the fact, that vacancies are permitted to remain unfilled when applicants can be found by the hundred anxious to accept. Confide the administration of his department to hands less considerate of the public good and more anxious to reap the benefits from patronage, and the expenses will again rise beyond the reduction of thirty thousand dollars which he tells you has been effected.

The Quarter Master General in his last annual report, says; “the great object of supporting a peace establishment is to prepare for war. One of the most efficient means of preparation is an able and well-instructed Staff, at all times ready for action. When the establishment is small, and raw troops have in consequence to be employed on every emergency, it is important that as many officers as possible be qualified for Staff duties. With that object in view I respectfully suggest such a modification of existing laws as shall require all Staff officers holding regimental appointments to be returned periodically to their regiments, and their places in the Staff to be supplied by others. Were such a measure authorized the Captains and subalterns of the whole Army would, in a few years, receive competent instruction in all that relates to the Staff, and acquire habits of business which would render them doubly efficient and valuable to the country in time of war.”

I agree with the distinguished General at the head of that department as to the “object of a peace establishment,” and I also believe with him, that “one of the most efficient means of preparation is an able and well-instructed Staff, at all times ready for action.” Supposing that he refers to his own department in these remarks, I must take issue with him on the propriety of forming this Staff by detailing officers from the line. There can be no object in instructing these line officers in Staff duties, preparatory to war, unless it is intended to put them in Staff Departments when that crisis arrives. If such be his intention, I will answer his argument by a simple question. If the officers are taken from the line to form Staff corps in time of war, where will he find others to supply their places in the line? It has been considered in all services before ours that the Staff was merely an appendage to the line, an evil it is true, but a necessary one to enable the line, the Army, to operate with facility and celerity. But now, and for the first time since the first organization of armies, we hear it gravely asserted, that the line of the Army in a peace establishment is to be kept up to educate Staff officers, and those, too, who are appointed, in foreign services, from the deserving soldiers. The fact is, that our Army has so long remained under Staff control, that it has become a settled principle that the line is only an appendage to the Staff, a sort of preparatory school for Staff officers. Whenever a vacancy occurs, and is to be filled, the chief of the department selects from the line, and his choice is confirmed:—thus

The line "is a bundle of hay,"
Staff men "are the asses who pull,
 Each tugs in a different way,"
 &c. &c. &c. &c.

The education of our young officers is not calculated to make them Quarter Masters and Commissaries, nor was the Military Academy ever intended to educate such men; it gives a military and scientific education, to fit young men for military duty in the Army, and not for corn, coal, or pork merchants. Men competent and willing to fill these offices can be found in every grocery-store and counting-house in the country, without subjecting the government to the expense of educating them. A parallel is not to be found in any profession in life. Look to the Navy. Do we ever find a commissioned officer in that service detailed to perform the duties of Purser in order to accomplish him in Staff duties? The duties of Purser are very similar to those of Quarter Master including those of Pay Master in the Army.

The object to be obtained by the periodical changes proposed by the Quarter Master General will be secured by the plan which I propose, and without the additional expense of converting these Lieutenants into "Captains of cavalry" during their temporary service in that department—and I cannot believe the duties of a Quarter Master will be any sooner learned by clothing the officer with additional rank and giving him greatly increased pay; the former of which may render him vain and presumptuous, and the latter will most undoubtedly lead him into habits of extravagance,—neither of which will improve him as a man, or render him "doubly efficient and valuable" as an officer. Let these young officers remain with their companies and superintend these duties when required in addition to their military duty, and they will be as competently instructed in all that relates to the Staff, and have "acquired habits of business" which would render them not exactly "doubly efficient and valuable," but competent to perform duty in Staff Departments when required; the Army will not have lost their military services during their Staff educations—they will not be unsuited for military duty, as Staff officers generally are—and the country will not be subjected to the expense of one hundred thousand dollars a year for effecting what can be better done without cost.

The line will protest against the suggestion of the Quarter Master General being adopted so as to require them to perform duty in his department periodically and to be relieved from military duty for that time. A large majority of the officers of the line will never consent to perform duties so totally at variance with their education and habits, though they will not object to superintend those duties in addition to their appropriate professional ones. They enter the Army as military men, and not to become coal and pork merchants, or muster carpenters; nor will they ever consent to any law or regulation converting them into drivers of mules, or slayers of bullocks. On one other ground will this be strongly opposed. Past experience has convinced the majority of our line officers, that those who have been removed from military associations and educated in the Staff, are forever afterwards fit for nothing else; and when returned to their proper positions, (fortunately for the line they seldom are,) they are only fit to play the fawning sycophant to some weak and superannuated commander, as they seldom fail to become proficient in the subtle art of pleasing in high places, and generally know the proper proportion of modest assurance necessary to secure desired ends. It is a common remark in our service, that "Captain — and Lieutenants — and — are very inefficient company officers, but nothing more can be expected of them as they are Staff men." Shall we all be reduced to this unenviable condition?

A SUBALTERN.

A SONNET.—MY LADY'S ABSENCE.

Oh "weary, stale and flat," as is a bore
 Who of himself, sweet youth! and nothing more,
 Can prate until our very ears are sore;—

Sad as the autumn, when there blooms no tree;—
 Dreary as earth without its flowers and streams,
 As youth without its hope-created dreams,
 As night deprived of all the starry beams,—

Such in thine absence, love! my home must be;
 And such it is! Oh! what a desolate time

Since last, my Lady bright, I gazed on thee!
Dull as the lapse of day in sultry clime,
Dull as a suckling bardie's self-read rhyme,
Or long drawn whining of a sacred chime,—
So sadly, slowly, hath time gone with me!

GOSSIP ABOUT A FEW BOOKS.

MR. MESSENGER :

Who can have written the little book called "CONQUEST AND SELF-CONQUEST?"* I met with it lately in a Richmond bookstore; and read it with a delight that no book of its class has inspired me with, since Sandford and Merton, The Parents' Assistant, Popular Tales, and the best of Miss Sedgwick's juvenile narratives. Amid the numberless and worthless tomes of trash that have in recent times superseded those glories of English Literature just named, it is meat and drink to one who relishes an exquisite blending of the sweet with the useful, to find such a treat as this "Conquest and Self-Conquest." It is a story of an American boy, who, after an early education at home, under the eye of a judiciously fond mother, went, at 11 years of age, to a grammar-school: fought, was beaten,—grew stronger in body and principles,—won the heart of his adversary,—entered the Navy,—and there in a career of virtue and honor, proved how unnecessary vice or ferocity is, to a high place among the sons of maritime glory. Except Miss Edgworth and the author of Sandford and Merton, I do not know a writer who has so happily portrayed true heroism. I pray you, tell me who she is! A woman, certainly; as well from the delicacy of some turns and touches, impracticable to a man, as from one or two slight incoherences, which his more mathematical nature would have avoided. Thus, in September or October, 1811, a certain adventure occurs (p. 61): eighteen months afterwards, is another incident: and then (p. 105) the succeeding March is in 1812, not long before our last war!—At least one other inaccuracy might be found, by a person who chooses to hunt out a bit of chaff in a bushel of wheat. Whoever does it will surely deserve, like him of old, to be rewarded with the chaff for his pains. The book seems in the main, above the powers of my favorite, Miss Sedgwick: yet it contains a vulgarism to which I grieve to say she is addicted—the transitive verb to leave, used without expressing its object: thus, (p. 93) "readiness to leave whenever," &c. Fie, fie, Mrs. Nameless!

Does it not excite your ire, Mr. Messenger, to see the glorious works I have mentioned, shoved aside or overlaid by the trash I alluded to! It excites mine. How wroth it makes me, to enter a bookstore, and on asking for Sandford and Merton, the Parents' Assistant, Popular Tales, or any other of the inimitable Miss Edgworth's productions, or those of Miss Sedgwick, or Evenings at Home, or Sargeant's Temperance Tales,—to be told they are not there, and to have Peter Parley, or Mary Howitt, or Sir Lytton Bulwer, or a dozen besides, too new and poor to be named, pushed in my face!

* Conquest and Self-Conquest; or, Which makes the Hero? pp. 216, 12 mo.

I always long to serve such a bookseller as Alcibiades is reported by Plutarch once to have served a schoolmaster in Athens: "You remember Alcibiades—young, handsome, rich and spoiled, so that he could take strange liberties with every body. He entered a school one day, and asked the teacher for Homer's works. "I have them not," said the pedagogue. "Have n't got Homer?" replied Alcibiades: "then take that!"—and gave him a rousing box o' the ear, before all his scholars. I am very much inclined to treat parents in the same way, who confess that they are without the same books.

Considering the incredible multitude of books, and other kinds of reading, that are hourly crowding into the world, the great aim of all except first rate geniuses should be, methinks, to direct the public mind continually to the acknowledged standards of excellence, and divert public favor from inferior works. The classics of our language should live perpetually in the critic's page; and his stiletto* should be busy in exterminating the insect swarms, which every day brings forth, and which a day, thank Heaven! for the most part consigns to oblivion—and so saves him the trouble. And if our periodicals would copy ten times what they do from the great Masters, and exclude nine-tenths of the so-called "original" matter they publish,—at least one reader would be very much obliged to them.

Dickens. His new assault upon our country, in the January number of the Foreign Quarterly Review,† is the most venomously spiteful that he has made. Yet it has a pungency that tickles,—a frequent happiness of expression that strikes and pleases,—amid all the injustice, and the still greater malignity in which it abounds. Nor is it always unjust. Though, upon the subject of slavery, and its incidents, Mr. Dickens exaggerates and falsifies more than Mrs. Trollope, or any travelling book-wright since, and approaches the brutal injustice of Parkinson, Fidler, and the other early tourists who slandered us,—yet, to much that he says on other topics, our plea ought to be "guilty." Boastfulness about our country,—excessive thirst for money,—a consequent neglect of many useful things which tend not only to comfort, but to virtue, and even to Freedom—lawless violence, under the decrees of that vile usurper, Judge Lynch—and perhaps above all, the foulness of our newspaper press,—are sins for which Mr. Dickens does not give us one lash amiss. Truth never outwent fiction farther, than two village newspapers in Tennessee outgo Boz's Eatonswill Gazette and Eatonswill Independent, in violence and scurrility. And the daily observation of us all,—even daily remarks now current among us,—show that our Newspaper Press generally is, and that we feel it to be, worse than Dickens' worst representations of it. It was with difficulty, three days ago, that I could get a gentleman of very high standing for intelligence and honor, (no dyspeptic, either, nor otherwise morbidly inclined,) to except the National Intelligencer, the New York Evening Post, the Boston Courier, and one or two others, from the general censure for unfairness, vulgarity and bitterness. We have not taken the criticisms of foreigners (including Boz) upon our manners and country, as we ought to have done. We have been too thinned—too resentful. The uses of censure, like those of Adversity, are sweet, if rightly taken. "Though like a toad, ugly and venomous," it "wears yet a precious jewel in its head," to such as know how to find that jewel. If, instead of bristling up at those ill-natured criticisms, we had carefully examined ourselves to see how far they were just, and to mend our ways accordingly, it would have been wiser. Pictures that others draw of us, are in fact the very fulfilment of Burns' prayer which is in every body's mouth:—

"O would some Power the giftie gie us,
To see ourself as others see us!
It would frae many a blunder free us,
And foolish notion."

By flying into a passion at such pictures, we become unable to see what truth they contain; and lose all the benefit of having the poet's prayer granted. By-the-by, if our foreign monitors wish us to profit by their schoolings, they ought to infuse more kindness into them. Advice, to man, woman or child, is sure to be rendered powerless by spite or arrogance in the giver!—Suppose Mr. Dickens in his Notes for General Circulation, and in his late Review, had substituted kindness, and that good-humored banter in which he excels, for the snarling tone in which he utters his well deserved blame of our filthy spitting habit—of our fast eating—and our other peccadilloes?—why, he would have done more for our amendment than all our own lecturers and satirists combined; and at the same time have doubled his popularity in America, instead of annihilating it.

I do not see what we gain, or that we at all refute the foreign calumniators, by shewing their own countries to be worse than ours. It would poorly mitigate the evil to Virginia, of having 60,000 white people above 20 years of age, who cannot read or write,—to know that England has two millions. It is wiser to compare her with the 4,500 of Massachusetts, or the 44,000 of New York, or the 33,000 of Pennsylvania: the first having as many, the second thrice, and the third twice as many white inhabitants as Virginia has. A word more of Mr. Dickens' Article. I am glad of his severity (if it were less ill-natured) towards the poetasters, whom I have long ranked among the country's nuisances. Who can dissent from the justice of his animadversions upon the Epic yclept "Washington,"—the common-place tameness of Pierpont,—the "feeble verbosity" of "the American Hemans,"—and the utter inanity of ninety-nine hundredths of those newspaper and magazine rhymesters,—clerks, foredoomed their father's souls to cross, and penning stanzas when they should engross! Rhymesters, to whom Oblivion has a fair, indefeasible claim; and of whom Mr. Griswold vainly endeavors to defraud her, in his late collection of their indiscretions.*—But towards Hail Columbia and the Star-Spangled Banner,—towards Drake's American Flag, and Trumbull's McFingal, Mr. Dickens has not been just, as any jury of sensible Englishmen could easily be satisfied by an examination of them. To six American Poets, he has dealt out a measure of praise with which even themselves would probably be satisfied: Alfred B. Street, Mrs. Brooks of Louisville ("Maria Del Occidente"), Ralph Waldo Emerson, Halleck, Bryant, and Longfellow. "Halleck," he says, "is the author of a noble lyric, 'Marco Bozzaris.' Had he written nothing more, he must have earned a high popularity; but he has written much more, equally distinguished by a refined taste and cultivated judgment."—"We are too much pressed for space to afford room for the whole of this poem, and are unwilling to injure its effect by an isolated passage. The chrysolite must not be broken."—I wish his praises even of the three whom he most admires, had not been alloyed by some qualifications that savor of the ill-nature and illiberality that pervade nearly the whole "Article."

Mr. Dickens ends with a paragraph powerfully true. Though I fear its effect in America will be marred by its coming from him, and by its repulsive context, yet quote it I must, for the sake of its truth. How impressively it reinforces the (entirely too long) essays of Mr. Simms, in your January and March numbers!

"We repeat," says Mr. Dickens in the Foreign Quarterly, "that it is matter of regret, and not of censure, that America should be destitute of a national literature. The circumstances through which she has hitherto struggled, and to which she continues to be exposed, are fatal to its cultivation. With the literature of England pouring in upon her, relieved of the charges of copyright and taxation, it is impossible there can be any effectual encouragement for native talent. Literature is, consequently, the least tempting of all conceivable pursuits; and men must float with the stream, and live as they can with the society in which they have been educated. Even were the moral materials by which this vast deposit of human dregs is supplied, other than they are—purer, wiser and more refined,—still America could not originate or support a literature of her own, so long as English productions can be imported free of cost, and circulated through the Union at a cheaper rate than the best productions of the country. The remedy for this is obvious, and its necessity has long been felt on both sides of the water,—a law for the protection of International Copyright. Such a law would be valuable to us, simply in a commercial point of view—but to America its advantages would be of incalculably greater importance. It would lay the foundation of a comprehensive intellectual movement which never can be accomplished without its help; and by which alone, she can ever hope to consolidate and dignify her institutions. We trust the day is not far distant when the unanimous demand of the enlightened of both countries will achieve a consummation so devoutly to be wished for."

Good bye, Mr. Messenger.

TO THE HON. T. W. GILMER, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The following letter was drawn up by the advice of the Hon. Thomas W. Gilmer, late Secretary of the Navy. It was commenced on the day after the fatal accident which occurred on board the Steamer, "Princeton;" and was not entirely finished, when the sad news of his death reached me. In him I have not only lost a valued friend whom I have known from my boyhood, but the country has been deprived of an able and faithful public servant.

I at first laid aside my pen without any intention of resuming it; but have since been induced to finish the letter for publication in the Southern Literary Messenger, in which have appeared so many interesting papers on the subject of the Navy.

Randolph Macon College, Feb. 29, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR,—When I last enjoyed the pleasure of a personal interview with you, I promised that I would commit to writing and transmit to you, a few suggestions in respect to the proper organization of the Marine Observatory now in erection at the seat of Government. Your recent appointment to the Secretaryship of the Navy, upon which you will allow me to congratulate both you and the country, reminds me of that engagement and of the propriety of fulfilling it at this time.

The organization of the Observatory must be determined in a great measure by the objects which are intended to be accomplished by its establishment. It will, therefore, be proper to direct your attention to some of the most obvious and important of these.

The first which I shall notice is the rating of Naval Chronometers.

This is a service of great importance to both

Navigation and Geography, and ought to be executed with all the refinements of modern science. The method of finding the Longitude at sea, by Lunar Distances, first noticed by Werner and applied by Frisius, and afterwards perfected by Halley, Lacaille, Maskelyne and others, has been usually relied upon for the determination of a ship's place. Many attempts have been made to simplify and shorten the calculations which it exacts, but they are still somewhat tedious in practice. The length of this method would form no serious objection to its employment, if its results, when arrived at, were always sufficiently accurate. Their inaccuracy arises, indeed, from no defect in the theory of the process employed, but from the difficulty experienced in making, with sufficient precision, upon the unstable deck of a ship, the observations upon which its application is founded, as well also as from the errors in the Lunar Tables. An error of 30 seconds, in the measurement of the apparent angular distance of the moon from a fixed star, will produce an error of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a degree in the longitude; and this error will not unfrequently be increased a fourth of its whole amount by the errors as yet existing in the best Lunar Tables. Under the equinoctial line, this error in a ship's place would be about 20 miles. To arrive at a tolerably correct result, the errors of observation must be eliminated as far as possible, by taking in immediate succession several distances between the moon and stars, both to the East and West of her; and by using the time as deduced from the altitude of the sun, taken in the afternoon of the preceding day. This last precaution is necessary because the horizon is not sufficiently well defined at night to measure with precision the altitude of a star. But the time as deduced from an observation made several hours before, will be affected by the change in the ship's place during this interval, and consequently cannot be determined with any very great degree of accuracy. When, however, attention has been paid to every circumstance which can affect the accuracy of the final result, and when the instruments employed are of the best construction, this method, it must be granted, is competent to determine with sufficient approximation the longitude of a ship at sea. It is nevertheless very desirable that a method, which is so laborious in practice, which is so uncertain in its results, unless applied with the utmost care and skill, and which is of no account at such times as the heavens are overcast, should be replaced by one easier of application and at all times available. This end is likely to be attained by the use of the Chronometer constructed with all the modern refinements in the art of Horology. This instrument is now made to maintain a steadiness of rate which is truly remarkable, when we consider the various causes which have a tendency to affect its motion. The manner in which it accomplishes all the purposes of navigation, may be indicated in very few words. If a Chronometer could be constructed so perfectly as to indicate, with precision, the mean solar time under the meridian to which we refer the longitudes of places, suppose under that of Greenwich, the determination of the longitude of a ship at sea would be as easy and as accurate as we could desire.

It would be only necessary to find the mean solar time at the ship, and to compare it with that at the primitive meridian as indicated by the Chronometer, and the difference of these times would be the longitude of the ship, East or West, according as its time preceded, or succeeded that of the primitive meridian. It is indeed impossible, in the present state of the arts, to give to the Chronometer this supposed degree of perfection; but it may be constructed to run so nearly uniform, that in the interval of six, or seven weeks, longitudes determined thereby will be as accurate as those determined by lunar distances, and for shorter intervals of time even more so. In confirmation of this last statement I refer you to the Chronometrical determination of the longitude of New-York by Mr. Dent of London. The longitude of New-York, as given by Mr. Walker, is 4*h*. 56*m*. 04.6*s*. West of Greenwich. This result was obtained, as well as I remember, from several solar eclipses. That obtained by Mr. Dent from the indication of three Chronometers transported on board the "British Queen" is 4*h*. 56*m*. 3.35*s*., which differs by only a second from the former one.

To render, however, even the best Chronometer subservient to the purpose of finding longitudes it must be rated with great care. There are several considerations, which should induce us to regard this process as not so simple and easy as to be performed with sufficient accuracy by the use of the sextant and artificial horizon, as was generally practised before the establishment of the Marine Observatory. In rating a Chronometer, three things are to be determined; first, its absolute error, at a given moment, upon the mean solar time of the assumed meridian; Secondly, its daily rate at that moment; Thirdly, the law by which that rate is altered from day to day. But it is not sufficient to determine these three particulars, without special reference to the circumstances under which the Chronometer has to perform.

It was very satisfactorily ascertained in the voyage made by Capt. Buchan to the Arctic regions in 1818, that the rates of Chronometers are considerably different on board and on shore.

This conclusion has been subsequently confirmed by a Series of Observations instituted by Mr. Barlow, with a view to determine the cause of this difference and the laws by which its action is governed. (See "Phil. Transactions" for 1820.)

That the difference of rate really exists and is quite too great to be neglected, will be made evident by the following results of some experiments by Lieut. Wm. Mudge and published in the "Edinburgh Phi. Journal" for Oct., 1821.

On board H. M. S. Leven	No. 1970 Arnold.	No. 498 Arnold.	No. 249 Harris.	No. 503 Arnold.

Differences between sea and shore rates	2.78	3.22	3.77	5.33

That these differences are not attributable to the imperfection of the Chronometers themselves is plain from an examination of their rates either on land or sea. Let us take for example No. 1970.

" July 28 to August 6 - - -	14.40
" August 6 to August 24 - - -	13.85

It is very obvious that the shore rates of these four Chronometers would have been totally inadequate to determine with precision the ship's place at sea. And I have no doubt, that the seeming inaccuracies in the indications of Chronometers at sea, which perform well on shore, result from the employment of their shore instead of their sea rates, which may differ from each other, as in the case of No. 503 Arnold, by 5 or 6 seconds per day. It is, then, a question of much importance to Navigation, how may the sea rate of a Chronometer be accurately determined? It is not possible, in our present state of ignorance in respect to the action of the metal of a ship upon the motion of a Chronometer, to give to this question a satisfactory answer. We do not yet fully understand the mode in which this influence acts, much less the laws by which it is governed. Whether the metal of a ship becomes magnetized by the directive power of the earth, and influences the balance of the Chronometer as a magnet would do; or, whether a degree of magnetism is inherent in the balance itself and is influenced by the metal of a ship as by a small mass of soft iron brought very near to it, are points not certainly ascertained. It is most probable that both modes of action obtain, if not others yet undiscovered. We must, therefore, depend rather upon actual experiment for correcting the disturbing influence of the metal upon the rate of a Chronometer, than upon deductions merely theoretical. It is true that there have been proposed methods for counteracting this influence, or eliminating the errors which it produces, founded more or less upon hypothesis in respect to the source and nature of its action. Captain Scoresby, for instance, considering the cause of disturbance to arise from the directive influence of the earth upon the balance itself, proposes to neutralize its effect by bringing the balance within the control of an artificial magnet sufficiently powerful to keep the whole Chronometer, freely suspended upon gimbals, in the same relative position to the magnetic meridian. To say nothing of the uncertainty of the theoretical view involved in this proposed method of correction, which attributes to terrestrial magnetism a direct action upon the balance, so much more energetic than any which can be exerted by the metal of a ship, as to render the latter altogether insensible, it is very questionable whether the presence of a powerful magnet will not introduce new sources of disturbance. Mr. Barlow, who has paid a great deal of attention to this subject, thinks that there is danger in this case, of the magnet itself affecting the rate of the Chronometer, not merely by its own action, but by communicating some portion of fixed magnetism to the balance, more than it ordinarily possessed.

Mr. Barlow takes this view of the subject. He is of the opinion that the power of iron to disturb the action of a Chronometer resides in its surface; and he proposes to assign the position of an iron plate in respect to the Chronometer, which will produce upon it the same disturbance which will be produced by the iron of the ship. If, then, the Chronometer be rated on shore in the presence and under the influence of such a plate, it is obvious that the rate so obtained is not the shore but the sea rate. In every case the position of the plate must be determined experimentally, and will be different for different ships.

I regard it very important to test the correctness of Mr. Barlow's views. This, it seems to me, may be done in the following manner: Let a signal be displayed at the Observatory at the instant of mean noon from day to day, and within sight of a vessel having all its metal on board and its Chronometer placed as it is intended to be kept when on a voyage. The Chronometer may be rated by a daily comparison between its mean noon and that indicated at the Observatory, allowing for the difference of longitude between the vessel and the Observatory, which will perhaps be very small, but yet ought not to be overlooked in researches of such delicacy. The vessel also, after the interval of a few days, may be swung around so as to head in a different direction towards the points of the compass, and there confined, until the rate in that position has been noted; and so on, until the balance of the Chronometer shall have occupied all possible positions in respect to the magnetic meridian. In this way it may be known whether the influence upon the balance varies with the direction of the ship's head, as Capt. Scoresby thinks is the case. Let, then, the Chronometer be brought on shore and carefully rated in the usual way. It will then be seen whether the sea and shore rates are different, and by how much. If there be a difference, then let it be attempted so to place an iron plate in respect to the Chronometer on shore, as to reduce its shore to its previously ascertained sea rate. This mode of experimenting would indeed be defective in some respects. For instance, when a vessel is sailing upon the high seas, its metal would be brought under the action of a perpetually varying force of magnetism; yet, in respect to the nature and amount of influence which a given magnetic force will exert upon the balance of a Chronometer, very valuable results might be deduced.

Whatever forces may be exerted upon the arm of the balance by the metal of a ship, their resultant will probably lie in the direction of the keel, because in respect to a line running lengthwise the vessel, the metal is symmetrically placed. If the arm of the balance when at rest be placed at right angles with the keel, it is probable that much of the disturbing influence may be neutralized. Mr. Dent in his Chronometrical determination of the difference of longitude between Greenwich and New-York, before referred to, and which you will find in the reports of the "British Association for the advancement of Science," for 1839, seems to have used this precaution, and to this possibly may be attributed the small difference between the sea and shore rates of the Chronometers which he employed. Yet there was a difference very sensible, and which could not by any means have been neglected in deducing the final result. The existence of a difference at all shows that this mode of correction, though very easy of application, is imperfect. Still it is a precaution which ought to be observed on every vessel.

After a Chronometer has been rated with reference to the influence of every cause which can affect its motion, if it be a good instrument, it will give for six or eight weeks the longitude of the ship with as much accuracy as "Lunar Distances," and with greatly diminished labor. But occasionally a Chronometer may exhibit sudden and inexplicable changes in its rate, against which it will be important to guard. This may be done by having several on board, which is invariably the practice in the British Navy, and probably in our own. On this point, however, I have no precise information. The best Chronometers may now be purchased for $200 to $250; so that the additional expense of furnishing each vessel with at least three, would be but small, while the advantages would be very great. Were there but two, a discrepancy between them would be evidence of an error existing in one or the other; but with three, the one in fault could be detected. Further to guard against any influence which may simultaneously affect the rates of all the Chronometers on board, it would be desirable once in two or three weeks to make a careful observation of the longitude by Lunar Distances; not that the result would be more trust-worthy than that of the Chronometers, but their near approximation would be evidence that the Chronometers had suffered no injury and were performing well.

Whenever a vessel arrives at a port whose longitude has been accurately determined by Solar eclipses, or by occultations of the fixed stars by the moon, then it may be certainly known how the Chronometers have performed; and by a careful comparison of their results with the known position of the port, the variation in their rates ascertained. It is, however, always well to make shore observations, when the vessel is sufficiently long in port, to determine the existing rates of the Chronometers. And for this purpose it is desirable that every ship should be furnished with a good portable transit instrument, which in a single night could be adjusted, so as to give results more accurate than those of the sextant and artificial horizon, and involving much less of calculation. Besides, if the longitude of the port should not be well ascertained, the transit instrument would be very useful in determining it, by observing the passages, across the meridian, of the moon's bright limb, and of stars which are near her parallel of declination. Such port would serve afterwards as a new point of departure from which to calculate the place of the ship. I must not forget to add, that in rating a Chronometer while in port, it will be best to suffer it to remain in its proper place on board, and to carry the time to and from it, by means of a good pocket Chronometer. It will thus be kept under the influence of the ship's metal, which is always important.

In pointing out to you the important uses of the Chronometer at sea, and the delicacy and difficulty of the process of rating one with perfect precision, the necessity of a Marine Observatory will appear obvious, where this service may be performed with attention to every circumstance which is likely to ensure success.

I proceed to notice another object, which I understand was had in view, in the erection of the Observatory—namely, the construction of Charts.

It would be to little purpose to know with precision the place of a ship, unless the ports to be reached, and the impediments to navigation to be avoided are correctly laid down upon the charts employed. If a sand bar, or a coral reef, or other obstruction be incorrectly located, no method of finding the latitude and longitude of the ship, however easy and accurate, could ensure its safety. It is just as though the chart was accurate and the ship was provided with no adequate means of determining its own position. It is, therefore, very essential to the Navy, that the charts with which it is furnished should be constructed with the utmost attainable degree of accuracy. From this consideration, it would be altogether impolitic to entrust their publication to private individuals. They might not always feel a sufficient interest in their accuracy; and if they should, they would not possess the means of introducing the various corrections which from time to time are found necessary in previously existing charts. It would seem, then, altogether proper that the charts furnished the Navy should be constructed and engraved under the supervision and by the authority of persons appointed for this purpose by the government, whose duty it should be to introduce therein the results of the latest and best observations. The establishment of a Marine Observatory will greatly facilitate the accomplishment of this object. I have already indicated, in a general way, the manner in which a vessel should be furnished out, in order to determine its position with facility and accuracy. But when any particular place is approached, as a harbor, or a cape, or a sand bar, its position becomes known by means of the position of the ship, and to the same degree of accuracy. In applying, therefore, frequently and skilfully the methods by which the position of the ship is determined, the localities of a great many points become known. In this way a vessel may greatly contribute, in a single voyage, to the increase of our geographical knowledge and to the perfection of our charts. This service it will more effectually render if its Chronometers are carefully rated with reference to their performance at sea, and their going tested from time to time by a few Lunar Distances measured with the best instruments and with attention to every circumstance which can affect the accuracy of the final result; and better still, if this test be more rigorously applied by the transit instrument whenever it is practicable. In addition to this, the observation of the meridian passages of the moon's bright limb and of the stars near its path ought to be made as frequently as possible while at a port, the longitude of which has never been ascertained by more correct methods. A mass of data would thus be collected for the correction of our charts, which would soon render these sufficiently accurate for the general purposes of navigation. But that the greatest advantage may be derived from this system of observation, the original observations themselves with every accompanying circumstance ought to be deposited at the Observatory, that their relative importance may be judged of, and the most valuable of them reduced and calculated. Their reduction on ship board, at the time they are made, cannot be effected with sufficient accuracy, because, in the first place, the methods used for this purpose, as they are generally developed in treatises on Navigation, are designed to give results only approximately true.

Take, for example, the very convenient method of working a "Lunar Distance" given by Dr. Bowditch in the first edition of his "Practical Navigator," and which he has farther improved by additional tables in the last edition of that extremely valuable work. The distance obtained, according to that method, is defective by reason of neglecting several small corrections due, 1st. to the variations in the refractive power of the atmosphere; 2nd, to the spheroidal figure of the earth; 3rd, to the horizontal parallax of the moon when different from 57 minutes and 30 seconds. It is not thought necessary to introduce any such refinements into nautical calculations, as the observations upon which they are founded are generally made under circumstances but little favorable to a high degree of accuracy. But when peculiarly favorable circumstances are seized upon for making them, as may be done occasionally on deck and always on shore, the results should be obtained by more accurate methods, especially when they are to serve for the correction of charts. I speak from experience when I say, that with a well-constructed Reflecting Circle, and in a favorable position of the moon in respect to a star, their apparent distance may be measured with an accuracy which will warrant the reduction of the observation by a process more perfect than those usually employed at sea. But in the second place, if the methods used at sea were not defective in the particulars above stated, yet the tabular distance of the moon from the star is regarded as perfectly accurate, while in point of fact it is inaccurate by the whole amount of error in the Lunar Tables. In like manner the calculation of the longitude of a place founded upon Lunar culminations is affected by the errors of the Lunar Tables. But when the original observations shall be reported to the Observatory, these sources of error may be eliminated. It will be a part of the daily business at the Observatory to observe the moon's place; and when its actual place upon any day is compared with that given by the tables, the error in the latter becomes apparent, and may be applied to the results of any calculation at sea, in which the same tables were employed. It would be also the duty of the persons having charge of the Observatory to possess themselves of the results of the latest and best observations made by the vessels of other countries and by scientific travellers, and to embody in our charts such as might be deemed worthy of credit.

The survey of our own coast, which is so extensive and in some places so dangerous to approach, is certainly one of the most important works undertaken by the government. But as it has been connected with another department of the public service, it does not come properly within the scope of my present remarks; and yet the Observatory may be made to sustain a relation to that work which I will not pass by without a brief allusion.

Mr. Hassler stated to the committee, appointed by the last Congress, on the Coast Survey, as the reason why charts, of those parts of the coast which had been surveyed, had not been published, that the geographical position of no point in the United States had been sufficiently well determined to deduce therefrom the latitudes and longitudes of the several stations comprised in the primary triangulation. I was the more surprised at this because his triangulation lies in the vicinity of several cities and towns which I believe lay claim to the possession of Observatories of a grade at least sufficient to determine with a considerable degree of approximation their coördinates of position. It must be borne in mind, that after the geodetical distances between the several stations have been calculated, the latitude and longitude of at least one of the stations and the azimuth of one of the sides must be determined, in order to assign latitudes and longitudes to the other stations. But in a survey so extensive as that of the United States' coast, the latitude and longitude of but one station will not suffice. To give to the method, adopted for the survey, all of the accuracy of which it is susceptible, the figure of that portion of the earth over which the triangulation is spread, must be deduced. To do this, the triangulation must not only be conducted with all the precision of modern science and art, and be verified by the measurement of several bases, but temporary Observatories must be erected at certain stations along the series of triangles, and the geographical positions of such stations independently obtained by the best methods and with the utmost care. In the first elimination of the errors in the latitudes and longitudes of the stations as deduced by calculation, the Observatory, if it be made one of the stations the primitive triangulation, will afford very essential service. Its instrumental resources will be such, it is to be presumed, as will admit of the last degree of accuracy in the determination of its position. And as such, it may, and doubtless will be, one of the most important fundamental points in the survey.

If this degree of precision be not given to the Coast Survey, it will lose its scientific character, and very imperfectly fulfil the end it is intended to accomplish. If its results are not founded upon the determination of the special configuration of the surface over which it extends, I would not be disposed to place as much confidence in them, as I would in latitudes independently determined by Troughton's Zenith Sector and longitudes by signals of fire.

I will dismiss this subject, unexpectedly alluded to at all, with but one other remark. That the original observations, with all the attendant circumstances, ought to be reported without an erasure, without the suppression even of those known at the time to be defective. The observer ought not himself to be at liberty to reject any instrumental result, however discordant it may seem to be with those formerly obtained. He may state his reasons why he has not confidence in any particular observation, but should not have authority to exclude it from the result. It is only in this way that a correct judgment can be formed of the probable instrumental and personal errors which are inseparable, to some extent, from observations of this sort. The observations ought to be committed to a separate commission, or bureau, by which the calculations and reductions should be made with the utmost exactness. I am aware, that from motives of economy those who make observations in the summer, calculate the results during the succeeding winter;—but it is worth while to inquire whether observations cannot be pushed forward in the South during winter, so as to expedite the progress of the work to a very considerable extent. And if it is contemplated, as I hear, to carry the primary triangulation as far into the interior as the mountains, unless the work be pushed forward more energetically, our children's children will not live to see the benefits resulting from its completion; and, in the meanwhile, the loss of life and property may greatly exceed the additional expense which its more vigorous prosecution will require.

The objects already noticed, as they bear a most obvious and immediate relation to the interests of the Navy, were probably the only ones had in contemplation in the establishment of the Observatory. But there are others no less important which may be accomplished by a very trifling addition to the appropriations which will be necessary for the former.

Our Navy has always been and is yet dependent upon the "Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty" of Great Britain, or the "Bureau des Longitudes" of France, for the means of navigating the high seas with safety. And is it not discreditable to the science and enterprise of our country that it should be so? There is not an original Ephemeris published in America. Blunt's, of New-York, which is so much used by our commercial vessels, is merely a reprint of the most useful parts of the British Nautical Almanac; and this epitome, or some other, or the British Almanac itself, or the "Connaissance des Temps," will be found on board of all our vessels of war. This service to our commerce and Navy may be performed at Washington as well as at Greenwich, or Paris, and not only the interest, but the honor of the country requires that it should be done.

But furthermore, the Observatory may be organized upon such a scale as to enable it to contribute its share to the advancement of Astronomy, which is the oldest of the sciences, which, perhaps, has, more than any other, contributed to the progress of civilization and refinement throughout the world, and which must depend for its successful prosecution, so far as instrumental results are concerned, upon the countenance and munificence of governments. And it is gratifying to see to what extent this noble science has been fostered by the civil powers of Europe. There are not less than forty public Observatories, established in Europe and its colonies, of which the most celebrated and useful are those at Greenwich, Dublin, Cape of Good Hope, Paramatta, Paris, Turin, Altona, Bremen, Königsburg, Berlin, Gotha, Göttingen and Dorpat.

But while the governments of Europe have seemed to vie with each other in the number and character of their public Observatories, there is not one, so far as I know, in this country which deserves to be ranked among them. It surely must be a narrow and prejudiced mind, that would arrest the progress of a science because every step of it has not a palpable and immediate relation to the ordinary business of life. We cannot always foresee in what manner precisely our more abstract and refined speculations will bear upon the common interests of mankind; and yet assuredly, if we are in the pursuit of Truth, its attainment will prove highly useful to the improvement and happiness of our species. Our present subject furnishes an apt illustration of the propriety of this remark. Without the high speculations of Geometers upon celestial mechanics, the method of Lunar Distances, so valuable at sea for determining longitudes, could never have been realized. The possibility of applying the method depends upon the accuracy of the Lunar Tables; and these never could have attained their present degree of perfection, without the labors, purely geometrical, to which I have referred. Indeed, Astronomy is one continued illustration of the truth of the remark, that the satisfaction of our commonest wants frequently demands scientific speculations of a character the most sublime. Whether we consider the perfection of its scientific character, the generality of its laws, or the importance of its results, Astronomy must confessedly stand the first of the natural sciences. It furnishes us with all our measures of time—with all our knowledge in respect to the figure and dimensions of the planet which we inhabit—with the means of determining positions upon its surface, and of directing our course along its pathless waters—and with our best and only invariable units of linear measure. Surely it becomes the United States, as a great commercial and navigating nation, to extend a fostering care to a department of human knowledge which is so identified with its interests and honor.

And though Astronomy has, in many points of view, attained a degree of perfection to which no other science can lay claim, yet it must not be supposed that the establishment of an Observatory of proper rank can contribute nothing to its future progress.

In respect to our solar system there are several interesting and delicate questions which are yet to be solved.

More accurate observation will show whether something is still wanting to the solar theory, as is suspected by Bessel and Airy.

The planets are yet to be more nicely weighed, and the tables of their motions more perfectly constructed.

Astronomers already feel the absolute necessity of investigating more minutely the refraction which rays of light undergo in traversing the atmosphere, and of applying with greater accuracy the corrections due to variations in temperature, density and humidity. The errors which exist in our best tables of refraction, are unfortunately involved in many of our most important and delicate researches, such as the determination of the Obliquity of the Ecliptic, the place of the equinox, the positions of the stars and many others. The constants of nutation and aberration are still in doubt to a small extent; and, in a word, there is no instrumental result employed in Astronomy, which may not undergo a modification, greater or less, when better instruments shall be constructed and improved methods of observation employed.

Cometary Astronomy is yet in its infancy. We have determined, with tolerable precision, the orbits of only three or four of the many hundreds which belong to our system. In respect to their physical constitution, we may be said to be profoundly ignorant. But though we know so little of them, yet important results have already flowed from the attention which astronomers have paid to these mysterious bodies. By means of them we have arrived at the interesting fact of the existence of a resisting medium.

In Stellar Astronomy our knowledge is still more imperfect. We do not as yet know the distances of the fixed stars from us, which is the simplest element that can enter into our researches concerning them; unless, indeed, 61st Cygni be an exception, to which Bessel thinks his observations assign an annual parallax of 0.3136 of a second. It must still, however, be admitted to be doubtful whether this, or any other star has an appreciable parallax. The accurate observation of binary stars is likely to prove the most fertile source of discovery in respect to these distant bodies. It already seems to be quite probable, that their dynamical relations to each other, may be adequately explained upon the hypothesis, that they circulate about their common centre of gravity, by virtue of a force identical in its laws with gravitation. I think farther observation necessary to warrant this extraordinary extension of gravitation, although the analogical argument in favor of it is very strong. In such delicate observations, is it yet certain whether the one star describes an elliptic orbit about the other placed at the focus or the centre, or at any intermediate point? As long as doubt exists in regard to the relative position of the latter, we should not be hasty in drawing our conclusions in respect to the law of attraction subsisting between the bodies. I regret that I have not seen the most recent papers upon this interesting subject by Sir J. F. Herschell. They are said to be replete with valuable information, and I regret yet more that I have not as yet been able to obtain his method communicated to the Astronomical Society, for the calculation and construction of the elements of the orbits of binary stars, which depends exclusively upon the observed angles of position.

From the difference of the observed times which the revolving star requires to describe the two portions of its orbit symmetrical to the Axis Major, Savary has proposed to determine its distance from the earth. The idea is ingenious, but it remains for future observations to establish its practicability.

In this hasty sketch of the objects to be accomplished by the establishment of an Observatory, I must not forget that magnetism is to receive the special attention of those who have the charge of it. And I perceive that a separate building has very properly been erected for this purpose, and that it is the intention of the government to supply it with the best instruments.

To a maritime nation the subject of Magnetism is one of much importance. All Marine Charts must show the variation of the Magnetic from the true meridian, at least approximately, in every sea and place visited by our commercial and naval vessels. The needle is essential to direct the vessel upon any designated course, and therefore the laws by which its indications are controlled should be carefully investigated. There is but little doubt that the Magnetic forces of the earth are subjected to laws which may be discovered, and from which, if they were known, the courses and variations of the isoclinal and isodynamic lines might be deduced by calculation. We feel in this department of science as if the conception of some great and fundamental truth was just about to burst upon us, not unlike that which opened up before the vision of the philosopher of Samos when he uttered the rapturous "εἶσενκα." But already is theory in advance of observation, particularly observation of that continued and delicate character, which alone can conduct to definite and certain results.

Europe has recently taken up this subject with becoming interest and zeal. The methods of observation devised and practised in Germany have extended to other countries. Magnetical Observatories have been established in various quarters of the globe, as at St. Helena, the Cape of Good Hope, Van Dieman's Land, Canada, India, &c., in which observations are prosecuted, strictly in concert with the Observatories in Europe. It is therefore with pride and pleasure that I hail the establishment of such an Observatory in the City of Washington, which may be made to play an important part in that grand system of concerted observation which has been undertaken by the principal nations of the earth; and every American must desire to see it organized and conducted in a manner worthy of science and of our country. It must not be forgotten that a Magnetical Observatory is essential to give value to the individual contributions which the scientific men of our country are continually making to our stock of Magnetical information. The differential dip, variation and intensity are more readily and accurately found than the absolute; and therefore the Observatory at Washington will be a fundamental point of comparison for all observations made by individual enterprise.

The instruments used in Magnetic Surveys, whether on land or sea, ought to be examined at the Observatory both before and after their use, and this should be a service required of the Observatory, independently of the observations proper to itself.

And while on ship board observations cannot be made with that accuracy which will render them valuable in the discussion of theoretical views; yet they will be highly useful for the correction of the Magnetic Charts now in common use. It would therefore be desirable to furnish each vessel of the Navy with the best means of making them.

Having consumed so much of the space allotted to this letter, in treating of the objects to be accomplished by the establishment of an Observatory, I must be very brief on the subject of its organization.

It should of course be put under the direction of one having every qualification to conduct the business of it in the best manner possible. It should be furnished with Astronomical and Magnetical instruments, as powerful and as perfect as art can render them. The number of assistants should be sufficient to keep up a continued series of observations in the Magnetic Observatory, and also in the Astronomical, when the weather permits.

All of the observations with every accompanying circumstance should be published; and the same properly reduced. It is not enough that observations be skilfully made; they should be reduced in the most rigid and exact manner. It is the least part of an Astronomer's business to make an observation. The results are to be exhibited and compared with theory, and here all his talents and mental resources find the fullest scope.

Many of the observations of Bradley and Maskelyne remain to this day almost useless for the want of reduction, and England ingloriously suffered the Astronomers of the continent to profit chiefly by the instrumental results of her most accomplished observers, by neglecting this very essential part of the work of an Observatory.

As to the actual expense of establishing and conducting an Observatory on the scale contemplated in the foregoing remarks, the estimate made by Mr. Adams, in his "Report on the Smithsonian Bequest," seems to be founded on satisfactory data, and to that I beg leave to refer you.

That estimate did not include a Magnetic Observatory, which will require an additional observer, and probably two. It should be recollected that the expense for buildings and instruments has already been incurred, and that provision only has to be made for the annual operations of the establishment. The whole annual cost would not exceed $15,000. And if the buildings and instruments are, as Lieut. Gilliss reports, of the first class, it is worthy the consideration of the Government, whether the additional expense required to organize the Observatory in a manner to fulfil all the important ends which such an establishment may subserve, would not be fully justified.

With sentiments of the highest regard,

I am your obedient servant,
LANDON C. GARLAND.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

SAWYER'S LIFE OF RANDOLPH.

"The Lion was dead that received the kick."

No man ever lived whose biography was more likely to excite a general interest and to be well received by the public than Randolph of Roanoke. The profound silence of the press on that subject is a curious fact. It is understood that considerations of delicacy may have restrained his near relations pending the controversy arising out of his will. The question of his sanity is one on which it would have been wrong to preoccupy the public mind; and no biographer could, in justice to him, have been silent on that subject. His other near friends may be supposed to have been restrained by the same consideration.

But why was not his life written by others? Lord Byron was hardly dead before the Dallas's and Leigh Hunts, &c., &c., were seeking to make a profit of the little intercourse with him which he had unadvisedly permitted. Why did nothing of the sort happen in this case? The answer is to be found in the delicacy which always has distinguished Virginians. They felt that it was due to Mr. R.'s friends to decide whether the veil should be drawn aside from his private life. Of the hundreds, therefore, who might have made entertaining books of reminiscences from the conversations of a man whose words were, by turns, prophecy, poetry and epigram, not one has published a line. A Mr. Jacob Harvey, an Irishman, entertained the public with such scraps as a short acquaintance enabled him to collect. His account is probably as faithful as he knew how to make it. But Mr. H. had not the faculty to preserve the very words of Mr. R., and many of his anecdotes are, therefore, deficient in accuracy in this important point. There was a tone in his style of conversation as well known to his friends as his voice, and, missing that, they always know that the very words imputed to him, were never spoken by him. With this exception, and that of a small volume of his letters, nothing concerning him has ever, until now, been given to the public. In Virginia nothing at all.

It remained for a citizen of another State, a stranger and an enemy, to interrupt, with his idle gossip, this funereal silence, and to make a market of his pretended knowledge of Mr. R. by vending it at a distance from those who could have told his bookseller that he knew nothing of his subject. His means of knowledge are paraded on the title page, where he announces that he was for sixteen years the associate of Mr. R. in Congress. But he presently makes known that he was politically opposed to him; and all who know Mr. R. know that to be so, at that time, was to be cut off from all intercourse with him. Hence, Mr. S. himself tells no more of his own personal knowledge than what passed at their first meeting. Giving him credit for intending to tell the truth, this fact may be taken, as he tells it, for what it is worth; and this is precisely as much as the public can safely take on the authority of Mr. Sawyer. The rest of the work is made up of a very unskilful digest of the contents of the papers of the day, and a collection of idle tales, of which not one in ten has any foundation in truth. In many passages the work may be truly characterised in the language of indictments as a "false, scandalous and malicious libel." Let us take a few examples.

At p. 26 Mr. R.'s change of political position is said to have grown out of a certain presidential message of January 17, 1806. Now there was neither then, nor at any time, any such message as is there spoken of.

At p. 47 there is a most indecent anecdote, in telling which Mr. S. affects accuracy, and corrects some other writer. Here he introduces a female name. It is well for him, that, as no such thing ever happened, there was no such lady as he speaks of. If there were, and she had a relation in the world with the spirit of a man, Mr. S. would be most deservedly punished.

At p. 41 Mr. R. is represented as courting popular favor after his defeat in 1813, by Mr. Eppes, and the arts used by him are detailed. Every man, woman and child in Mr. R.'s district knows that his demeanor was never so high and haughty as at that time; that there was no such partizan as is there mentioned; that his deportment toward all to whom the description could apply was absolutely repulsive; and that the disgusting hypocrisy of frequenting Baptist meeting houses to conciliate that sect, and making a display of religious zeal was never heard of there.

We instance these things as not resting on private knowledge, but on notoriety. They manifest a reckless disregard of truth, which makes it superfluous to contradict calumnies, the refutation of which must depend on testimony of a more precise and personal character.

Mr. S.'s disregard to truth is strikingly manifested in his neglect to inform himself of particulars which he might have learned from the most authentic sources. Mr. Randolph's brothers, Dr. Brockenbrough and the Messrs. Leigh are known men, and Mr. S. could have reached either by letter. Had he done this, would he have called Mr. R. the nephew of Edmund Randolph, and represented him as a member of his family, as at p. 10? Would he have represented Mr. R.'s mother, at p. 9, as removing to Williamsburg with her husband, when she was already dead? These are things of small consequence in themselves. But to speak of them without resorting to the means of knowledge at hand, shows an utter disregard to the first duty of an historian.

What we have said, founded on no particular knowledge, but on a notoriety so great, that each point we have touched on is probably known to 10,000 persons, as certainly as man can know that of which he was not an eye witness, is enough to satisfy the public that in purchasing the work in question, they may get gossip for their money, they may get calumny, but they will certainly not get an authentic biography of John Randolph.

Judge Tucker
THE ORATION OF DEMOSTHENES ON THE CROWN; with notes, by J. T. Champlin, Professor of Greek and Latin in Waterville College. Boston: James Monroe & Co. 1843.

This volume ought to have received an earlier attention from us. There is one comfort, however, in the matter. It is just as good now as it was the day it came from the press. There is nothing ephemeral about it. It is not one of that kind of works that must be praised the month, or the year in which they come out, or be praised too late. The object of its preparation is excellent, and carried out with distinguished skill. We are much mistaken, if any thing with the same design appear for a long time that can in justice supplant it.

This contribution of Prof. Champlin to the cause of classical literature has already received the unqualified commendation of the best critical authorities in this country. We have given the book something more than a glance, and beg leave to add our humble testimony to theirs. By recalling the wants we felt, when, a few years since, it was our own happiness and misery to delve in the mine of Demosthenes, we have formed some idea as to what the book must be, which shall meet the necessities of a scholar, who, at the proper stage of his progress in the Greek classics, sets himself to the mastery of this splendid, but difficult oration. The result is precisely the conception we find realized before us. Here we have, elegantly and accurately printed, the text of Bekker, as revised and corrected by Dindorf,—than which nothing can be more exact; whilst great care has evidently been bestowed upon the punctuation, and the arrangement into paragraphs. Then, the notes are just what notes should be. They are not a posy, but, a guide. They furnish all necessary historical and archæological information,—and much surely is needed by the young student in reading a production which deals so largely in the history, laws, and politics of all Greece; besides which, they throw not a little light on the difficulties, frequently embarrassing enough,—in the explanation of words, sentences and grammatical constructions.

But the crowning excellence of Prof. C.'s performance we regard to be the happy manner in which he has developed the course of thought pursued by the orator. "For its purpose a very full and minute analysis has been prefixed to the oration, and special pains have been taken to point out in the notes the meaning of those words and phrases which may be regarded as the hinges of the thought, to notice the transitions, to show the connexion of consecutive ideas, and the relevancy of what, without explanation, might appear foreign to the subject." Indeed we can hardly conceive how any editor could have more successfully accomplished the object of Prof. C.—"to aid the diligent student in obtaining a clear and vivid conception of the stirring thoughts and sentiments contained in this masterpiece of the prince of orators."

We observe that the editor in the close of his preface acknowledges obligation to Professors Elton, of Brown University, Hackett, of Newton Theological Institution, and Felton, of Harvard University, for their aid and encouragement. That these gentlemen should have interested themselves in the undertaking, argues beyond a doubt both that such a work was needed, and that the work is well done.

We are happy to learn that on a contingency, which we cannot believe involves doubt,—"the approbation of scholars" on this attempt,—Prof. C. contemplates a continuation of his labors in this important and interesting province of the republic of letters. J. R. S.

DISTRIBUTION OF INSANITY. We omitted to state that the article on Insanity, in the last number of the Messenger by C. B. Hayden, was written before he had seen that on the same subject, previously published in the Messenger, or any similar one. We have read the counter-views of Doct. Jarvis, and whilst we are not sure that he has entirely overthrown the conclusions arrived at by our correspondents and other writers on the same side, we must admit that he has upset many of the statistics on the subject contained in the last census.

Notices of New Works.

Our table is so crowded with works claiming notice that we shall be compelled to dismiss them with very few words.

NOVELS.

BOY O'MORE, A NATIONAL ROMANCE, by Samuel Lover, Esq., author of "Handy Andy," "Treasure Trove," etc., etc. Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia, 1844.

We enjoyed this amusing and interesting work several years ago and would recommend it, but that the name of the author saves us the trouble. Drinker & Morris have it.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JACK OF THE MILL; commonly called Lord Othmill, created, for his eminent services, Baron Waldeck and Knight of Kitkottie. A frsude story, by WILLIAM HOWITT.

THE UNLOVED ONE. A domestic story, by Mrs. HOFFLAND, authoress of "Catherine I, or the Czarina," &c.

THE JEW. "Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions?" &c. Shylock.

THE GRUMBLER. By Miss Ellen Pickering, authoress of "The Fright," &c., &c.

THE HERETIC. Translated from the Russian of Lajéchnikoff, by — Shaw.

All these belong to the Harpers' "Library of select novels," of which they have now issued thirty odd numbers at twelve and a half cents each. Drinker & Morris of this city have them all for sale.

The Heretic opens to us the school of Russian Literature, as the novels of Frederika Bremer lately opened that of Sweden. Frederika was a very great favorite at first, and still retains her hold; but the close resemblance between all her works diminishes it with every new one; and we begin to think that her charm was more in her novelty, than her originality; more in her unexpected appearance than in her power as a writer. She writes of Home and Neighbors, the Strife and Peace of the Household and the Diary of Domestic Life. These subjects can soon be exhausted, not of their purity and loveliness, nor of their importance; but of all originality. To produce much change in these, the lapse of centuries is necessary; and they sometimes appear to be unaffected by Time. The events of a rising nation, however, are always varying and exciting; and must ever furnish the Drama and Romance with their most abiding and novel themes. Lajéchnikoff has taken his subject from the history of his country. The events he describes occurred in the 15th century, under Ivan III, and the novelist has been almost as conscientious as the historian should be. Russia has made rapid and astonishing strides towards national greatness and political importance; and Alison but assigns her her true position, when he places her among the foremost of the European States. It is time indeed that we had begun to learn something of the Literature of so prominent a country. The Heretic is among its heralds and its character as a historical romance will tend to secure it a welcome and an extensive perusal. Blackwood's Magazine for February contains a very instructive review of the Heretic. The reviewer says that whilst "M. Lajéchnikoff has succeeded in faithfully illustrating the manners of the age of Ivan the Great, he has also shewn that he possesses brilliancy of fancy, fervor of thought and elevation of sentiment, as well as knowledge of the movements of the heart, revealed only to the few who have been initiated into nature's mysteries." From the different class of subjects which he has chosen, the Russian may enjoy a more lasting reputation than Miss Bremer, "unless," as Moore says, his "dissonant consonant name" should prematurely "rattle to fragments the Trump of Fame."

THE ENGLISH GOVERNESS. A tale of real life. By Miss R. McCrindell, authoress of "the School Girl in France." H. Hooker, Philadelphia, 1844. J. W. Randolph & Co., Richmond, Va.

This interesting work gives a picture of the state of religion in Spain; and contains many incidents, which impart a special interest, from the fact that they are occurrences of real life. It will be read with much pleasure—though the character of the heroine does not seem to us as perfect as it did to the authoress. Its style and form are chaste and convenient.

COTTERILL'S FAMILY PRAYERS. Carefully revised by Wm. W. Spear, rector of St. Luke's, Philadelphia. 1844. J. W. Randolph & Co. have this useful and important little book for sale.

BISHOP JEREMY TAYLOR ON EPISCOPACY. New-York, D. Appleton & Co. Philadelphia, Geo. S. Appleton. Richmond, Drinker & Morris. 1844, p.p. 361. 8 vo.

This is an exceedingly neat and tasteful publication. The learning and eloquence of Bishop Taylor are almost proverbial.

THE APOSTOLICAL SYSTEM OF THE CHURCH DEFENDED; in a reply to Doct. Whately, &c., By Samuel Buel, A. M. Philadelphia, H. Hooker. J. W. Randolph & Co., Richmond. 1844, p.p. 165. 8 vo.

The religious world appear to be getting ready for controversy,—marshalling their champions both old and young. The issues from the press, as well as other signs of the times, indicate the awakening of a warm polemical spirit. We will not be an indifferent spectator of the contests that seem to be approaching. But our part will be confined to announcing the preparations that are made and the advent of the champions, whom the press sends forth.

MEMOIRS OF SILVIO PELLICO; or my prisons: translated from the Italian. By M. J. Smead and H. P. Lefebvre. New York: H. G. Langley, 1844, p.p., 86. 8vo.

We return our thanks to the translators for this work and heartily welcome them to the republic of Letters. We are particularly gratified to find our own citizens engaging in such pursuits. The translators are two young and zealous teachers in the city of Richmond; and the work before us proves that they are not content only to beat the daily task into the heads of their pupils; but are incited by a laudable ambition and a zeal for self-improvement. Silvio Pellico was an Italian author of no little distinction and his "prisons" will be found highly captivating.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY, on a new and systematic plan; from the earliest times to the treaty of Vienna. To which is added a summary of the leading events since that period. By H. White. B. A., Trinity College, Cambridge. With additions by John S. Hart, A. M., Principal of the Philadelphia high school, &c., &c. Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia, 1844, pp. 525, 8vo.

This is the age of study-saving machines, which, however, too often are knowledge-preventing ones. It might be possible to put into the space of this work a geography of the world; but it is not so easy to condense its History, when one spot of earth may be the theatre of so many events equally demanding attention. The work is systematically arranged, and doubtless contains many important facts, for which it may at times be useful. But even the more extensive work of Tytler is too meagre on many important subjects to be of much value. The publishers have well performed their part by presenting the book in a very neat and convenient form. Drinker & Morris have it for sale.

THE EVIDENCES OF THE GENUINENESS OF THE GOSPELS. By Andrews Norton. 3 vols. large 8vo. John Owen, Cambridge, 1844.

By some mistake, we have received only the 2nd and 3rd volumes of this work from the publisher, Mr. Owen. The style of the work deserves commendation. The type and paper are not inferior to those of that beautiful work, Prescott's Mexico. The subject of which it treats is vitally important and one upon which works may profitably be multiplied. Scepticism is not more dangerous to individuals than to nations. Indeed, individual interests include and constitute those of the nation. Yet there are ills and dangers emphatically national, which scepticism in religion has produced and must ever produce. Mr. Norton has provided an antidote for this poison, which we hope will be liberally taken. His work contains an account of the ancient philosophy and the mystic and somewhat poetic system of the Gnostics, of which we have read with much interest in Mosheim and other writers. These volumes contain all "the historical evidence both direct and subsidiary of the genuineness of the Gospels;" and the author proposes hereafter to present the internal evidence—to be accompanied, or followed by a translation of the New Testament.

BENTHAMIANA, OR SELECT EXTRACTS FROM THE WORKS OF JEREMY BENTHAM. Edited by John Hill Burton, Advocate. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard. 1844. Drinker and Morris. p.p. 446. 8 vo.

This work has been lying on our table some time. It groups together the works and opinions of Bentham and will be found interesting and instructive. It is well "gotten up," besides.

NARRATIVE OF THE TEXAN SANTA FE EXPEDITION, comprising a description of a tour through Texas, &c.; Capture of the Texans, and their march as prisoners to the City of Mexico. With illustrations and a map. By Geo. Wilkins Kendall. In 2 vols. New-York: Harper & Brothers, 1844. Drinker & Morris, Richmond.

If any persons took our advice to wait for this work, instead of reading or buying the pilfered accounts of Moss, Violet and Capt. Maryatt, they will be amply rewarded by its perusal for their patience. Now is emphatically a time when every one should deem it patriotic to give preference to native productions and to do all in his power to build up and foster a National Literature.

PERIODICALS.

Charleston, S. C., now sends forth three periodicals.

1. THE ORION with which our readers are already acquainted. The March No. is a good one. We think the work will now improve as it has got into a good literary atmosphere.

2. THE INTERPRETER is a semi-monthly, of 16 pages, devoted to the explanation of the French, Italian, Spanish and German languages. Edited by B. Jenkins. Terms $3 a year in advance. The student of modern languages would derive assistance from it, as Mr. Jenkins is represented to be well fitted for the task in which he is engaged. But he does not enjoy a monopoly, for we have also received the first No. of

"3. THE POLYGLOTT, a monthly, in quarto form of 24 pages, very handsomely printed and arranged, devoted to the same four languages, and Edited by Louis F. Klipstein, A. M., a native of Virginia. Terms $5 a year—50 cents a single number. These periodicals contain not only the elements of these languages; but many choice productions from, or translated into each one. The study of modern languages is now becoming not only ornamental, but directly useful, since the Improvements of Science and Art are making foreign tones familiar to our ears.

We have also received the first number of the North Carolina University Magazine. It is a neat octavo of some 48 pages, published by Mr. Loring, Raleigh, at $3 a year, and is Edited by a committee of the Senior class at Chapel Hill. The first number contains some interesting articles, among them one upon Macaulay and another on the early history of N. Carolina. We wish the enterprise complete success.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

MAY, 1844.

IPHIGENIA AT TAURIS.

A DRAMATIC POEM.

IN FIVE ACTS.

(Translated from the German of Goëthe.)

ACT V.—SCENE 1.

Thoas and Arcas.

Arcas. I am indeed perplexed, and at a loss
What to suspect. Perhaps the prisoners
Meditate flight. Perhaps the Priestess aids them.
The rumor spreads, that, hidden in some bay,
Their vessel lies. This man's insanity—
This holy rite—a pretext for delay,
Excite distrust and call for vigilance.

Thoas. Go send the Priestess hither. Search the shore,
Quickly and closely, from the promontory
Quite to the sacred grove. Respect its shades,
But lay a cautious ambushment, and then
Seize them, as usual, wheresoe'er you find them.

Thoas. [Alone.] With frightful violence my spirit rages,
First against her, whom once I deemed so holy,
And then against myself, who trained her up
To treason by my kindness and forbearance.
Man, stript of freedom, quickly learns obedience,
And wears his bonds with patience. Had she fallen
Into the hands of my rude ancestors,
What tho' their superstitious rage had spared her,
Obed to escape with life, she would have thought
Only of her own safety, and, with thanks,
Submitting to her fate, had shed strange blood
Upon the altar, giving to necessity
The name of Duty. Now my kindness raises Bold wishes in her breast. Vainly I hoped
To make her mine. Her thoughts are now engaged
In later schemes. With flattery at first
She won my heart. Now I oppose her will,
And straight with cunning and deceit she tries
To gain her end, as if she claimed my kindness,
So long experienced, as her property.

SCENE 2.

Thoas and Iphigenia.

Iphigenia. My presence thou commandest. What brings thee to us?

Thoas. Say rather, what delays the sacrifice?

Iphigenia. I have to Arcas plainly told the cause.

Thoas. I wish, myself, to hear it from thy lips.

Iphigenia. The Goddess gives thee time to reconsider.

Thoas. And Time, it seems is suited to THY purpose.

Iphigenia. If, in its purposed cruelty, thy heart
Is hardened, 'twas unwise to come. A King
Finds ready tools, that, for reward or favor,
Will share the curse of guilt, and save his presence
From the pollution. Wrapt within a cloud,
He thinks of Death, and straight his messengers
Flame down destruction on the wretched head:
While he, a God, all unapproachable,
Aloft upon the tempest rides serenely.

Thoas. The holy lip utters a frantic strain.

Iphigenia. No Priestess! Only Agamemnon's daughter.
Thou didst revere my words while yet unknown.
Wilt thou command the Daughter of a King?
Even from infancy I learned obedience,
First to my parents; after to the Goddess;
And in obedience ever felt my soul
Most beautifully free: but to submit
To the rough words and harsh commands of man!
I have not learned it—either there or here.

Thoas. 'Tis long established law commands—not I.

Iphigenia. We seize with eagerness upon the law,
When we can make it passion's instrument.
Another speaks to me: an older law:
The Law that makes the stranger's person sacred
Bids me oppose thee.

Thoas. The prisoners seem Too near thy heart. With nothing to engage Thy interest of feelings, thou forgettest
The first command of prudence; not to dare
The frown of power.

Iphigenia. Let me speak or not,
Thou still must know the workings of my soul.
Must not remembrance of the self-same fate
Expand the heart, tho' locked in selfishness?
How much then mine! In them I see myself.
Before the altar I myself have trembled,
Solemnly bowed, in awe of present death.

The lifted knife I saw already aimed
To pierce my bosom warm with life. My soul
Quailed at the sight, whirling in dizzy trance,
When my eyes opened, and I found myself
In safety. Should we not to others grant,
In their calamity, the same relief
The Gods to us have graciously afforded?
Thou knowest both this and me. And wilt thou force me?

Thoas. Perform thy function: not a master's will.

Iphigenia. Forbear; and seek no more to veil the power
That wantons with the weakness of a woman.
Freeborn am I as Man. 'But if the Son
Of Agamemnon stood before thee here
Resisting criminal commands, his sword
And arm might well defend his bosom's rights.
Words are my only weapon. But the word
Of woman every noble mind respects.

Thoas. I do respect it—more than a brother's sword.

Iphigenia. The fate of arms is various. Prudent boldness

Despises not the foe; and e'en the weak
Against the fiercer and arrogant is not Wholly defenceless. Nature teaches him
To practice art and cunning, to elude,
To circumvent and baffle; and these arts
Against the strong may rightfully be used.

Thoas. Prudence suggests, that they who war with craft
Should practice caution.

Iphigenia. But the pure of heart
Can never need such refuge.

Thoas. O beware!

Lest thine own sentence rashly thou pronounce.

Iphigenia. Oh! could'st thou see the struggle of my soul,
Fighting against the fate that threatens it!
Unarmed I stand before thee; suppliant prayer,—
The beautiful bough of peace,—in woman's hand
More powerful than sword or spear thou scornest.
What means are left me now to guard my heart?
Must I upon the Goddess call for aid
Miraculous? Is there, within the depths
Of my own soul, no power?

Thoas. The Strangers' fate
Appears to make thee anxious beyond measure.
Who are these Men—speak plainly—that so strongly
Thy spirit thus erects itself for them?

Iphigenia. They are—they seem—I take them to be Greeks.

Thoas. Thy Countrymen! And so they have revived
The brilliant fancy of return to Greece.

Iphigenia. [After being silent.] Is it for Man alone, nobly to dare

Unheard of deeds? Is he alone to clasp
The impossible to his heroic breast?
What call we great? What makes the eager soul
Hang trembling on the lips of the narrator?
What is it but the daring that defies Improbability? Is he alone
Worthy of praise, who steals upon the host
Of enemies, and, like a sudden bursting flame,
Sweeps over all who sleep, and when awake
They peep around him, on a hostile steed
Retreats, with booty laden? He alone,
Who, scorning the safe path, roams boldly on,
Through woods and mountains, to expel a band
Of Robbers? Is there nothing left to us?
Must tender Woman then renounce her nature;
Be savage against savages, and wrest,
Amazon like, the empire of the sword
From Man, oppression bloodily avenging.
My heaving bosom rises to attempt
A daring deed: but bitter the reproach—

Bitter the fate that waits me if I fail.
I lay it on your knees; and if you be
All you are praised for being, show it now:
Lend me your aid, and honor truth through me.
Then learn, O King! A secret plot is laid;
The Captives thou demand'st in vain, for they
Are gone to seek their friends, who, with the ship,
Wait on the shore. The oldest who with frenzy
Was here attacked, tho' now at last relieved—
It is Orestes. It is my own brother:
The other Pyllades, his early friend
And confidant. Apollo sends them hither
From Delphi, to secure Diana's statue
And bear his Sister to him: and, to him,
Chased by the Furies, stained with a Mother's blood,
He promises deliverance. To thy hands
I thus commit the fate of both. We are
The relics of the house of Tantalus.
Destroy us, if thou darest.

Thoas. Dost thou imagine
That the rude Scythian—the Barbarian,
The dictate of humanity and truth,
Which the Greek Atræus heeded not, will hear.

Iphigenia. All hear it, all! under whatever sky
They have their birth, all through whose breast unclogged
Life's fountain pours its pure and ruddy stream.
Oh! King; in thy soul's depths what dost thou purpose?
Is it destruction? Then destroy me first.
For now I feel, since no escape is left us,
The dreadful danger into which I've plunged,
Precipitately, but intentionally,
My best beloved. How can I bear to look
My last on him I murder? Nevermore
Am I to gaze upon his much loved eyes!

Thoas. These artful traitors cunningly have cast
A web of fiction o'er thee, long pent up
And to their purpose easily deceived.

Iphigenia. No King! O no! Though I might be deceived,
They are sincere and true. If they prove false
Then banish me, my folly will deserve it,
To the sad rock-bound shore of some lone isle.
But if this be my loved, my long wished brother,
Then let us go, and to the brother be
The friend, the sister to this day has found thee.
By his wife's treachery my father fell;
She by her son; and now on him alone
The last hope of the house of Atræus rests.

O! let me go, and with pure heart and hand
Purge off, by sacrifice, our house's guilt.
Thou wilt not break thy word, and thou hast sworn
To let me go should an occasion offer
To bear me to my friends—and lo! 'tis here.
A King yields not assent, but to put off,
Like other men, the suppliant for the moment:
Nor does he promise what he cannot hope for—
Never so conscious of the pride of greatness,
As when he grants the expected happiness.

Thoas. As fire against water fiercely hissing
In the vain struggle to destroy its foe,
So in my bosom still my anger fights
Against thy words.

Iphigenia. Oh! like the holy light
Of the still flame upon the sacrifice,
So let thy grace light on me, wreathed with hymns
Of praise and thanks and joy.

Thoas. How oft this voice
Has softened me!

Iphigenia. O! as a pledge of peace
Give me your hand.

Thoas. Thou askest too much
To grant thus suddenly.

Iphigenia. No time for thought
Is wanted to do good.

Thoas. Yes: very much.

For good is often but the source of evil.

Iphigenia. Doubt turns it into evil. Do not pause
But grant, at once, all that your feelings prompt.

[Orestes enters and speaks, with his back to the scene.]

Orestes. Double your strength. Hold them in check one moment.

Yield not to numbers, but secure the path,
For me and for my Sister, to the ship.

[He sees Iphigenia without seeing the King.]

Quick! Quick! we are betrayed. But little space Remains for flight. Make haste. [He sees the King.]

Thoas. [Laying his hand on his sword.] None in my presence

Bears with impunity a naked sword.

Iphigenia. Forbear with rage and murder to profane
The dwelling of the Goddess: but command
Truce to your people. Listen to the Priestess:
To the sister listen.

Orestes. [To Iphigenia.] Who is this man
That threatens me?

Iphigenia. In him revere the King;
Him who has been to me a second father.
Forgive me, brother; but my child-like heart
Has to his hands our destiny committed.
I have revealed our plan, and saved my soul
From Treason.

Orestes. Will he then in peace dismiss us?

Thoas. Thy naked blade forbids me to reply.

Orestes. [Sheathing his sword.] Now speak. Thou seest that I obey thy words.

[Pylades enters followed by Arcas, both with drawn swords.]

Pylades. Dispatch. Our people gather their last strength,
And, slowly yielding, fall back to the sea.

What conference of Princes find I here?

Thoas. the King's honored head?

Arcas. [To Thoas.] Composedly

As it becomes thee, King, thou dost confront
These strangers. Their audacity is punished,
Their retinue retreat and fall. Their ship
Is ours. One word from thee, it stands in flames.

Thoas. Go to my people and command a truce.

Let none, while we confer, assail the foe. [Exit Arcas.]

Orestes. I take your offer. Go true friend. Collect
Our people, and with patience wait the event
The Gods to our enterprise appoint. [Exit Pylades.]

Iphigenia. Before you speak, relieve my heart from care.
I dread the bitter strife that must ensue,
If to the voice of Justice thou art deaf.

My Brother! Thou wilt not restrain thy rashness!

Thoas. As it becomes my age, I check my anger.

Now speak, and show me how thou provest thyself

The Son of Agamemnon, and her Brother.

Orestes. This is his sword: The same beneath whose edge
The chiefs of Troy have fallen. This I took
From his assassin, and implored the Gods
To grant to me the courage arms and fortune
Of the great King, with a more noble death.
Choose from the proudest chieftains of thy host
The best among them, and let him confront me.
Where'er the earth breeds Heroes, such request
Is not denied to strangers.

Thoas. Our old customs
Allow to strangers no such privilege.

Orestes. Then between us let a new custom now
First take its rise; for nations always sanction

Their Ruler's bright example as a Law.

Not for our freedom only let me strive;

But let the stranger for all strangers fight;

And if I fall, then let my doom be theirs.

But if propitious fortune gives me victory,

Then never let a stranger tread this shore

Who shall not find at once the ready smile

Of helpful-love, and comforted depart.

Thoas. Young man; thy bearing well becomes the race
On which thou prides thyself. Noble and brave
Are many here around me. I myself,
Tho' old, still face the foe, and I am ready
The chance of arms to hazard against thee.

Iphigenia. Not so! Oh! King, of no such bloody proof
Can there be need. Withdraw your hands, I pray you,
Both from your swords. Of me and of my fate

Think for a moment. The rash fight may make

The Hero's name immortal; tho' he fall

It lives in song; but of the endless tears

Of the poor widowed wife, posterity

Takes no account, nor does the Poet tell

Of all the thousand weeping days and nights,

In which the uncomplaining soul must waste

And wear itself away, in the vain wish

To call the dear departed back to life.

Trust me, that I at first was apprehensive

Lest a marauder's falsehood might decoy

From this secure asylum, and betray me

To servitude. I carefully have questioned

These men, inquiring every circumstance,

Demanding signs—and now my heart is sure.

See here—on this right hand—three stars, a mark

Born with him, construed by the Priestess

To tell of heavy deeds to be performed

By this same hand. Then on his brow this scar

Doubly assures me. See! It splits his eye-brow.

While yet a child, Electra, rash and careless,

As was her wont, upon a tripod dropt him

Out of her arms. 'Tis he. It is himself.

Shall I allege the likeness to his Father?

Shall I allege the inmost jubilation

Of my fond heart, in witness of the truth?

Thoas. If thy assurance should remove all doubt,

And should I tame the anger of my breast,

The sword must still be arbiter between us,

Peace is impracticable. They are come

(Thou hast thyself confessed it) to purloin

The holy Image of the Guardian Goddess.

Dost thou suppose that I will suffer this?

The Grecian often turns his greedy eye

Upon the distant treasures of Barbarians,

On golden fleece, on steeds, on beauteous maids;

Altho' his force and cunning sometimes fail

To bear him, with his spoils, in safety home.

Orestes. Oh King! The Image shall no more divide us.

We now perceive the error which the God

Cast, like a mystic veil, around our heads,

When he commanded us to journey hither.

I prayed to him for counsel and deliverance

From the fierce band of Furies. Thus he spake.

"When thou to Greece the SISTER, who in Tauris

Dwells in the sanctuary against her will Shalt bring, the curse will solve itself." By this

We understood the Sister of Apollo;

But 'twas of thee he spoke. The spell is broken;

Thou to thy friends restored; and, at thy touch,

The evil for the last time seized upon me,

With all its claws, shaking my very marrow;

Then, like a snake that to its cavern skulls

It fled forever. Now anew, through thee,

Again I revel in the day's broad light,

While, beautiful and lordly, to my eye
The purpose of the Goddess stands revealed.
Thee, like a holy image with the fate
Of some proud city bound indissolubly,
By a mysterious oracle, she bore
Away to be the saviour of our house;
Preserving thee in holy secrecy,
A blessing to thy brother and thy race.
When, on the wide earth, every hope of safety
Seemed lost, we find it here restored by thee.

Now let thy soul incline to peace O, King!
Permit her to perform the holy rite
That shall remove the curse from our house,
And place upon my head our ancient crown.
Requite, by hospitality to me,
The blessings she has brought thee. Force and craft,
On which men pride themselves, are put to shame
By the ingenuous truth of this high soul;
And pure and childlike confidence rewards
Thy noble nature.

Iphigenia. Think upon thy promise,
And let thyself be influenced by these words
From lips sincere and true. Thou hast not often
An opportunity to do a deed
So noble. Thou canst not refuse us. Grant it.

Thoas. Then go.

Iphigenia. Not thus, my King. Without thy blessing,—
In anger—never will I part from thee.
Banish us not. Let hospitable laws
Prevail between us, that we may not be Forever separated. Dear and worthy,
As was my Father, so art thou to me.
This sentiment is rooted in my soul,
And should the meanest of thy people bring,
At any time, those accents to my ear,
To which I am accustomed from thy lips;
Let me but see your costume on the humblest,
And I will straight receive him as a God.
His couch I will myself prepare. My hands
Shall place for him a seat beside the hearth,
And I will fondly ask of thee and thine.
O! May the Gods the well-deserved reward
Of all thy deeds, and this, thy kindness, give.
Farewell! O! turn thyself, and give me back
One tender word at parting. Then more blandly
The wind will swell our sails, and the sad tear
Of separation soothe the eye it dims.
Farewell, and, as a pledge of our old friendship,
Give me thy hand.

Thoas.

Farewell!

PREFATORY REMARKS.

The following article was not written for publication, having been prepared only for a few friends who compose a Literary Club in Charleston, and the author has been prevented from even revising it for the press. It will be seen that his views do not go so far as those of many other able writers in the South; but regarding slavery as an existing institution, inwoven with the frame work of our social and political systems, the Messenger wishes to present the subject in every aspect. A few years since, as the author remarks, philanthropists in the South were busy with schemes for the amelioration of the condition of the slave. The late movements in the North, and elsewhere, have greatly checked these humane efforts. But this should not be so; for such evidences would strip our opponents of half their arguments. Though we can not concur with the writer in all his views, we heartily join with him in the liberal and enlightened sentiments which he expresses. Whilst we insist that the non-slaveholder has no right, politically or religiously, to interfere with the Institution of slavery among us, we do recognize our bounden duty to afford our dependents every means of moral and religious improvement. The author of the following review contends that our slaves should be taught to read and write. This is at present prohibited by law and we are not prepared to say that the policy of the Law should be changed; but a vast improvement may be effected by oral instruction, and we rejoice to know that this is extended to them, in an increasing degree, in many of the slave-holding States. In the town of Augusta, Georgia, a short time since, we saw persons zealously engaged in a sabbath school for slaves.

Were not our revilers and assailants culpably ignorant of the easy and comfortable lot of our slaves, of the humane feelings and sentiments of their masters towards them, and the efforts in progress for their improvement, which these, their pretended and misguided friends, do all in their power to repress and have greatly checked, they would be more just to us and more truly friendly to the negro. The following instance will illustrate their ignorance. We happened to be in M^t Vernon, Ohio, during the session of an Abolition Convention, and entered into conversation with a man who seemed to be a sort of leader in the assemblage. Amongst other strange things, he asserted that the people of the slave states felt so insecure, that they slept with loaded arms under their heads and by their beds. We avowed that we lived in a slave State, denied the truth of the assertion and maintained, that if any feeling of fear did exist, it had been recently produced by the interference of abolition and fanaticism. We had for years slept securely without any defensive precaution; had then travelled several thousand miles in Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee, without any kind of weapon, and scarcely thought of arms until we got into the guard-mounted mail coaches of Ohio.

Seeing the importance attached to the question of slavery in the Union, we shall use the influence of the Messenger to bring about a better understanding of the subject, hoping that more light will produce greater moderation and a more friendly spirit.—[Ed. Mess.]

SLAVERY IN THE FRENCH COLONIES.

Being a Review of a Report made to the Minister, Secretary of State, of the Marine and the Colonies, by a Commission instituted for the examination of the questions relating to Slavery and the Political Constitution of the Colonies. With two plans of emancipation, by the Duc de Broglie and M. De Tocqueville.

By SAMUEL HENRY DICKSON, M. D.

"Slavery," says Judge Carleton of Louisiana, "is a national evil which the Americans deeply deplore. It is against the spirit of their institutions and must have an end."

Mr. Black of Georgia, in his place in Congress, denies that slavery is, in any sense, an evil—and so I understand Mr. McDuffie and several others of the champions of the South.

Somewhere between these extremes of opinion lies the truth.

I hold with Judge Carleton, that slavery is an evil—but not in the ordinary or common-place view of the matter.

Poverty is an evil; slavery, as it exists among us, is a permanent and hopeless state of poverty. Dependence is an evil; slavery is a condition of necessary dependence. Enforced labor is an evil; slavery implies a continued series of enforced labor.

But the Judge is entirely in the wrong when he affirms slavery to be inconsistent with the "spirit of our institutions."

If the slave were, in any sense, on a level with his master, or capable of attaining such equality, there would be some ground for his assertion; but he knows that this doctrine—though incorporated in the Declaration of Independence—is untrue, and is steadily and indignantly denounced.

The minor is denied all political and many civil rights; because he is thought to be unfit to enjoy or exercise them. It is, perhaps, for the same reason that they are withheld from women. I hold, that they can never be accorded to the negro, precisely on that ground; that he is not and never can become adequate to their exercise, or fit for their enjoyment. Politically, then, he can never cease to be a slave, and his inferiority being stamped upon him by the hand of God himself, is a truth which cannot be inconsistent with any other truths. He is, politically, in no worse condition than a woman, or a child; and this is not dreamed to be inconsistent with our institutions, except by a few ranters, such as Fanny Wright and Owen—unworthy of notice or of reply.

The social evils, acknowledged above to be a part of the description of slavery, deserve our fullest and conscientious attention. Do they belong necessarily to its essence—can it exist without them,—it being put an end to, will they cease? Will Freedom remedy them? To all these questions I answer, unhesitatingly, in the negative.

Labor—notwithstanding all the pretty sentimentality with which it is spoken of in prose and poetry by the Childs, the Longfellows and the Everett,—Labor is a curse, and is every where felt to be so. But freemen work, at least white freemen, much harder than slaves. It is the price to be paid for improvement, for civilization. The savage works as little as possible—and to as little purpose as possible. The labor of the free man is ennobled by its object—its motive;—that of the slave can never be elevated by its purpose or its results. This constitutes the only difference between them;—and to this view, the whole history of the negro everywhere shows him to be totally insensible. To him, therefore, there will be nothing gained by a freedom which condemns him to longer and more difficult taskwork.

Dependence is an evil surely—both in itself and in its results; but it is only felt to be an evil among equals. Conscious inferiority seeks refuge in dependence, and the negro is everywhere and has at all times exhibited a profound consciousness of inferiority to the white man. The woman and the child are most happy in dependence.

Poverty is an evil. But if an agrarian division of comforts could take place all over the world, the Southern slave would be above the average point. He would not be so poor—so destitute of the means of living as the Red Indian, the dark Polynesian, Australian and Fuegian, or his free black brother of Dahomy or Ashantee.

Let us examine the condition of the free masses in merry England, as represented by Judge Carleton in the very paper from which I extracted the sentence placed at the beginning of this rude sketch. As to dependence, the arable acres of that beautiful and happy land, on touching whose shores the shackles of the slave fall from his limbs, are owned by 33,000 persons:—25,970,000 being tenants of the fraction. As to poverty, the average wages of those who can get work are 8s. 6d. per week—their food, potatoes and salt—wretchedness, rags and destitution the lot of about 20,000,000, who suffer daily the pangs of unsatisfied hunger.

As to labor, the free Englishman often "begs in vain for leave to toil"—and there never was known to any tribe of slaves, ancient or modern, labor so demoralizing,* so degrading,† so destructive to life or health,‡ so ill paid, so ill requited, as that which constitutes the every-day business of thousands in the workshops and collieries of this seat and centre of civilization. Fatal, then, would be the boon of freedom to the slave, if it reduced him to the level of the hand-loom weaver—the dry-grinder, or the collier. But can nothing be done to ameliorate his condition? Much may be done; but I confess that I do not see the least reason for the anticipation of a period when slavery shall cease to exist among us. Its abolition, if desirable, which I have already presented some reasons for doubting, and shall show more as we proceed, is obviously impossible—and, as Judge C. has said of its existence, "inconsistent with our institutions." Republicanism scarcely admits of the arrangement of distinction of castes otherwise than in the present form of master and slave. Equality—what is it? Nothing, unless it implies universal suffrage. It is uncertain how long it will allow of any distinctions at all—how long before democracy§ will run into radicalism; radicalism into political socialism and agrarianism.

Lord Morpeth might safely sit at Exeter next on the platform to a black L.L. D., applaud his eloquence and shake hands with him as a brother. The English Constitution secures him from the intrusion, political or social, of such kinsmen. But in South Carolina, when the black voters outnumber, as by a law of nature they soon would do, their pale opponents, we should have a black governor—not to speak of other equally awful incidents. Imagine the question brought before the English nobility and gentry in the shape which it presented to their colonists—an alternative of life and, (far worse than death,) enforced and intimate admixture with an inferior and degraded race;—imagine the possibility of a Hottentot Victoria—a mulatto Peel and a mustee Wellington! Human nature revolts at the thought; yet I have seen in a West India paper, edited by a fanatical white man,—a repentant sinner now I doubt not,—a paragraph exulting in the formation of a “tri-colored jury.” With St. Domingo and the English West Indies before their eyes—and aware, as they frankly assert, of the evil results of the movement in both these cases, the French Government, urged by the madness of the times, is about to make a third experiment of the same nature.

A friend has loaned me a copy of “a Report, (printed March, 1843,) made to the Minister Secretary of State, of the Marine and the Colonies; by a Commission instituted for the examination of the questions relative to Slavery and the Political Constitution of the Colonies.”

The Committee, consisting of 15 members, have reported decidedly in favor of the abolition of slavery and have presented two plans for the consideration of the government. The one, whose author is understood to be the Duc de Broglie, contemplates the “simultaneous and general” emancipation of the slaves held in bondage in the French colonies, after an interval of 10 years, the epoch being fixed in 1853. The second, from the pen of De Tocqueville, recommends an “emancipation partial and progressive,” to commence with the slave children born in 1838, and to include, gradually, various classes of the slave population until 20 years have elapsed, when slavery shall be absolutely abolished. The 10 years interval of the first, and the 20 years progress of the latter project, are to be devoted to a preparation of the slave for his approaching elevation and a gradual adaptation of the colonies to the great social and political change thus destined to be made in their condition.

The Report is an able paper—deserving of a more minute analysis and review than I have had time to give it. I have read it with much attention and interest and more astonishment at the singularly inconsistent admissions with which it abounds. It is full of important details; the subject is considered in all its relations. They seem fully aware of its difficulties, discuss them with much sagacity and ingenuity, and have reasoned as impartially upon it as was perhaps possible to Europeans in 1842.

The great error which runs through all their speculations is the assumption, that the negro, as a slave, is a fallen creature, degraded from some high estate by the contingency of slavery. But what is the condition of the African negro in his native home? He is there a savage; and like all savages,—J. J. Rousseau to the contrary notwithstanding,—in evil plight and full of misery. He is, then, and ever has been, by turn, a slave and a master. As a master, he is a ferocious tyrant;—as a slave, trodden to the dust. The horrors of the middle passage past, what does he lose by the change of residence which gives him a white despot in place of a black one. Or, suppose him as free as any other savage of Dahomy and Osphantee and suddenly transported into a slave hut in Martinique, or a negro house on the banks of the Santee or the Savannah! I will not doubt that much misery is inflicted here, but it is not to be measured by the Anglo-Saxon or European standard. Our imaginations dwell upon the lot of the impressed British sailor in that floating hell, a receiving ship, or during his long captivity at sea and his frequent transfers from one man-of-war to another, until he sinks under the sickness of heart which arises from hope deferred;—or a Dartmoor—an Olmutz—or perhaps a Siberia forces itself into our thoughts. We will pity the unhappy negro:—

“Nor wife, nor children, more shall he behold;
Nor friends, nor sacred home!”

His home!—what is home to the Foulah, or the Mandingo? It is an Englishman’s castle,—the heaven of many of the Caucasian race,—it must be much to the Hottentot. The hare returns to die in her form,—the foxes have holes and the birds of the air inhabit, with fond tenacity, the nest they have built. But his home in Africa was as insecure as the den of the wild beast he hunted;—there was no protection from the tyranny of the headman of his village, nor from the incursions of the neighboring tribe always at war with him. His wife and children! What is the woman of the savage any where but a domestic drudge? Mungo Park, in that pathetic story of his sufferings, and the relief afforded by two kind negroesses who took that pity on him which the gentler sex always delight to offer to the wretched, gives us the burden of the song which they sung, extempore, on the occasion, and which an English lady of high rank turned into pretty vernacular. I do not love her, or admire her verses the less, that she evidently misunderstood the meaning of the refrain which ran thus—

“Let us pity the white man—
“He has no mother to bring him milk,
“No wife to grind his corn.”

The redman of the American wilds would have comprehended the privation better than the Duchess of Devonshire. Having killed his game, he sends his wife to bring it home,—the corn with which it is eaten being planted, hoed, gathered and ground without his aid by her fair hands.

God hears even the young ravens when they cry; and man should turn a deaf ear to no moan or plaint which rises into the atmosphere. Wrong has been done to the negro by his enslavement—

let the white man wash his hands from the bloody guilt. Violence, injury and torture attend his transfer as a slave from one hemisphere to the other. Let all nations unite to put an end to the fiend-like cruelties of the traffic. But I repeat, I know not what the negro,—speaking of the mass, and of the present race emphatically,—has lost by the change: and it is this fundamental error of the Committee which requires special remark. The black savage, as the slave of the white man, has undergone a process of civilization,—imperfect it is true,—but obviously and inevitably an improvement in condition,—physically, intellectually, morally. He is taught something: be it more or less, it is clear gain,—he is fed, clothed and provided for. “Creature comforts,” as the Puritans called them, all unknown and unthought of by his dark ancestry, are his. He is no longer liable to be starved into cannibalism. He is, to-be-sure, forced to labor; but so he was in Africa, and so he will be, as we shall see, when he becomes what the Committee call (not ironically,) a “free man.” He enjoys a double protection,—that of law—unheard of by his progenitors and unintelligible to himself, and that of his master’s interest in him; not to mention that of a public opinion everywhere and daily becoming, in regard to this topic, more humane and enlightened.

As the Committee have taken for granted that the negro, enslaved, has become a degraded creature under the pressure of slavery, so they consistently enough assume that this pressure being once removed he will rise promptly, or in due time, to the level of his former condition, or to an equality with the white race. They have not ventured to be precise on this point. They do not discuss the question of the degree of his improvidence.* To get rid of present evil they dare the dangers of the untried future. They testify to the lapse of the Haytian, more and more notorious and shocking. They pronounce the English experiment a failure, and yet do not appear to have dreamed of the possibility of a similar result to their own contemplated projects. † That the negro, when emanci-

* They dwell, p. 309, upon the capricious dispositions of the negro—his unwillingness to labor as an agriculturalist whenever he has an alternative—his fondness for luxury and for gaming; yet they ascribe to him “providence and a promptness in learning to save money!”

† “In no country of the world,” say the Committee, p. 319, “does man work more than is required to satisfy his necessities, (besoins,) his tastes, (gouts,) his desires.” This may be true, for the desires of the civilized and educated man are illimitable—and of the poor man crushed by the weight of circumstances these few needs—though

“He wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long”— are not to be supplied by the most unremitting labor of which his frame is capable. But what savage does as much work as is required to satisfy his necessities? Not the negro, nor the Indian, nor the Arab. Improvidence is one pated, will retrograde, whether in a French or English Colony, is nevertheless certain. The black race is not civilizable per se, nor unless per force, sustained and controlled by their Caucasian superiors. On this theme let the abolitionists ponder. They assert that the negro is capable of educating himself, or, at least, will get along with such aid from us as a free man will and ought to receive. They must support the burden of proof: let us examine the testimony adduced. Hayti has emancipated herself, and England emancipated her colonies. The contingencies were favorable in these cases, especially the last; let us gather the history of the events in both from the Committee.

In St. Domingo, the negroes,—caring as little for the distant future as the Committee, or J. Q. Adams, or Garrison, or Dr. Channing,—having made themselves free, of course took holiday, and it was found necessary to force them to work. The first regulations for this purpose were mild and failed. The negroes did not understand or regard them, and said, “Commissaire Polverel (the author) li bête trop! li pas connai yen!”* Toussaint Louverture—the Hero of Miss Martineau’s “Hour and the Man,” Vainqueur des Anglais, as the Committee call him, Vainqueur des Mulâtres, as he is styled by one of his black panegyrists, “governed the colony very wisely, which, under him,” says Malenfant, “was flourishing. The whites were “happy and tranquil on their estates and the negroes worked.” And well might they work! “His code,” say the Committee, “was infinitely more rigorous than that of Polverel;” King Stork for King Log. But even this code, rigorous as it was, soon became a disregarded and forgotten form. “Toussaint simply instructed his inspectors, and they acted accordingly,” (en consequence.)† These inspectors were his own nephew Moses—and Dessalines “afterwards Emperor.” “These officers exercised over their subordinates an unlimited power—and all the declarations concerning in representing the system established as the “most arbitrary and despotic possible. The whip “was abolished; but they used without scruple the “cudgel and the roots of those plants which they “call in Hayti lianes (supple-jacks?). The sabre “and the musket were frequently employed,—nay, “they went so far as to bury men alive!”

They give a story of a pregnant woman beaten so severely by order of Dessalines that “abortion took place on the spot.” The most inflexible “rigor was employed against laziness, (paresse.)” From General Pamphile LaCroix, they quote as follows: “His two favorites,” Toussaint’s, Miss Martineau’s Man! “were Moses and Dessalines.

of the characteristics of the inferior races—and hence so large a proportion of the miseries which, according to travellers—Catlin, Murray, Park, Lander, Olin—they are destined to endure and sink under.

† p. 194.

"These two chiefs, naturally impetuous, were ill-humored and of difficult access. General D., above all, conversed with a savage and repulsive air. It was rare that he did not distribute blows of the cudgel to the chiefs of gangs when he inspected the works of a plantation. If any of them threw the blame of defective culture upon the laziness of the hands generally, he had one of them selected by lot to be hung. But if they indicated one (un cultivateur) by name, as a disputer, or sluggard—pour raisonneur, ou pour faîne-ant,—this cruel man in his rage, (ses emportements,) made them bury him alive and forced the whole gang to witness the agonies of his victim. One may conceive, that with such barbarous means ten new citizens, pretendus libres, should do as much work as thirty slaves formerly."*

The Committee speak favorably of Boyce's "Rural code for the republic of Hayti" in comparison with "ces codes informes, et sanguinaires, promulgués by Toussaint and by Christophe, and executed by Dessalines.† It was elaborated at leisure by a deliberative assembly composed exclusively of blacks and men of color. It makes two distinct classes,—la classe industrielle et la classe agricole. It forbids the latter to establish themselves in the towns or villages without express permission from the authorities; to bring up their children there without similar permission; to found new towns, villages, or 'bourgades,' by building their habitations in close proximity; to exercise any other profession than the culture of land, prohibiting especially boating and fishing; to open shops either wholesale or retail. Every laborer must be bound to some planter or proprietor: the engagement not to be for less than two years, nor to extend beyond nine. He must not quit his work unless by permission from his employer and the permit must not exceed eight days. Failing to bind himself as above, he is arrested, taken before a justice of peace, sent to a maison d'arret, and then to the public works." This is the freedom they have gained and preserve! Nothing is said of any advances in education or morals,—or any progress in the useful or refined arts.

As to British emancipation it is, not, perhaps, to be wondered at, that a French Committee should pronounce it a complete failure; "ce plan a complètement échoué."‡ The total absorption of all the resources of the colonist proprietor in capital and interest,—in the payment of the freed black, favored as he was by the Governor§,—in the great contest going on then, as everywhere else, between labor and capital, will, it is predicted,—and the documents bear out the prophecy,—produce, probably at no distant period, the absolute abandonment of the islands to the negroes "who, possessing neither capital, nor credit, nor industry, will end by

"relapsing into barbarism." It is well known, that Antigua and Barbadoes are exceptions to the seeming correctness of this dark picture. Antigua rejected the preliminary apprenticeship of the slaves and emancipated them at once; and loud have been the praises of the sagacity and humanity of her people. Great stress is laid, too, upon her continued tranquillity and prosperity, and the orderly and industrious conduct of her free blacks. But the Committee insinuate that the condition of things is not what it appears to be, and then go on to offer an explanation of the apparent exception presented here. "The Island of Antigua is very small; all the arable land is under cultivation, and the blacks could not find low-priced lots to purchase."* The density of population is comparatively prodigious, being 339 to a square mile, while that of Jamaica is only 76.† The whole number of blacks is stated at 30,000, (p. 156.) "Being forced to live then on the plantations, they were obliged to work for the planters and thus a reasonable scale of wages was arranged. Every where else, (except at Barbadoes where the circumstances were similar,) the negroes, much fewer in number, in proportion to the surface of land, left the plantations, scattering themselves about, and especially fixing themselves for dissipation sake in the neighborhood of towns and villages. Hence wages became high and the amount of labor uncertain, and the plantations failed to pay their expenses. At Barbadoes and Antigua, the Committee say emphatically, the labor of the free man, under the weight of a moral necessity, is more productive than that of the slave under restraint."‡ This is a strange use of the word moral; for by their own showing, the necessity is physical in the most absolute sense. The negro has no alternative,—he must work or starve promptly: Nay, they establish his unwillingness by proof positive. "The documents of the time," they say, and give references to these documents, "inform us that the first movement,—there as elsewhere,—was to abandon work in the fields,—to precipitate themselves into the towns,—to encounter all the mechanical trades; they lounged (rodaient) about the fishing places and gathered crabs or other eatables, rather than procure their bread by honest industry. It was only after some time, and under the pressure of circumstances above stated, that they decided on returning to the plantations."§ Moral, quotha! From one of the documents referred to, they give in a note,¶ the following extract. "Under slavery, doubtless, the manners were far from being regular; but the disgusting spectacle of vice never showed itself as now." The slaves were not under restraint. "No where in the colonies had I seen the streets covered with girls, or, to speak more correctly, with children speculating upon

"the physical advantages which nature has given them. I saw this for the first time at Antigua, "and I must avow that I saw it upon a great scale." This is the chosen spot where "the number of "ministers, of congregations of missionaries: the "number of churches, of chapels, of schools was "very considerable. Religious instruction and "education, properly so called, had received very "great developments; and, besides, the slave class "had enjoyed, by the liberality of their masters, "many of the privileges inherent in the condition "of freemen. Consulted by the Governor, the "principal congregations declared loudly that, to "their knowledge, the blacks were altogether in a "condition to use well the advantages of liberty."*

I must not be understood to say that the Committee are altogether blind to the dangers of immediate disorder upon the removal of the restraints of slavery. Against many of these they have provided sagaciously—against others they have made no efficient provision. Although they remark that "the nature of men is not to be changed by the stroke of a wand," yet they calculate, with unreasoning confidence, on the tendency of things to improve when they have removed the condition in which they imagine themselves to have detected the source of all the evils before their eyes. Freedom they hope will cure the vices of the slave. The negro they assume to be, in his native State, virtue itself. Yet, with some inconsistency, they tell us that they anticipate some difficulty from the deficiency of religious cultivation of the slaves in the French West Indies. They tell us that religion is exceedingly neglected among the negroes. They give the proportion of 2,500 souls, or near it, to every Priest,—and these, they affirm, are not only less numerous than they should be, but have been by no means well selected or well fitted for the posts they occupy. They comment with some force upon the peculiar and valuable aid which the British Governor derived from the clergy and from their influence over the negroes.

In both the projets de loi presented, it will be seen that the negro,—during his preparation for what the Committee, not ironically, call freedom, and after his emancipation,—is to be subjected to numerous and somewhat close restrictions; the wisdom of which I neither deny nor doubt. He is constrained to labor. The means of constraint are not detailed. The whip will of course be abolished as in Hayti,—it is too horrible to think of. Will they, too, substitute the milder means of fetters, stocks, supple-jacks, clubs, sabres, muskets—burial alive?

Care is to be taken that the price of vacant lands shall be made too high to admit of the negro becoming a purchaser. He must engage himself with some planter, or proprietor, in order that his labor may be made continuously productive of the great West

Indian staples—sugar and coffee. He must remain in the island where he is made free. The price of his labor—his wages—must be arranged for him. The manner of payment, in money or produce, will be dictated to him. His hours of labor are fixed by law. He must go to school and to church, according to law.

Titre II. A. 22. To each slave contracting marriage with a slave shall be allowed 100 francs, to be placed in a "savings' bank," (à la caisse d'épargne,) when it shall bear interest to their joint account. They cannot draw it without authority from the public minister.

- A. 23. Every slave shall be allowed to purchase his freedom; if the price be disputed, it shall be referred to the judge royal, who shall appoint arbitrators—des experts.

29. The mode of ascertaining incapacity for labor and of carrying into effect A. 27 shall be ordained by law.

Farther details are very much the same as in the plan of the majority.

I have taken occasion to declare my belief, that the abolition of slavery,—the emancipation of slaves,—is, in our own country, neither possible, nor desirable. I have also said that I do not doubt that much may be done to ameliorate their condition: the time has come, I am persuaded, when it is both our interest and duty to make every effort for the purpose. The wheels of civilization cannot stand still, and the slave forms so large a portion of our community, that, unless we provide for his participation in its advances, our share in the benefits it is capable of bringing with it must be small indeed. Twenty years ago, the attention of Southern philanthropists was strongly drawn to this matter; but they were driven back, alarmed, silenced, stunned by the ignorant and reckless interference of the noisy throng of fanatical abolitionists. The iron fetters which had not long fallen from the arms of the white European, had begun to hang loosely on the limbs of the American negro; the thick clouds of ignorance which had not yet ceased to bedim the most enlightened portions of the free globe were beginning to break away above the slave masses and let in some shining gleams of knowledge, of religion, of morality. Their fetters were rivetted once more, and the deep darkness from which they were about to emerge, rendered doubly profound for a time, by the wicked intermeddling of those who, like Lord Sydenham of recent but hateful memory, exulted in the prospect of a bloody insurrection and a hopeless and purposeless servile war.

But it is neither rational nor manly to allow ourselves to be influenced unduly by the fears thus excited. We cannot be deaf to the loud voice of public opinion resounding from every quarter of the world. We must listen to it, and reply—and act as justice and prudence shall dictate. Even China has been bombarded out of her vis inertiae in commercial affairs; but it is to be hoped that the Southern slave-holder will need no other inducement than his own sense of right and natural humanity to urge him forward in the great purpose of promoting the greatest happiness of the greatest number of the human beings under his care and control. Let us first remove all the impediments which are placed by law in the way of the instruction of the slave. I do not know how far his education may be carried consistently with the proper performance of the duties of the station which Providence has assigned him in the social scale; but I trust that in another generation a much larger proportion of the negro slaves of South Carolina may be found able to read their Bibles,* than now of the free whites of Mississippi. This is set down at one-fifteenth,—I know not how correctly,—in the late message of the Ex-Governor of that State.

Humanity next demands from us some restriction upon the traffic in slaves among ourselves. The wanton or capricious, resentful or penal sale of the negro,—the disruption of all ties of affection or consanguinity at the will of the thoughtless, unfeeling, or angry owner, should be put an end to. This might be well done, it seems to me, by the appointment in every district of respectable commissioners, themselves slave-holders, who should have jurisdiction over this matter and who, in the performance of their duties, could readily give a powerful sanction to the invaluablely beneficent—nay, sacred institution of marriage.

There are few points on which Spain or Spaniards may be referred to as presenting any examples worthy of modern imitation. The Committee give a pleasant picture of slavery in the Spanish colonies,—not exactly corresponding with Abbott's it is true, but on the whole, it is probable, not very far from a correct one. "The Spanish slave," they tell us,* "may become a proprietor; he may purchase his freedom—at a regulated rate and by little and little;—he may force his master, if malcontent, to sell him, if he can find a purchaser, at a fair price, fixed by authority;—he may work when and where he pleases, provided he pays a definite amount of wages punctually." We are not surprised to learn,† "that during all the civil troubles, these slaves remained faithful to their owners and quiet. In South America, though the revolutionary party offered them their freedom, they followed the fortunes of their masters on the field of battle and in emigration. In St. Domingo, they remained perfectly peaceable until conquered by the republic of Hayti in 1820, (from 1794, a period of 26 years)."

I would accord the slave the privilege of owning certain kinds of property and of purchasing his freedom under definite regulations. There is no danger in the removal of the present restraints as to this mode of individual emancipation. We shall always have a sufficient number of slaves here. The negro is proverbially fertile and he will always be so in a favorable climate and in the state of bondage. He is thus kept at that point,—above destitution and below luxury, or full living,—which, by a law of nature, is found best adapted for the propagation of the species and its rapid increase and multiplication.

I am not so clear as to his enjoyment of another privilege above mentioned—that of paying a certain rate of wages when discontented with personal servitude, or with the mode of occupation allotted him by his master. It is obvious that this would be inconsistent with the due management of a plantation, yet it might be introduced into the cities and answer a good purpose among town laborers, house servants and mechanics.

* Increasing attention is now given to the moral and religious improvement of slaves in the South. Though not taught to read their Bibles, much instruction is imparted to them, and the efforts of the various sects are directed more immediately towards them. Bishop Gadsden reported to the last convention of S. Carolina that he had, during the past year, confirmed 313 persons, of whom 151 were colored, nearly one half. Other denominations annually receive probably a much larger number.—[Ed. Mess.

‡ Doctor Cartwright of Natchez, in an able article in the Southern Quarterly Review, "Canaan identified with Ethiopia," adduces some remarkable examples of the fidelity of our slaves during the Revolution. Such as were seduced found their British allies more cruel than their masters could possibly have been. The Doctor argues very strongly to show that the enlightened—Sydenhamian schemes of exciting our slaves to rebellion, in case of war, is impracticable.—[Ed. Mess.

THE COTTAGE.

I.

The day din was past, night had hushed up the breeze,
 Afar o'er the hills the church bells were chiming,
 I found a lone cottage, 'twas hid in the trees,
 And the wild-rose and vine o'er its lattice were climbing.
 Methought, as I gazed on the flowers so fair,
 If earth has a spot that is lovely, 'tis there!

II.

I paused at the threshold—I heard a soft lyre,
 Indeed it seemed "touched by a Fairy's light finger,"
 A voice like an Angel's completed the choir
 Whose tones on my memory forever shall linger.
 Methought, as the harmony swelled on the air,
 If the music of Heaven finds earth, it is there!

III.

Time's wing flew so softly I knew not it stirred,
 But the moon was on high and the dew drop did glisten,
 Though Time, too, had tarried, I am sure, had he heard,
 For the stars of the azure seemed pausing to listen.
 Methought, for this cot was no home for old care,
 If there's love on this earth, it surely is there!

THE BETRAYED.

The chamois slumbered, for the chase was done.
Mrs. Hemans.

I.

Alas! thy only hope of peaceful rest
 From man's relentless, eager, hot pursuit,
 The only moment when thy heaving breast
 Can calmly breathe, or when the murderous bruit
 No more assails thee of the huntsman's quest;
 When thou canst seek the scanty herb or fruit,
 Or lave thee in the streamlet gliding by,
 Is when the stars are lit up in the sky.

II.

Soon as Aurora opens the gates of morn
 And Sol's bright chariot flashes in the East,
 The huntsman wakes thee with his direful horn
 Rousing new terrors in thy trembling breast.
 Soft Pity's tear is dashed away with scorn,
 Thy timid flight but gives the greater zest
 To the fierce chase: the welkin rings afar
 With the loud shouts of the unequal war.

III.

Then haste thee, chamois, to the craggy steep,
 Plant thy firm footsteps on the slippery rock,
 Nerve thy young sinews for the dreadful leap,
 Bound, bound away! thou art singled from the flock,
 Thy comrades all have lightly cleared the deep
 And threatening chasm: dost thou stand to mock
 Thy fell pursuers? haste thee to the glen;
 Knowest thou thy foes? They are ruthless—they are men!

IV.

When was man ever known to hold his hand,
 Though innocence itself a prayer preferred?
 Alas! his "justice" is the flaming brand;
 His tender mercy, the death-doing sword,
 Or desolation stalking through the land!
 His love—nay name it not, 'tis but a word!
 A word, which those who trust it, find, too late,
 Might be another term for deadly hate.

V.

'Tis thus with thee, thou lone and drooping one,
 From whose pale cheek the rose of health has fled,
 From whose dark eye the light of hope is gone,
 Whose heart with secret anguish long has bled,
 Whose form, which once with youth and beauty shone,
 Now lingers on the confines of the dead!
 And marvel we how any thing so fair
 Should be so wretched?—Man's love has been there!

VI.

He sought her in her own sweet, quiet home,
 Ere yet her guileless heart had dreamt of ill,
 When innocent and fearless she could roam
 Through the cool woods, or by the mossy rill
 Thrown by a pebble into mimic foam,
 Or gliding smoothly onward, calm and still,
 Or murmuring its soft music to her ear:
 And she rejoiced the gurgling sounds to hear.

VII.

He wooed her, and she listened to his voice,
 Nor thought kind words were formed but to betray.
 Oh! how his accents made her heart rejoice,
 How swift, with him, the bright days passed away!
 When he was absent how each trifling noise
 Would startle her, while wondering at his stay
 And looking anxiously for that sweet hour
 When he would meet her 'neath the rosy bower.

VIII.

And she was lovely then as summer eve,
 Or a young rose-bud bursting into bloom.
 'Tis faded now! her heart hath learnt to grieve,
 And love's bright day is overcast with gloom.
 Could she believe young love was born to leave
 In desolation, like the dread Simoom,
 Whate'er it touched? or that his joyous kiss
 Could e'er be fraught with misery, such as this?

IX.

She was deceived. Alas! I know not how
 Her gentle spirit brooked the dreadful change!
 It killed her not—but on her marble brow
 The trace is left of conflict deep and strange.
 And in her bosom, gentle then and now,
 Scarcely can she her troubled thoughts arrange:
 She curses not the author of her fate:
 'Tis man's, not woman's love that turns to hate!

X.

The chamois slumbers when the chase is done,
 And hunters' horns are heard no more around.
 Thou, too, may'st slumber when thy day is gone
 And thou art laid beneath the grassy mound;
 But not till then will peace to thee be known;
 The treasure thou hast lost can ne'er be found
 On earth: then hasten with thy tears to Heaven,
 For there thy guiltless fault is all forgiven!

THE PRIZE TALE.

Mrs. B. B. Minor.

STEPHANO COLONNA, OR LOVE AND LORE.

A TALE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER I.

"Yet what so gay as Venice? Every gale
Breathed heavenly music! and who flocked not thither
To celebrate her nuptials with the sea?"

A day of brilliant sunshine had dawned on the wave-washed palaces of beautiful Venice. Though it was but the early morning hour, the activity of movement and busy preparation which precede great events, were every where discernible.

The gondoliers were unfolding and festooning the gorgeous curtains and draperies of their graceful barges, removing with careful hand every speck of lint or dust which marred their rich coloring, or clung to their costly folds. The fisherman had cleansed his ruder boat and spread his white sail; but why sat he idly in his holiday suit at her prow? Any other day would have found him far out on the blue sea,—but to-day the finny tribe cut the bright waves in safety; the treacherous net hung dry on the walls of the spoiler's hut.

Near four centuries before, when the proud and tyrannical Frederick Barbarossa threatened to plant his eagles before the portals of St. Mark, unless his enemy, Pope Alexander III., was given up to his power, the generous Venetians, who had espoused the cause of their spiritual father, sallied forth to meet the invader, conquered his fleet, and made Otto, his son, prisoner. The grateful Alexander went to greet the victors, and, as soon as the Doge Sebastiano Ziani landed, presented him with a golden ring saying:

"Take this ring, and with it take, on my authority, the sea as your subject. Every year on the return of this happy day, you and your successors shall make known to all posterity that the right of conquest has subjugated the Adriatic to Venice, as a spouse to her husband." This singular marriage was annually celebrated on the feast of Ascension for centuries afterwards.

To-day was the anniversary of this event; as the hour of noon advanced, the hush of anxious expectation pervaded the busy groups crowded on the bridges and steps of the palaces. The golden Bucentaur glittering with gems beneath a cloudless heaven, with its gorgeous drapery and cushions of purple, crimson and cloth of gold, lay gently rocking at the foot of the marble stairs of the magnificent Gothic palace of the Doge.

The clock of St. Mark's Church struck the hour of twelve; a shout rent the air, the heavy doors of the Ducal palace opened, and the Doge, in regal robes, with his train, stood at the head of the stairs.

At the shout other palace doors unclosed and poured forth their crowds of rank, youth and beauty. Augustino Barbarigo descended the steps and entered the galley, the gondoliers bent to their oars, and the beautiful barge shot down the canal amidst joyous shouts and inspiring music.

Other gondolas and boats hastened to follow according to their owners' rank, Venetians and strangers, from those whose names were enrolled in the golden volume, to the third order of nobility. Thus they proceeded to the ancient church of San Nicolo.

Amongst the magnificent gondolas displayed on this occasion, was one scarcely less rich in its decorations than that of State. Its gilded prow glittered in the sunbeams, the heavy curtains of violet velvet and golden tissue were gracefully folded and festooned to the slender gilded pillars which supported a canopy of the same rich material, wrought with golden stars. In the centre of each star blazed a costly gem.

The skill and power of the gondolier attracted as much attention as the richness of the gondola. The slender oars bent beneath his hands as the boat dashed through the water, sending it curling and foaming around the prow. It seemed to be with difficulty that he was kept in his place and prevented from preceding even the Bucentaur.

It was the gondola of Prince Azzo D'Este of Ferrara. Reclining on the soft cushions within, by his side, his beautiful daughter, the youthful princess Leonore, watched with an animated countenance the new and brilliant scene.

Close by the side of this boat was another which seemed to hover about its companion with intense life-like interest. It belonged to Stephano Colonna, a young nobleman of Rome. It was not so gorgeous as that of Ferrara, but strikingly beautiful. It was larger far than the other, yet seemed to float over the bright waters without an effort of its muscular propeller, so uniform and steady were his motions. Its azure curtains of softest silk fluttered out on the breeze, showing, now and then, the pure alabaster columns which supported the canopy. The young nobleman was the sole representative of his illustrious house, present on this occasion, and sat alone in the gondola.

The Bucentaur reached the church, and the Doge with his council and the premier nobles entered; they were followed by the illustrious among the strangers, whilst the crowd waited without. Having heard mass, they reentered the galley and gondolas, and swept out to the Adriatic, leaving the city and verdure-dotted lagoon still and quiet behind them. On they floated, whilst music and cheering filled the free balmy air, for one breath of which so many pined, locked in the loathsome dungeons of that beauteous and proud city. But who remembered that Venice had prisons and bleeding hearts in this hour! All such were forgotten, even though the fearful "Ten" were in their midst on the gilded decks of the Bucentaur.

They were in the open sea, all was still, the gondolas and boats formed a line around, a short distance from the state galley. The rich Ducal bonnet was laid aside, and Augustino stood uncovered. The archbishop blessed the ring, and presenting it to him, bade him "remember a ship was his best palace, and charge Venice to respect it, and preserve her title of Queen of the sea!" The princely bridegroom received the ring, and gracefully leaning over the side of the vessel, dropped it into the sea, saying:

"We wed thee with this ring in token of our true and perpetual sovereignty."

As the glittering bauble sunk into the blue and dancing waters, a triumphant shout broke the silence. The hitherto immoveable line of boats wavered, and separating darted hither and thither in anxious preparation for the coming sports. There, two gondolas shot off in a race, and others followed in their wake; the quays, too, became scenes of uproarious mirth, whilst the Bucentaur and gondolas of the nobility swept slowly back to the city. On their return, the gondola of Colonna still rode next that of Ferrara. The place was first assigned him according to his rank, but he now preserved it through preference. Nor was its gondolier's power and skill untaxed to keep this position. Many young cavaliers looked with worshipping eyes on the youthful Princess Leonore, the praises of whose beauty filled every court in Italy, and were struggling to gain the side of her gondola that they might enjoy the sight of her beauty. Colonna had heard full many a time of the loveliness of this daughter of D'Este, the enemy of his house, and listened to her praises with that bitterness of soul which hereditary feuds always engender. He saw her to-day for the first time, and with every glimpse of that radiant and innocent face and every glance of those bright speaking eyes, some evil feeling, some harsh thought fled, till not one remained to guard him from the fatal power of her charms, and he felt his proud heart yielding to passionate love for one he had been taught to hate.

They were still in the sea, and the superiority of Colonna's boat and gondolier enabled him to keep precedence of the others. Before they could reach the city, there was a narrow channel between two islands of the lagune, which could be entered but by two gondolas at a time, and the contest was now which should enter with Prince Azzo's. Colonna's was still some feet ahead of the others. Looking back he saw a dark gondola, whose prow almost touched the stern of his own.

"Slacken not thy speed, Baptista, or that swarthy boatman behind us will pass."

A disdainful glance at the boat pointed out was the gondolier's only notice of this caution, as he bent lower over his oars. The boat following so rapidly and eagerly was black, the usual color of the gondolas of the city, but longer and narrower and smooth and polished as the finest ebony. The hangings and cushions were velvet of the deepest crimson. Within the pavilion sat a cavalier whose features were strikingly handsome, but of dark complexion and sinister countenance. His hair and eyes were very black, and the latter fierce in expression; his finely chiselled lips were now firmly compressed and his high brow contracted. A deep flush burned on his cheek, as he said:

"Wilt thou not pass, Franco? By St. Mark, I'll hurl thee into the sea and take the oars myself, if yon gondolier reaches the pass before you."

The boatman answered not, but his brow grew darker than his master's at this threat, and he strained to his oars, till every muscle in his brawny arm stood out. But a few rods lay between the foremost boats and the channel, and Eccelino starting up, seemed about to put his threat into execution, when one of Baptista's oars snapped in twain. The gondola quivered and slackened speed on the instant, and with a triumphant cry Franco shot forward, whilst a curse burst from Baptista's lips. A shade of chagrin passed over Stephano's face at Eccelino's smile of triumph as the gondola flew by. But before Franco reached the channel where Prince Azzo's boat had already entered, Baptista recovered from the shock, and seizing another oar darted by, jostling Eccelino's gondola and almost throwing Franco into the foaming waters he left in his wake. Franco threw down his oars with a cry of despair. "Wilt thou let the others pass, miscreant? bend to thy oars!" and with an angry countenance Eccelino sank back on the cushions.

Leonore and the prince had been no inattentive spectators of this scene, and whilst it gratified the pride of both, a different feeling was mingled with it in the breast of each. The calm dignity which blended with the noble and manly beauty of Stephano's face, and the passionate glances he cast on her stirred gentler emotions in the maiden's heart. But though Prince Azzo exulted in this tribute to the charms of his only and idolized child, he seemed angry at the proximity, which to him bore the appearance of presumption, of one he so much hated, for he had recognized the armoial bearings of the house of Colonna, embroidered on the curtains of the pavilion in which Stephano sat. With the Count Eccelino neither sympathized. His atrocious character made him an object of dislike which his being a Ghibeline did not tend to lessen. In this order the gondolas reached the city, for 'twas vain for the others to attempt to pass Stephano's; they were slowly sailing through the channel whilst Azzo's and Colonna's boats rapidly entered the Rio Palazzo on which were the palaces where they dwelt whilst in Venice. D'Este was a guest of the Doge, and Colonna of the illustrious and ancient house of Contarini.

CHAPTER II.

The family of D'Este was one of the noblest in all Italy; the head of the Guelf or church party for centuries, and the protectors, and patrons of literature and science from their earliest rise. It was also the founder of a regal race. The heiress of the last of the Dukes of Bavaria married a younger son of the house of D'Este. The family name of these dukes was Guelf, and their descendants were the founders of the second line of Guelfs, the ancestors of the house of Brunswick, the sovereigns of England.

Colonna was also of an illustrious house, and though Guelfs, there was not that intimacy between these two great families, which might be supposed to exist; for Italy was at that time torn by a myriad of petty feuds, intrigues and jealousies; and the names Guelf and Ghibeline were applied indiscriminately to the opposing factions of every contest, though these seldom related to the struggle of the church or papal party and the German Emperor, for sovereignty in the States. These names were once the distinction of these two parties, so long and violently opposed to each other; but, at length, they became arbitrary and Guelfs were Ghibelines, and Ghibelines Guelfs, as inclination or policy dictated.

The D'Estes were of the rural nobility of the Lombard, and were one of the few houses that never submitted to any of the numerous cities which held control over the Italian nobility during the 12th, 13th and 14th centuries. But during the latter part of the 15th century, the time of this story, Venice had obtained jurisdiction over their possessions, though they were still rich and powerful, masters of large estates on the south of the Po and lords of the cities of Padua and Ferrara, and honored by that city which made all her slaves.

The Colonnas were of the nobility of the Imperial City, and a petty jealousy had arisen between them and the house of D'Este, which time had served to strengthen.

Several of the Colonna family had been Cardinals, and one Pope, under the name of Martin V., a bold and wicked man.

The house of D'Este had ever befriended and assisted the Popes in many difficulties, but being farther from the seat of power than the Colonnas, emoluments did not reward them so frequently as they thought merited, and it was galling to see their enemies so often preferred. The policy of the Roman Bishops was often much perplexed to reconcile its preferences between these families. They could not pass over the Colonnas at their very door, and it was easier to pacify and lull to sleep the suspicions of the D'Estes, who were more distant. For their bickerings they cared not, so their own ends of aggrandizement and avarice were served.

In these days, literature, the arts and sciences were awaking from their long slumber during the darkness of the middle ages, and this their dawn was like that of Italia's morning, beautiful and glorious with renovated life.

In Florence, the Medici had nourished the revival and awakening of those beautiful dreams of the soul, Sculpture, Painting and Poetry. Ferrara had Ariosto and many gifted ones among the stars of her court, and throughout Italy men of Letters and Artists were patronised by the nobles.

In Rome, they were not so often found, as the church was ever jealous of their influence in the enlightening of men's minds, till Pope Leo X. made it a part of his policy to collect the wisdom and genius of the age at his court, and thus render them subservient to the power of the church.

On account of this peculiar state of things, the Roman nobles were less the patrons of learning than those of any other city. The D'Estes, having always been the patrons of such, looked with contempt on these nobles, which they took greater pleasure in evincing, as their rivals, the Colonnas, were among them. But the young Stephano had long been the friend and seeker of learning, and through his influence his father's palace was the resort of all the men of science who visited Rome, and they were many; for the associations which hallowed her crumbling walls were powerful in their attraction to those who communed with the spirits of departed greatness, and many were the high dreams and aspirations that were afterwards triumphantly realized, which the contemplation and recollections of Rome's monuments of the past, and of her master spirits, called forth.

Stephano had come with other nobles from all parts of Italy to partake of the festivities and rejoicings of the Venetians on this anniversary of their proudest day. A week passed, and many had gone, but Stephano still lingered: the festivities continued, and Leonore D'Este was still within Venice. This young princess inherited the love of her house for literature, and had devoted her short life to the pursuit of knowledge. Nor was she content with things revealed. All the wild dreams and magic powers to which so many in that age gave credence were invested with something of interest to her. She was but on the verge of womanhood—that sweet time when the golden visions of youth still remain in the heart, fresh and beautiful, but deepened in their vivid colorings by their blending with the stronger tints, which, in after years, envelope the first in shadow. Her exceeding loveliness was heightened by the thoughtfulness which her communings with higher natures had imparted to the freshness of her youthful and radiant face: her large bright eyes seemed to be gazing with earnest scrutiny into the unknown realms of thought and fancy; and her musings were of a nobler and purer life. Her heart trembled with all generous and deep emotions, and the beautiful language of kindness dwelt ever on her tongue. The beautiful in nature and art thrilled her spirit with ecstasy. Stephano saw his own heart mirrored on her lovely countenance, whilst she looked into his ardent eyes and met the reflection of her soul. "What recked their souls of strife between their fathers?"

* * * *

Night had spread her mantle over Venice, but she reigned here a goddess, and with her robe glittering with stars, looked down from her high throne on the sons and daughters of pleasure, that made her solemn hours but chroniclers of revelry and crime.

Why beamed the silver crescent on her brow brightest here, where grief and guilt were deepest, darkest!—To lure by the glory that encompassed her some spirit not yet dead to holier influences from its path of vice; to cheer some child of sorrow with the brightness that a cruel world denied; to wake a thrilling dream, which should find voice in magic words, within the passionate heart of some child of song; to send her starry beams of light as messengers of mercy within the prisons' iron bars, where darkness had her home, and bid the life-weary one look up to heaven.

All these breathed beneath her, but few, few, heeded her silent warnings and appeals. St. Mark's place echoed with the tread of thousands: here, the juggler played his tricks—there, the wily Jew was busy over some cunning trade; masquers glided by, and men of every nation here met face to face. But see yon gorgeous crowd,—they throng up the "giant stairs" which lead into the Ducal palace; it blazes with light, and music breathes around. Enter:—within those ancient halls the wealth, rank, beauty and talent of Italy are congregated. Pause within this hall, where portraits of this proud city's doges line the walls. Many of these have passed with aching hearts beneath this tattered ceiling rich with gold. See here Foscari; ah! his is a tale to curdle the warm blood; and there Dandolo; and this vacant frame,—where hangs the sable veil with the short but fearful sentence! * Pass on—to scenes of life and mirth. Here in this princely hall, take thy stand. Here are Ariosto, Dante, Lorenzo Di Medici and Fabricio, not less famed for his magic and the influence he exerted by its means, than were the others for genius and learning. Here also are the rich and powerful stained with the deepest dyes of vice. Chief

* This was the place which should have been occupied by the portrait of Marino Faliro, who was beheaded for engaging in a conspiracy against the state. On a black veil, in the frame, was inscribed the sentence,

"Hic est locus Marini Feletro decapitati pro criminibus."

among these is Eccelino Di Romagno, Lord of Verona and many cities north of Venice. We have seen him before, on the bridal day, contending with Stephano for the station by Prince Azzo's gondola.

But it is with Eccelino and Fabricio we have now to deal. They stood together at the end of the hall by a door which lead to a balcony beyond.

A youth and maiden, separating from the crowd, passed them and entered the balcony.

"It is she again!" said Eccelino. "Ha! dost thou know her, Fabricio? she smiled on you with an air of recognition as they passed."

"It is Leonore D'Este, the daughter of Prince Azzo of Ferrara."

"Yes, yes; though I knew not, till within this week, that the cursed Guelf had so rare a jewel in his casket,—but where and how didst thou know her, Fabricio!"

"I have seen her at many courts, Count, which ring with her praise."

"Aye, well they may; such a gem would be brighter far with the setting Eccelino Di Romagno could bestow than hiding in the gloomy palace of the old Prince; thinkest thou not so, Fabricio!"

"There is nought of gloom in Prince Azzo's palace, and the Princess would make darkness light."

"True, most true; therefore, would I have her in my own home, for gloomy enough am I there at times, and then to win her from Prince Azzo,—she is an only daughter I think!"

"Yes, an only child."

"And the cavalier with her!"

"Stephano Colonna of Rome."

"Ah! a Guelf; but, if I mistake not, an enemy of the Prince!"

"Yes, the families have been enemies for ages."

"Tell me, Fabricio, more of this maid."

"Well, she is most beautiful"—

"That I can see."

"And proud?"

"That also."

"By St. Mark, my information is needless."

"Nay, what's her disposition, what her weakness, the point, good Fabricio, by which she is most assailable?"

"Ah! softly, my good Count, thou art for intrigue; how knowest thou I will tell thee all thou wishest?"

"This bag may contain a golden key wherewith to open thy mouth, do what I wish and it shall weigh more."

"Tis well,—she is a dreamer, a believer in arts,—a worshipper of magic, alchemy and astrology."

"Ah!—then, Fabricio, I shall have more need of thee; she must be mine."

"The council of Ten would speak with the Count Eccelino," said a low deep-toned voice at his elbow. Eccelino started, but quickly recovering himself followed his summoner. The council sat on an elevated seat prepared for them around the Doge:—occasionally, one by one, they mingled with the crowd. Those men of iron hearts and dark deeds, reposing on cushions of velvet amidst light and mirth and music, presented a curious spectacle. Their keen eyes singling out future victims for death, or to satisfy their avarice, they seemed like a crowd of harpies on the top of a sun-lighted mountain, glaring down on the unsuspecting flocks beneath them. Eccelino stood before them.

"The State has need of your assistance, most noble Count Eccelino," said Count Gian, the chief of the Ten.

"I shall be most happy to render it, most worthy Count Gian; how may it be done?"

"The State would borrow from thy overflowing coffers, generous Eccelino, the means to assist in paying her annual tribute of ten thousand ducats to the Turks."

"My coffers are at the service of the State, and I render them the more willingly, as I now stand in need of her aid. I lend my gold for her influence in my favor," was the courteous and wily reply.

The council of Ten glanced hastily with looks of surprise at each other,—after a moment Gian said:

"We would know how the State can assist the most noble Count Eccelino, in return for his generosity."

"The Prince Azzo D' Este has a daughter, I would make her my wife," was the bold answer.

"And why seeks not Count Eccelino the maiden's hand of her father?"

"Count Gian forgets that a Ghibeline may not sue for favors from a Guelph."

"True, most true, thou hast spoken well; but how shall the State serve thee in this, Eccelino. We have no right to bestow the hand of the Princess in marriage."

"I can place facts in your hands that will give the Princess up to your power."

"Do this, and the maid is thine; but remember, D' Este is powerful and in high favor with our Doge."

"Who is himself subject to the council of Ten," said the Count with a smile. "The Doge is a friend to Prince Azzo—if I make it his interest to assist me, can he not exert his influence over the Prince?"

The council assented and renewed their promise, and Eccelino bowed and left them, whilst a sardonic smile curled his lip as he rejoined Fabricio, who had kept his station by the door with folded arms and in silence. An evil light burned in the Count's eye; he was at his fitting work, intrigue and vice.

"Have Colonna and the Princess returned?"

"No, they stand alone on the balcony!"

Yes, they stood alone on the balcony, happy in innocence and the consciousness of being loved. The hall and balcony were in the second story of the palace, and thence could be seen the blue lagoon dotted with white sails, or dark gondolas flitting like swift arrows across the flood of light the full moon cast on the waters, and then suddenly lost to view behind some island, or by darting into one of the thousand canals of Venice. A few bright stars held their course through the heavens, scorning to veil their radiance even beside Italia's queen of the night.

"I would we were in Rome to night, sweet Leonore, that I might guide thy steps 'mid the ruins of our coliseum, or the silent aisles of our time-hallowed temples. What spirits of the past would rise up before us in that still and lonely amphitheatre, once echoing with the cry of despair and the shout of victory! what fervent prayers fill our hearts before those altars where thousands have worshipped! I have seen yon moon look down from the "ruins of her palace in the clouds" on those of earth with something like sorrow in her subdued light. Oh! that we were there, free to commune with such influences and our own hearts!"

"Nay, Stephano, I should love thee less. Knowest thou not that the mighty spells of the past, and the high dreams a night and heaven like this awaken woo and win me from earth? I would give even thy love to comprehend and commune with all for which my spirit yearns, and which is partially revealed to me, but alas! just enough to fill the heart with restless longings. There are spirit voices which whisper often to me of a higher destiny. Oh! to know and feel all of which I have but vague dreams, I would bind myself to dwell ever alone, and leave love to those who cannot partake of a more exalted happiness."

"Leonore—Leonore."

"Nay, Stephano, reproach me not; I can never find that for which I seek; your spirit is nearest mine own, and I yield my heart to thee, to love thee utterly, fervently, with all the worship I have bestowed on my dreams,—but you, Stephano, you have felt these yearnings, and know how hard they are to repress."

"Yes, Leonore, and we may one day find what we seek, but now let us love, this is our happiness, and is it not full and complete as aught of which you have dreamed, mine own?"

"Too much there is of happiness in it, Stephano, for long continuance,—you forget the old and settled hostility of our fathers."

A dark shade passed over Stephano's brow, but after a few moments he said—"At least, we will hope; your father is just and generous"—

"But implacable to foes; beside, could I go an unwelcome bride to a Colonna's home?"

"My father will not thwart my wishes, my own love; and when all means have been tried and fail with the Prince, then, Leonore, I can but trust to the strength of your love, and may I not safely?"

"Forever.—I am thine ever and only, Stephano."

As the youth pressed her to his breast, a voice deep, but full of low-toned music, said:

"Fate rules the hearts of mortals, how dare you thus mock its power!" They started and gazed earnestly around, but no one was near. The voice seemed to come from the clouds.

"Oh! Stephano," said the trembling maiden, "said I not we were too happy. You hear a voice threatens and warns, and see that cloud flying across my star in the heavens." As she spoke a light cloud threw its shadow on the marble floor. "What do these mean, Stephano! I fear," and she drew more closely to his side.

"Be obedient to thy fate. Soon the choice of thy destiny will be proffered thee, yield to the boon asked, and all will be well. Remember to be obedient!" was again heard in solemn tones that seemed afar off.

Leonore could scarce suppress a shriek, but though Stephano's cheek paled a moment, he looked sternly and fiercely around and laid his hand on his sword.

"Wouldst thou smite the invisible who ruleth thy destiny? Thou wilt need thy sword for revealed foes ere long," was whispered in a low mocking tone in his ear. He turned, but naught was there. The balcony lay in a flood of moonlight and offered no hiding place, being open on all sides but that next the hall which blazed with light. After narrowly scanning this side, Stephano turned away perplexed. His scrutinizing eye had failed to detect the narrow niche high over the entrance to the hall.

"Let us go in," faltered Leonore, whose cheek was white with terror.

"One moment more, Leonore; to-morrow you leave Venice; I dare not present myself openly at your father's palace, but in a short time I will follow you to Ferrara; will you meet me in some secret place?—think, my Leonore, how many hours of agony must pass ere I again see you, and do not refuse my prayer!"

"I will meet you, Stephano,—there is a——" and she looked eagerly around and then leaning towards him whispered in his ear, as though she feared a listener.

"Thanks, Leonore," said her lover, and they entered the hall.

BURIAL AT SEA.

BY DR. JNO. C. McCABE.

A sound is on the billow—a sad, low, thrilling wail,
And wheels the sea-bird slowly o'er yon trembling, drooping sail;

There are manly tears in sorrow, as bursts the pent up prayer:
A comrade's shrouded form lies cold, which moved so lately
there!

The sweet cool winds are playing round his marble-pallid brow,
And see, they lift his long bright locks, then drop them sadly now;
They kiss his cold and rigid lips—winds from the gentle south,
But wake no song of gladness from his sternly death-closed mouth.

The ritual now is over, low falls the sad "amen!"
And manly cheeks are wet with tears—tears eloquent seem then!

And through the slowly parting wave the body now hath sped,
To sleep, till ocean hears the call, to render up its dead.

Now the blue halcyon dips her wing down in that sunny wave,
'Neath which hath gone that gallant one—the noble and the brave;
Comrades, be silent now! Let each his own heart's record scan,
For God hath smitten him, who was—aye, "every inch," a man!

The "ocean-buried" calmly sleeps down in some con-
grove,
And sea-nymphs hymn, perchance, around, their sweet young notes of love;
The stern old ocean lifts its voice in one eternal chant.
As down upon his heaving breast the golden sunbeams slant.

Fling out your canvass to the gale! Catch the sweet southern breeze;
A few more days, and ye shall see your land's green forest trees;
And ye shall greet your frolic babes; shall meet your wives again,
But—one shall ask ye for her mate, and ask, oh God! in vain!

Long hath she watched the evening star from out her summer bower,
And fancied he was gazing too; long hath she nursed the flower
He used to love; and when sweet sleep hath o'er her vigil stole,
Has dreamed he stood beside her there—the Idol of her soul!

A stricken bird! her melody rings out no more to cheer!
Her mate hath gone, why should she fold her wing in sorrow here?

Swan-like and beautiful, thank God, her last sweet song given,
And now—it swells the choral strain that thrills the arch of heaven!

NOTES ON OUR ARMY.

No. IV.

"An Army is a collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man."—Locke.

TO THE HON. THOMAS H. BENTON.

Having been so fortunate as to secure a copy of the "Army Register" for 1844, I shall be enabled in my future calculations and estimates to use figures from official sources, which will be more accurate in details than I could otherwise make them. It is impossible for one who has no access to official records, to calculate, with accuracy, the pay and allowances of officers of our Army, particularly in the Staff, unless he be skilled in the science of abstruse mathematics, and the moral binding force of certificates of honor, which accounting officers have decided to be matters of form. I mean to implicate no one by this remark, nor would I accuse any one of criminal deception; but I have so frequently heard it remarked by those who are the recipients of these almost incomprehensible and inexplicable allowances, that "it would never do for the Army to be paid in round sums, or by salaries, as we now receive the greater part of our pay in lieu of allowances which Congress cannot understand, and a reduction would certainly follow if the gross amount were presented to view," that I am almost convinced they feel ashamed of the truth, and this conviction is strengthened by the knowledge that I should be, if placed under similar circumstances. The remark applies, undoubtedly, with much force to a large number of the officers of our Army, or, rather, those who have the titles of officers, but who have no more connection with the Army in a military point of view, and no more feeling in common with it, than have the clerks in the different executive departments of the government. But when we come to apply it to the military branch of the service, a difference in feeling and principle will be found. I am convinced a large majority of the officers of that branch of the service would express very different views if called on, and I must confess I should feel mortified to hear of one who would prefer the present mode of pay for the sole reason that he was now deceiving Congress, and if the fact were known, his allowances would be reduced. Yet I have never heard any other reason advanced in favor of the present absurd and inconvenient method of paying the officers of our Army for their services. No other servants or agents of the government are paid in the same way,—the plan having been long since abolished in the Navy; and I know of no reason why it should not be in the Army.

Another document, containing the estimates for our service for the year commencing the 1st of July, 1844, has fallen into my hands, and I must call your attention to a few facts I shall draw from these sources, as well as to the contrasts I wish to present between them and the similar estimates for the British service, for 1843.

The gross estimate to pay, clothe and subsist our whole Army, including officers, with 7,870 rank and file, for the year commencing the 1st July, 1844, is* - - - $2,641,761.80
Cost per Soldier in our service, 1 year, - - - 335.67
Cost of our Staff for the same year, - - - 520,249.00

Or a little under one-fifth of the whole cost of the Army.

Cost per soldier in our service, 1 year, deducting the Staff, - - - - - $269.44

Estimates for the British service for the year commencing 1st April, 1843, for the same purposes, with a force of 88,660 rank and file,† - - - - - $23,862,995.00
Cost per soldier in the British service - - - 269.15
Cost of Staff, British service, same year, - - 854,455.00

Or about one twenty-eighth of the whole cost of the Army!

Cost per soldier, 1 year, in the British service, deducting the Staff, - - - - - 259.50

From these estimates and results no one can resist the conclusion, that our Staff is enormously large and expensive, compared with the line of our Army. Including all the branches of our service, it appears that we pay, per soldier, $335.67 a year. Deducting the cost of our Staff, it is reduced to $269.44,—showing that an increase of $66.23, per soldier, per annum, or a little under twenty-five per cent is added to the cost of our soldier for the support of a Staff. In the British service, we find the cost of the soldier is $269.15. Deducting the Staff, it is reduced to $259.50. Showing an increase of only $9.65, or less than four per cent on the cost of the soldier to support their Staff.

It will be difficult, I conceive, to find any good reason to show the necessity of maintaining a Staff in our service at a cost of one-fifth of the whole expense of the Army, when in the British service it only costs one twenty-eighth.

These results show one of two things, either that our Staff is unnecessarily large and expensive, or that it requires six times the expense to get the same Staff duties performed in our service that it does in the British. In either case it is time that a corrective was applied, and if the whole number of our Staff officers are required to do the same duties one-sixth of them would do in the British service, the government cannot too soon supply their places by those who would be more willing and more competent to discharge those duties and at a much less expense to the country.

We now have a greater number of officers in our Staff, with an Army of a little over seven thousand, than we had when our Army exceeded twelve thousand—from 1838 to 1842.

* 28th Congress, 1st Session, House Doc.—No. 6.

† United Service Journal for March, 1843.

This increase has been made by the appointment of Brevet Second Lieutenants to most of these Staff corps, in open violation of law, and without the slightest necessity for their services, when they really might have been advantageously disposed of in supplying the places of some of the numerous officers legally detached on Staff duties. An act of Congress of the 29th of April, 1812, allowed the appointment of Brevet Second Lieutenants from the graduates of the Military Academy, when there were no vacancies in the Army, and provided for their promotion when vacancies occurred; but it also "provided, that there shall not be more than one supernumerary officer to any one company at the same time." Yet, year after year, we see an open violation of this proviso, which has never been repealed, by the appointment of supernumerary Brevets to these different Staff corps of the Army, which are already overstocked with officers, and which have no companies to which such officers can be attached as the law requires.

I must again pay my respects to the Quartermaster's department of our Army, which I hope will not consider itself as slighted in being so long overlooked, after the assiduous attention which was paid it in my last. In 1814, when we had an Army of 60,000 rank and file, and a large portion of them in the field, our organization allowed fifty officers in the Quartermaster's department. In 1844, when our Army is scarcely to exceed 7,000 rank and file, we have an organized Quartermaster's department, with thirty-seven officers; that is, with one-ninth of the force, we have three-fourths of the Staff. According to this ratio, if our whole Army is disbanded, it will appear that at least thirty officers will be necessary in the Quartermaster's department. Then, what a fine time they would have; all would do what two-thirds now do—nothing,—or at least so near nothing, that their occupation at public business is scarcely sufficient to prevent ennui, and their only trouble is to find ways and means for spending their pay. Again, in 1815, when our Army was reduced to a force of fourteen regiments, or equal to that, we were allowed eight officers in the Quartermaster's department. Now, with the same number of regiments, we have thirty-seven.

If more be necessary to the position which I have assumed, the unnecessary size and expense of this department, it can be readily found by reference to the positions and duties of those holding appointments in it.

First, we have the chief of the bureau, a Brigadier General, who distinguished himself in the field before assuming the arduous and responsible duties which he has long continued to perform with so much ability, and for which his devotion to business so peculiarly fit him. All acknowledge the importance of his office and the success which attends his administration of it. We next have two

Colonels; one of them is stationed in Philadelphia as chief of the clothing branch of the Quartermaster's department, a sort of Tailor General to the Army. He supervises the purchase and issue of all articles of clothing and camp and garrison equipage, but it must not be inferred that he dirties his hands by receiving and issuing these articles himself; that would be beneath a Colonel in the Army. He is a link in the chain by which it is effected; but all small matters are either left undone by him, or done by another; he even declines condescending so far as to sign an invoice of property forwarded, and contents himself with the reflection that a letter accompanying it, from so great a man, is all sufficient. The Quartermaster General approves requisitions for supplies, forwards them to this supervisor, or Tailor General, and he orders a Military Storekeeper to comply with them. This storekeeper prepares the supplies, makes invoices, and turns them over to a third person, a Captain and assistant Quartermaster, who forwards them to their destination. This is all a very perfect arrangement, and the results prove it; for our supplies, notwithstanding all this circumlocution, are generally very good and punctually furnished; but it may puzzle some to account for the necessity of this long method of doing a short thing. This having one officer to inspect, one to procure and issue, and another to transport, when one of them could do it all as well. Several good reasons may be given, and I will venture two or three: I cannot flatter myself they are correct, for I confess my ignorance of the reasons which operate in favor of performing the duties of this "scientific corps" in the peculiar way in which they are done, but I have the charity to suppose there are reasons, and I only hope I have discovered the true ones.

The Secretary of War, previous to the present incumbent, has told us the Staff must be in proportion to the extent of country over which the Army is spread, "and, reasoning from analogy, which, however, does not always lead to certainty," I infer, that supplies to be sent thousands of miles, require more officers and more rank to secure their safety than those which are sent hundreds, and in the direct ratio of the distance. This appears to me a natural inference, but for fear it may not be correct and may not apply to all cases, I will offer another which has been suggested to me. In viewing many of the beautiful and admirable experiments in electricity, a mere utilitarian would be led at once to inquire the use of a long and circuitous conductor by which an observer, near the machine, receives the same shock he would by touching the discharger with his hand. This, however, would not show him one of the most singular and remarkable properties of the fluid, its instantaneous passage, through space, by the intervention of a conductor. And thus it is with this department. We are struck with the beautiful arrangement by which duties can be divided and subdivided without loss and with little delay. It is true, we might remove nine-tenths of its officers and secure the same efficiency and, possibly, a slight saving of time in the execution of their duties; but then we should destroy all the beauties of the system; there would be nothing to admire and wonder at,—nothing to create astonishment in the minds of unsophisticated beholders. If we destroy any one of these links in the chain, it becomes necessary to unite the two nearest each other, or the current is destroyed, but when the union is perfected, we perceive no difference in the result; and so would it be with the Quartermaster's department: strike out any link, particularly one of those which has become oxidized from long rest, unite the two next and a connection will be formed as perfect as the first.

I will suggest but one more reason, although several additional ones might be given equally as strong as the foregoing. A large number of the officers of this department are men of families and extensive connections in our eastern cities, and it would be uncomfortable for them to join their companies and do duty at military posts remote from society, and if required to go there to reside, they would have to live in a style far beneath what they are accustomed to, besides losing about twenty-five per cent on their pay which they now receive under the head of "commutation." Omitting the tailoring department in the city of Philadelphia, which employs one Colonel, one Captain, and one Military Storekeeper, we find one Colonel in New-York, nominally; he owns a fine farm on Long Island, or thereabouts, and has a clerk to do his duties. For several months past he has attended Congress to legislate for the country and himself. One Lieutenant Colonel and one Captain enjoy themselves in the city of Detroit, for what purpose I have been unable to ascertain. A Lieutenant Colonel and Captain again in St. Augustine where there are neither purchases nor issues to make. One Major in St. Louis, and a Captain at Jefferson Barracks, within an hour's ride. One Major and one Captain are "settling accounts at the Treasury." One Major in New Orleans. One Captain commands his company at Plattsburg, N. Y., and receives $34 per month for doing duties which Lieutenants do at many posts for nothing; this is paying rather high for the honor the government derives from being served by such dignitaries. Another Captain is to be found in the city of Boston, and the nearest troops to him are at Portsmouth, N. H., where a Lieutenant does the duty of Quartermaster without compensation. Many subalterns would be happy to secure the position of this Boston Captain at one third the compensation which he receives. I would not even decline such a position myself, as I am confident thirty minutes a day would suffice for all official business, and so much spare time in that enterprising land might be so disposed of as to secure a subaltern's independence and possibly his happiness, both of which are out of his reach so long as an aspiration for military renown confines him to his profession. A Captain in Baltimore is similarly situated, except that he is nominally the Quartermaster at Fort McHenry, three miles off. Another Captain is reported at Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., when it is known he is in Brownville, N. Y., at his private residence, and visits the post occasionally, much to the annoyance of the commanding officers. One again is at Baton Rouge, La., where there are duties which probably occupy him half an hour a day. Another at Buffalo, N. Y., under similar circumstances. One more at Fort Monroe, where all his duties would be willingly performed by a subaltern for one-tenth the compensation. In Savannah, Geo., there is a Captain without any earthly necessity for his presence, or occupation for his time. And so I might go through the whole list of these Captains, by name, without finding any absolute necessity for more than three or four at farthest out of the twenty-eight in the department. The worst feature of the whole business is the fact that twenty of these gentlemen have their names at the heads of companies, supplying a place which ought to be filled by some efficient and useful man. One of them is kept in Washington City as a clerk in the bureau, where the law establishes the number allowed and contemplated no such evasion as this,—an evasion it must be regarded. A second is temporarily reported on the same duty. Of the whole thirty-eight officers in the department, including two storekeepers, not more than six are necessary for the economical and efficient discharge of the duties pertaining to it, and they would not require, and should not receive such pay and emoluments as are now allowed to the eight field officers, whose positions are perfect sinecures, and are so considered in the Army.

And what is the consequence of clothing these officers with high military rank, when they are considered in foreign services below the lowest grade of commissioned officers of the line? A continual wrangle about rank and command. Put an army in the field with one of these colonels of teamsters, wagons, carts and mules, and just so soon as the officers senior to him in the line are out of the way, he is for assuming the military command, although he is ignorant of the first principles of the recruits' drill. These, and many other absurdities, which have crept into our military legislation, would, in case of active service in the field, paralyze the efforts of any General in the world, and destroy the esprit du corps and discipline of the best troops ever known.

I must apologize for being compelled to leave this "most essential part of the Army proper," as it was styled, ironically, of course, by our late Secretary, but I hope, as my acquaintance has been an intimate and very agreeable one, I may be able at some future day to renew it under more favorable auspices.

With due modesty and consideration, and with a full knowledge of my presumption, in approaching so princely an establishment, I must beg leave to introduce myself to the "Ordnance Department," and—"hope I don't intrude." It has managed by some efficient means to give itself an existence and a gradual increase up to its present size, thirty-five officers, since our peace organization in 1821, when an Ordnance department was not thought necessary. Our law-givers then ignorantly supposed that Ordnance duties could in ours, as in foreign services, be performed by the artillery; but that idea is now exploded, and in this country it is discovered that scientific (!) men are necessary to perform the mechanical duties of constructing and preparing ordnance and ordnance stores, and that any ignoramus may use them. Next we shall hear of the scientific mechanic who makes astronomical instruments with which the ignorant philosopher takes his observations.

I will delay entering upon the details of the abuses and unnecessary expenses of this department, and its growing arrogance and unimportance until a future letter. I must beg leave, however, to quote here, as a sort of preface, a few remarks by an officer of great intelligence and long service. Some of his happiest hours have been passed at their delightful arsenals, and in the performance of their very light and agreeable duties at a time when officers of the line occasionally shared the loaves and fishes, after years of hard service at remote and cheerless military garrisons. Such temporary relief is now unknown to us, all such details having been converted into permanent appointments for the favored few. He has taken but a slight glance at ordnance life, but I hope to present it in such lights as to render it entirely unnecessary for any one to "visit an arsenal" to convince him of the abuses which cry loud for correction, and which are saddled upon the shoulders of the poor unoffending Army. It has no sooner finished a contest of seven years, without a parallel in history for its privations and hardships, and in which these silk-stocking and boudoir gentlemen took no part, at least after entering the Ordnance department, than it is held up to the execration of the country by these very men, who lived in their carpeted parlors within princely government edifices, whilst their neglected and abused comrades were wading in the swamps and morasses, and parching with the fevers of a tropical clime.

My worthy friend and valued correspondent says: "It is not with an invidious feeling, nor even in a spirit of idle querulousness, that the Line of the Army are prompted to step forth in opposition to the encroachments of the Staff. They are not unmindful of the ancient proverb of 'the bad bird,' and have felt how inexpedient and perhaps suicidal it may be for one portion of our small military establishment, to set itself in array against the faults of another and expose its imperfections to the public eye. Ordinary evils could be patiently borne;—a moderate degree of inequality might be overlooked;—a temporary neglect could be endured in silence; but, when these evils become accumulative, engendering others until their 'name is legion,' forbearance ceases to be a virtue and whatever may be the consequences, an effort at self-vindication seems to be called for, and the truth must be told.

"We have seen that by the arrangement now existing in our military establishment, each administrative department is governed by its head situated in an office called a Bureau, at Washington, in convenient proximity to the war office, and enjoying all reasonable facilities for a free intercourse with the Secretary of the War Department. This functionary, frequently changed and therefore uninformed and inexperienced in the details and requirements of the service, must necessarily call for his information upon the chiefs of the Bureaux; and there being no one to question or gainsay them, it is not surprising that the statements of the said chiefs are received as conclusive facts, undenied and undeniable. Orders are issued accordingly, and thus is the Army governed. It requires but a modicum of diplomatic tact, a small share of that soft unction which is so plentifully distilled at court, for these Bureau chiefs to acquit themselves successfully on such an arena before the unfledged potentate of the war office, and when a measure is to be carried, that Bureau chief must be a sorry apprentice in the courtier's art who could not, with all these means and appliances to boot, color his case as he chose and carry his point. In such a contest, it is easy to see that 'Oily Gammon' will always be an overmatch for the modest 'Mowbray.' And so it has been for years with the Army departments at Washington.

"As an illustration of these truths let us look at the Ordnance Department. Here is a corps of officers, set apart and invested with rank and emoluments, perquisites and privileges,—claiming military command when prerogative tempts them, but disdaining military privations and avoiding martial hardships when war is the word. Such a corps is now paid and fed and pampered, for what great purpose think you? To take care of the arms boxed up and stored away in the arsenals, and, peradventure, to overlook the artificers who may be employed to repair them. The duties now performed by this corps of officials, aggrandized by Army rank and endowed with the highest of Army emoluments, can all be as well performed by officers of the artillery, and by so much might the treasury be lightened of its load. The Ordnance! A corps, formerly supposed to consist only of the maimed and the decrepit,—the places in which were rarely sought by men conscious of full powers,—now basking in the sunshine of court favor—dandled in the lap of luxury,—has become the envy of the hardiest, and its happy votaries, fancying themselves the primary branch of the system, and claiming for their corps the appellation of 'scientific'!—are ready to kick away the ladder by which they rose, and set up for themselves an exclusive caste. Such consequences are natural enough, and officers are scarcely to be blamed for seeking places in a corps favored by indulgences, enjoying sumptuous quarters, performing light and easy duties, and suffering no hardships. If any one suspect this account to be too highly colored, let him once visit an arsenal;—let him there contrast the ample accommodations and expensive finish of all their quarters with the stinted apartments allotted to the Line of the Army. Let him compare the ease and opulence of ordnance life with the constraint, the privation, the remote and cheerless stations to which the infantry and artillery are doomed,—and he will no longer wonder that men, even of high and chivalric spirit, should yield their martial hardihood to the blandishments of luxury, and, satisfied with the tinsel show of military rank, prefer the parlor to the field. But these seductive influences lead to a train of evils which the Conscript Fathers of our Republic are called upon to correct. The remedy must be applied by the power which is paramount to the Executive Departments of the Government. The official functionaries of those Departments are indeed placed as guardians and censors of the agents under their charge, but 'Quis custodiet ipsos custodes' There is no recourse but to the Representatives of the people. Let the pure and searching eye of simple honesty come to the scrutiny, and there will be some hope that partiality, favoritism and extravagance will at length be made to yield to the spirit of economy and justice." Nous Verrons.

THE LEGEND OF THE SHEPHERD'S CLOCK.*

*In the southern cross-aisle of the church, near the chapel of the crucifix, may be seen a clock which is the admiration of the curious."—[Le Glay, Recherches sur l'église métropolitaine de Cambrai, Ch. vii.]

I remember, that in my childhood, my nurse was a young Fleming, named Trea, a joyous girl with large blue eyes, white teeth and fresh and rosy cheeks. When Trea was decked out in her "Sunday's best," it was a real pleasure to see her, so comely and neat, with large drops in her ears, her arms bare, according to the custom of Flanders, and her waist a little too embonpoint, diminished by a very tight corset whose bright red glared upon a woollen petticoat of blue, striped with white. On such days, she indulged in the coquetry of wearing a shoe on a foot, which wanted neither diminutiveness nor beauty. So every one who passed her asked, "who is that pretty creature with the little child by her side?"

*Translated for the S. L. Messenger from "Chroniques et Traditions Sarmatiales de la Flandre—par Mr. S. Henry Bernhoed."

And I, with the vanity of a boy of six years, was delighted and proud of the flattering attention bestowed on my conductress; yes, the days on which we walked out together were to me real festivals, anticipated and longed for with the greatest impatience.

It must be confessed however, that to the attraction which the gratification of a childish vanity afforded, was added a second not less lively. Every Sunday, the termination of our walk was the smoky chamber of a blind old dame, the mother of a comely lad whose modest deportment greatly became him.

As soon as we arrived, there were two kisses for Trea, and some little dainty for me. Methinks I still see the two lovers retreating into the embrasure of a window lighted with small green panes of glass, and drawing their straw chairs as near to each other as possible. They chatted together long in a low tone, forming plans without end—plans radiant with joy, such as we dream of when we are young—and which a happy carelessness, a sweet confidence in the future, present to the fancy, embellished with pure and delightful images.

In the mean time the good old dame would relate to me some story. I must live to be very old, before I can forget her, with her grey locks, confined by her white cap, her eyes dim and immovable, her looks full of kindness, and her arms thin and sunburnt emerging from beneath a large red kerchief. She told of wonderful apparitions, of fantastic legends, of diabolical adventures and touching traditions; when she approached the catastrophe, she would straighten her bended form, her voice would assume a firmer tone, and her long hands, upraised in the air, would fall again on her knees.

Seated before her on a little stool, I would listen motionless, with fixed eyes and flushed cheeks, scarcely daring to draw my breath. When she ceased, my sorrow was inexpressible, and I would have given the world to hear her continue.

Among other curious legends, that of "the shepherd's clock" produced upon me a powerful impression.

"My child," said the good woman, "there was once at Cambray a beautiful church, such a one as you do not look upon now-a-days. Nothing handsomer was ever seen; one might have passed a whole year, yes a whole year in examining all the wonderful things that were there. But the most precious of all, (it is only a voice down stairs that you hear my child,) was the clock. The clock that I have often spent whole hours in admiring when I was no larger than you, and was going to school with my little basket on my arm and had, alas! two good eyes.

That beautiful clock was higher, oh! a great deal higher than this room. It was made like a little church with its deep portal and its pointed steeple. At the end of it there was an angel who, when the hour struck, lifted a trumpet to his mouth and played a flourish. Then the angel, Gabriel, standing on the left hand of the clock, waved a lily branch, as if he were saying an ave to the holy virgin who was placed on the right, and who, kneeling before her crucifix, joined her hands and bowed her head as if she replied, "the will of God be done."

Then the doors of two niches would fly open and there you saw some death's heads, and then a book whose leaves turned over of their own accord, so that you might read the pious thoughts inscribed upon them. After this a wonderfully sweet and plaintive chime was heard, and you saw passing before you, on a sort of little gallery, all the passion of our Lord, from the moment he was betrayed so wickedly by Judas, to that in which Jesus bowed his head and rendered his soul to God the father.

The angel again sounded his trumpet, when all disappeared; all was shut up and every thing became immovable and silent.

Now was not that a sight worthy of admiration, and would you not have been delighted to behold it?

Well, I will tell you how it happened that the church of Noire-Dame of Cambray, was endowed with so rich a present.

A great many years ago there was a Prince who laid siege to Cambray; but in spite of all his forces, in spite of the great towers of wood from which they cast enormous stones, and arrows, and burning torches, he could do nothing against the city. A miraculous cloud spread itself around the walls like a second rampart, and our lady and the angels appeared in the midst of the cloud and hurled back the stones, and the arrows, and the flaming torches among the besiegers, to whom they did great mischief. The hostile Prince, enraged by this miraculous protection, blasphemed dreadfully against the patron saint of Cambray. He was punished in a terrible manner. He lost his sight. Then he humbled himself before the hand which had smitten him, raised the siege, and vowed if he could recover his vision, that he would give to the church of our lady of mercy a crown of gold, in which his horse could without difficulty turn himself about.

His repentance found favor with the mother of our Saviour, his eyes were re-opened, and to atone for his sin, he appeared before the church with a taper of yellow wax in his hand. You can imagine his joy, my child! Would you not be too sorry if your eyes, like mine, could behold nothing but sad obscurity. No more beautiful blue skies, nor clouds which fly like birds, nor green trees, nor flowers of a thousand hues! not to venture a single step without being afraid of hurting yourself,—to remain sitting sorrowfully all day long—and then never more to see one's children! night! night! forever night! Oh! my little master, depend on it one who is blind has much to mourn.

The Prince of whom I speak, in his transport of joy, declared aloud that he wished to make the church a second present, as rare as the first was rich. At these words, there stepped out of the crowd a young shepherd of Rome who boldly said, "I will fashion it. Give me a thousand crowns of gold, allow me fourteen years and I will make a clock, that shall be as much talked of as the seven wonders of the world. Yes—by the safety of my soul, I swear it shall be called the wonder of Cambray."

Well, they paid him a thousand pieces of gold; he worked day and night for fourteen years, and completed the beautiful clock I have told you about. Having done so, he sought the Bishop and said, "I will now return to my own country and rejoin my poor mother whom I have not embraced for fourteen years. I have concealed in this staff the thousand pieces of gold which I received for my work,—God and the holy virgin be praised! If my guardian angel protect me on my journey, I will carry to the excellent woman, that which will secure her against the fear of want!"

Now the Bishop in those days was not a man who feared God. So he said to himself, this shepherd is going to another country,—he will there perhaps make a second clock more wonderful than this,—ours will lose its renown, without reckoning that pilgrims will then no longer piously resort to a town where they can gaze with admiration on so unique a miracle of art. He therefore tried to retain the shepherd at Cambray—but to every promise, however seducing, the young man answered, "I prefer my old mother to all that you can give me."

"We will send for her," said the Bishop.

"Oh no," replied the shepherd; "she would die under your cold and cloudy sky. My mother inhabits the beautiful city of Rome, and even if she could bear the fatigue of such a journey, she would not quit the city of the Pope, to look on whom once a day is worth an indulgence to her."

The Bishop then wished to procure the shepherd to be arrested as a sorcerer and heretic, but he feared a revolt of the people if he practised such an indignity.

So he contented himself by setting some bad men, devoid of truth and law, to waylay the shepherd as he left the city. He defended himself bravely, and they succeeded in nothing but depriving him of his staff, in which the thousand pieces of gold were concealed. "I have returned poor," cried he after escaping from the hands of his fierce assailants, "but my eyes and my fingers are left me and I know how to gain as much more gold."

The wicked Bishop, to whom this was reported, then took a resolution which must have been inspired by Satan himself. He caused the shepherd to be deprived of his eyes and the fingers of both hands to be cut off.

The poor young man died many years afterwards a wanderer in the streets of Cambray, where he begged his bread from door to door, but he never again saw the city of the Pope or his old mother.

At this moment a slight noise startled me—it was the kiss of adieu which Trea gave her lover. The young girl rose, took me by the hand and we returned home. But all that night I heard in my dreams the voice of the blind shepherd, who, weeping, called upon his mother, and on my awakening in the morning, I thought I saw a pale and mutilated phantom gliding away from the foot of my little bed.

The clock which forms the subject of this legend was begun in 1338, under the episcopacy of Guy de Collemède; it was finished in 1397.—Pierre D'Ailly caused it to be still further perfected in 1400, and it was again repaired in 1542 and 1602. Finally, in 1765, the clock was almost entirely renewed. The dial indicates the days of the week—the succession of the months—the signs of the Zodiac and the various aspects of the sun.

REPLY TO E. D. AND MR. SIMMS.

(Concluded.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SOU. LIT. MESSENGER.

Sir:—The system of Copyright, as it is now understood, has prevailed in no age or country except among the nations of Modern Europe and their colonies. If it be asked why these enlightened nations have thought proper to fetter the circulation of knowledge with the restraints of a monopoly, their only justification can be found in the principles of public policy, in the supposed tendency of such a measure to foster the growth of science and literature. Copyright is, in truth, the mere creature of legislation, produced and fashioned exclusively with a view to the interests of the community where it is established, and which should endure no longer than is consistent with those interests. It is a device to stimulate intellectual labor by the prospect of gain, and thus encourage the advancement of knowledge and development of genius. It is a gratuity, a bounty similar in principle and operation to the patent rights secured to the authors of mechanical inventions, to the various expedients resorted to by governments for the promotion of domestic industry. Such privileges, dictated by policy, have been uniformly restrained by the same policy to some definite period, a limitation imposed on no other species of property.

If, in the institution of municipal Copyright for the encouragement of native genius, the interests of society are alone consulted, the question is whether foreign literature possesses any stronger claims on our liberality, or justice. Will it be alleged, that, while this boon is bestowed on our own countrymen as a gratuitous concession, the citizens of other States may demand it as a right? The maxim, that "charity begins at home," applies emphatically to governments, and surely none will be hardy enough to maintain that the interests of foreigners should supersede the performance of this fundamental duty. I hold, then, that we are under no moral obligation to engraft upon our system the scheme of International Copyright, and that, whatever irrelevant topics may have been dragged into the discussion, the whole question, so far as foreigners are concerned, resolves itself into an appeal to our generosity, or our interests. What claim, then, have the authors of foreign countries upon our munificence? Let it be borne in mind, that they enjoy the profits of a monopoly under the sanction of their own governments, and now invoke our liberality, not to relieve the pressure of actual want, but to replenish coffers already overflowing. These sturdy beggars disdain to implore our charity on the plea of penury, the hackneyed pretext of the mendicant; they demand it as a right, and insult us with the bitterest reproaches because we have not yielded implicitly to their extravagant petitions. We are, therefore, not bound to aid them on the score of benevolence, and their pretended claim of right has been shown, I trust, to be equally untenable. The simple question then is, whether any reason in point of policy can be suggested, why we should permit these importunate supplicants to share the advantages of our law of Copyright.

When so much ingenuity and invective has been employed in defence of International Copyright, it is somewhat remarkable, that nothing has been urged to recommend the propriety of an International patent-right for the benefit of mechanical invention. These franchises rest on precisely the same principles, and, if utility alone is considered, the services, which they are designed to recompense, are at least equally meritorious; nor can I conceive of any process of reasoning that would not apply with equal cogency to the justice and policy of either measure. And yet I am not aware that the most sturdy innovator has yet proposed to include mechanical inventors within the scope of his projected reforms. The pretensions of Fulton, of Arkright, of Bolton and Watt, men whose brilliant inventions have given such a marvellous impulse during the last seventy years to wealth, enterprise and civilization, are, I suppose, of trivial consequence compared to the claims of those illustrious benefactors of mankind, Dickens, Carlyle and Ainsworth.

Let no man suppose, that, because I make expediency the sole basis of Copyright, I am hostile to that system, or that I would be disposed in any wise to narrow or abolish a franchise so beneficial to the community. On the contrary, I deem it one of the noblest and most salutary contrivances of human policy, and were I persuaded that the tendencies of International Copyright would be equally propitious to the true interests of this country, that institution would at once command my ardent and unhesitating support. The most impartial examination of the subject has, I own, failed to satisfy me, that such a scheme would be beneficial to ourselves; in my view the only proper subject of inquiry, or that whatever casual advantages it might produce would not be counterbalanced by the sacrifice of corresponding benefits far more than equivalent. I shall nevertheless admit, that if not clearly forbidden by some preponderating motive, not positively opposed to the diffusion of knowledge and prejudicial to the cause of education, the sense of gratitude should incline us, in adjusting the balance of advantages, to lean towards the claims of those distinguished foreigners, whose literary efforts have ministered so greatly to our pleasure and improvement.

The argument principally relied on by the American partizans of International Copyright as evidence of its expediency, proceeds on the assumption that it will accelerate the growth of our own literature by ensuring to native authors a more certain and adequate reward for their labors. This proposition is distinctly avowed by your correspondent E. D., and if I mistake not the drift of Mr. Simms' reasoning, he has adopted the same idea. The policy of an expedient calculated to encourage the efforts of American genius is universally conceded, and were it evident that such would be the inevitable consequence of International Copyright, the decision of this vexed question might be no longer dubious. But even on that supposition it behooves us to ascertain before venturing on this novel experiment in legislation, that the benefits to native literature resulting from its adoption are indisputable, and of such magnitude as to countervail the grievous operation of a monopoly on the great body of the people. To purchase a trivial advantage for some privileged class at the expense of sacrificing the interests of the mass would be, not simply a dereliction, but a palpable and criminal breach of public duty. That no human institution is productive of unmixed good, or evil is a truism verified by the most superficial observation. The office of enlightened legislation, therefore, consists mainly in a wise choice of inconveniences, in a prudent estimate of incompatible advantages. In adjusting the complex machine of civil society, it is the common fault of innovation to pursue with blind enthusiasm some phantom of ideal good, unmindful, or ignorant of the subtle mischief which so often lurks beneath the surface of the most plausible and alluring schemes of improvement. Let us beware of such a fatal error in the settlement of this important controversy. Let no illusive prospects of advantage tempt us to depart, with injudicious haste, from the line of safe precedent. Let us be convinced, before we embrace the policy of International Copyright, that it is essential to the prosperity of our domestic literature—that its benefits will be certain, solid and permanent—and that whatever transient check it may give to the diffusion of knowledge among our people will be amply compensated by its invigorating influences on American genius.

After much reflection, I can conceive of but two modes in which International Copyright could possibly increase the profits of American writers, namely, by extending their present monopoly to foreign countries, or by enhancing the general price of books among us as a marketable commodity. The prevailing system in the republication of foreign works is supposed by some to impair the value of native Copyrights by bringing those cheap books into competition with American publications, and thus reducing the wages of literary labor to so low a rate that the hapless author must either commit his lucubrations to the press, at his own risk, with almost the certain prospect of eventual loss, or be content with a paltry remuneration from the publisher, who, in such a state of things, will be unable to offer him a liberal recompense. Now, to admit foreign writers to the privileges of our law of Copyright can only augment the prices of contemporary books in our market, and would, therefore, furnish a very partial corrective of the alleged mischief. It would still leave an immense mass of literature untouched, and liable to be moulded by our enterprising bibliopolists into forms adapted to the frugal habits of our people. The process of depreciating the general value of books would still continue, nor would there be any remedy for this imaginary evil but by subjecting all foreign works, whether ancient or modern, to the operation of a retrospective Copyright, or fixing their value by an arbitrary act of legislation; schemes too revolting to common sense to be proposed even by the most sanguine projector.

But let us inquire whether the practice of cheap publication really diminishes the price of Copyrights in the market. No printer can venture to publish a book without a reasonable profit on his labor and capital. The excess of money derived from the sale of a book over the expenses necessarily incurred in its manufacture, and circulation, constitutes the neat gain of a publisher, which varies, of course, as that excess swells or diminishes. If there be no excess, the undertaking will be, if not absolutely ruinous, at best a waste of time and labor, and must, therefore, be abandoned. If the excess be not equal to the usual rate of profit in other pursuits, the publisher will be driven by the inflexible laws of trade to seek some more lucrative occupation. When a book is costly, the number of purchasers will of necessity be abridged in an inverse ratio to its price, and to ensure a profit to the publisher, that price must be so regulated as to compensate for the reduced demand. By parity of reasoning it may be assumed, that when a book is cheap, it will have a wider circulation, and that the low price will be counterbalanced by the multitude of buyers. In both cases, the aggregate of sales ought to produce the same amount of total gain, supposing the labor and capital employed to be equal, and in all cases the produce should be sufficient to defray expenses and pay the ordinary rate of profit in the market, or the business must be discontinued. If these principles be true, and to my mind they seem incontrovertible, it follows as a necessary deduction, that the publication of cheap books in this country must be a gainful trade, and that the emoluments realized in it would warrant as large an expenditure in the purchase of Copyrights as could be afforded, supposing the cost of books to be increased in any reasonable proportion; for that expenditure, it is evident, must always be proportioned to the magnitude of the publisher's profits. It cannot affect the force of this reasoning, that the price of Copyright is, in all cases, an additional charge on the gains of the publisher which, by the activity of competition in all the departments of trade, must inevitably be reduced to the lowest point compatible with the prosperity of his business—for whether books be cheap or dear, the application of that principle will be equally manifest. Profits must be proportioned to the outlay of capital, and as that outlay is swelled by the purchase of Copyright, there must of necessity be a correspondent increase in the amount of profits, or the business of publication will sink under the weight of this additional burthen. The capital of the publisher need not be as great, certainly not greater when books are cheap, than when books are dear, and assuming that he accumulates in proportion to his stock, his ability to reward the labors of an author will be equal in both conditions of the market.

If the editors of those cheap foreign books, which E. D. deems so pestilential, were required to pay a premium to the authors for the privilege of publication, I doubt not that they could readily sustain the imposition, nor would such a tax necessarily encroach upon their profits; for by adding a mere pittance to their present prices they could afford to bestow a generous compensation on literary labor. I see no reason why a popular American work, published on the same plan, might not, by its extensive circulation, reimburse the expenses and profits of the publisher, and still leave a handsome dividend to satisfy the claims of the writer. No artificial contrivance, no legislative protection can sustain a work not popular, or make its publication lucrative so long as sales are voluntary and not compulsive. It may be said, that foreign books are purchased with more avidity than those of indigenous production, and that this unreasonable partiality must necessarily occasion an unfair discrimination in adjusting the relative value of native and foreign Copyrights. But would an advance in the general price of books correct this caprice of public taste? Would not the same preference be exhibited in every fluctuation of the literary market? But if it be no caprice, if indeed it be a natural and justifiable leaning to the claims of superior merit, then the competition between native and foreign writers can never be reduced to an equality, until their works are distinguished by equal eloquence, invention, learning and ability.

Theory seems, then, to warrant the conclusion, that the process of cheapening literature by introducing new modes of publication, does not seriously affect the value of literary property so far as the interests of authors are involved: let us now inquire whether this opinion is not corroborated by the testimony of experience. Ever since the invention of printing, there has been a constant and uniform decline in the price of books, and yet the literature of every country in Christendom has thriven and flourished. The profits of the literary adventurer have been steadily advancing during the same period, and, indeed, have augmented nearly in an inverse proportion to the cheapness of their works, until, in this enlightened era, penury has ceased to be the reproach of the genus irritabile, and the prosperous author, transplanted from his wretched attic to comfortable lodgings, no longer skulks in corners to elude the vigilance of the bailiff, or dives in cellars to snatch a meagre and cheerless repast. In the golden age of costly folios, when to amass a library was the exclusive privilege of exorbitant wealth, Dryden, and Otway, and Steele, and Savage, with a countless throng of men of genius, lived in poverty, and died (some of them at least) the victims of squalid destitution: in this iron age of cheap duodecimos, James, and Marryat, Dickens, and Ainsworth, the mere butterflies of literature, are gathering treasures, at which Oliver Goldsmith would have stood aghast, and which Samuel Johnson would have described in his magniloquent style as "the potentiality of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice." The solution of this enigma is apparent to the slightest reflection. It is that readers have multiplied much faster than books have depreciated; that the demand for literary labor has expanded with such inconceivable rapidity as to overbalance beyond all proportion the reduced price of its productions. If, then, the lessons of history are to be heeded, the cheapness of books in any country, so far from indicating the decay of literature, is the first step of its successful progress, the sure forerunner of its palmiest state of prosperity. The paradox is easily explained. It propagates a taste for reading in that numerous class who are precluded by the scantiness of their means from indulging in the luxury of costly volumes, and thus widens, by a sure and natural process, the circle of literary consumption. A great revolution has taken place in the condition of men of letters, since they were compelled by sharp necessity to haunt the antechambers of wealth and power as needy and suppliant dependents, since the days when Spencer described in such touching and beautiful strains, evidently suggested by his personal experience, the sickening miseries of solicitation. They are now no longer constrained,

To fawne, to crowche, to waite, to ride, to ronne,
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.

A man of genius is not now degraded by accepting a paltry and precarious subsistence, wrung by truckling importunity from pampered wealth and proud nobility. He has found a patron far less exacting, and more munificent in the obscure and unrespected multitude, and, sustained by the conscious sense of independence, he can now vindicate without fear the innate dignity of his character. Let us not then be frightened into indiscreet legislation by this bugbear of cheap literature. The evils of such a state of things are transient, and carry with them their own corrective. If, indeed, our literature languishes, its maladies must be traced to other causes, and its revival will be wrought, not by the vaunted specific of International Copyright, but by the vis medicatrix nature, its own internal and recuperative energies.

But, perhaps, our literary men, seduced by the prospect of monopolizing the immense markets of the old world, flatter themselves with the idea of extravagant gains from the establishment of International Copyright. Without dwelling on the want of reciprocity in such an arrangement between nations having an established literature, sustained by a well-trained body of learned men, and practised writers, and a country whose literature is yet in its infancy, and whose men of talents are, for the most part, engrossed with the active business of life, I will venture to predict, that our hopes of fame and emolument from this quarter will be, in a great degree, abortive; that we shall be forestalled in every department of literary effort by veteran and more popular opponents. Can it be presumed that our productions will meet with much success on the continent of Europe, among people differing from us in language, in their standard of taste, in their models of composition; or that, even in Britain, they could encounter the competition of her own favorite authors, backed, as they would be, by the whole force of national prejudice? But admitting that all these difficulties are overcome, that our adversaries should grant us a fair field, equal weapons, and impartial judges, should we chance to win the battle, may we not still be defrauded of the meed of victory? What guerdon for our toils will remain but barren honor, now so lightly esteemed, when some literary pirate has clutched the pecuniary reward? And how is such a consummation to be avoided? What prospect has an American author of maintaining his rights in distant countries, and before unfriendly judges, when even at home, under his own eye, and aided by the whole power of his own government, he can with difficulty repel the encroachments of the trespasser? It would be impracticable to defend a position, vulnerable at so many points, against such numerous assailants; or, to make his foreign monopoly available, he must wield the wealth of Rothschild, and possess the vigilance of Fouché. His life would be a state of perpetual warfare, of endless litigation; and few would consent to purchase a boon, so equivocal, at the expense of such continued vexation and inquietude.

These arguments, if I am not deceived, demonstrate the fallacy of the supposition, that our native literature will derive any effectual support from an International Copyright. But does it need such extrinsic aid? The brief sketch of its origin and progress during the last thirty years, so eloquently drawn by Mr. Simms, sufficiently evinces the vigor of its constitution, and must satisfy the most acceptical of its capacity to sustain itself, unassisted, but by the fostering protection of our own government. Under the discouragement of foreign competition, of a constant reduction in the price of books, it has taken root and flourished. It has borne fruit, whose flavor has satisfied even the fastidious palate of European criticism. Its productions in history, in poetry, in romance, in science, bear witness that it is planted in a fertile soil, and under a genial atmosphere. What though an untimely frost has blighted its blossom and doomed it to temporary barrenness! Shall we therefore despair of its future growth? Its trunk is still vigorous, its vitality unimpaired; and when 'tis buds unfold under more benignant seasons, it will shoot up with renovated luxuriance, and, like the Indian banyan, strike its clustering branches into every corner of our land.

Assuming, then, that the artificial stimulus of International Copyright is not required by the interests of native literature, that its benefits to the American author are, at most, trivial and insignificant, let us inquire whether it be proper, or expedient to extend to foreigners the protection of a system, unsanctioned by precedent, and called for by no municipal considerations. It has already been shown, that the proposed innovation receives no countenance from the principles of abstract right, and that the propriety of its adoption can only be vindicated upon views of policy, or convenience. I have already conceded, that if no difficulties of a political complexion intervene, if there be nothing in the peculiar character of our institutions or condition of our people to forbid it, a sense of gratitude should incline us to favor the pretensions of men, to whose labors we are indebted for so much innocent enjoyment and valuable information. It is the appropriate sphere of an American statesman to guard and to patronize domestic interests, and when he is invited to embrace any new scheme, he must first determine the preliminary question, how far it interferes with these primary objects of his care, and superintendence, before he can yield without censure to the impulses of gratitude and generosity. What then will be the operation of International Copyright upon ourselves? Its immediate result will be to enhance the price of modern books, and thus to seal up to that extent the fountains of knowledge, to a large portion of our reading public in the middling and lower classes of society; to close with the barrier of a monopoly the access of that important branch of our population to the great receptacle of modern discovery; to exclude them from the softening influences of that refinement, which, at this day, has purged elegant letters from the taint of ancient grossness. To check their growing taste for intellectual pleasures by withholding its natural aliment; and to consign them to the debasing bondage of ignorance and prejudice. A thirst for knowledge, a relish for polite letters, in other times and countries, dwelt only in high places; in courts, and castles, and colleges. In this enlightened age, and in this favored land, they have descended from those lofty habitations. They visit the lowly cottage. They cheer the humble fireside. They enliven the solitude of the wilderness. They sweeten the toils of the workshop. They move on the great deep of the popular mind and stir up its slumbering waters from their inmost recesses. This surprising change has not been wrought exclusively by popular institutions and public establishments for education. Other agencies have cooperated. Our schools have laid the foundation, but cheap literature has supplied materials to complete the edifice. The facility of procuring books has implanted a taste for reading, inspired a desire of improvement in a class of men, to whom in the last age the beauties of style, the pleasures of imagination were but foolishness, and science a senseless and mysterious jargon. This spirit is spreading. A liberal curiosity now pervades and animates the bulk of our citizens, and announces the dawn of a new era in the destinies of our race. The schoolmaster is indeed abroad, not armed with the birch and the ferule, but scattering from the stores of an enterprising press the blessings of a cheap literature.

The advantage of reducing the cost of the vehicles of knowledge, for the purposes of popular education, has been observed and appreciated in other countries. In England, the association of gentlemen for the diffusion of useful and entertaining knowledge, set on foot by Lord Brougham, was founded on this very principle. Its leading design was to present, in a condensed and cheap form, a great mass of valuable and amusing matter, and thus to facilitate the spread of information among the unlettered and humbler classes of society, whose poverty debarred them from other sources of mental improvement. What Lord Brougham and his associates deemed of such vital consequence, to the diffusion of knowledge among the people under the monarchy of Britain, as to demand the charitable intervention of so brilliant a confederacy of wealth, rank and talent, has been accomplished in this country by the spontaneous action of the press. Our cheap literature furnishes a constant supply of volumes as little costly, and many of them as instructive, as the library of useful and entertaining knowledge, or the Penny Magazine. It is now in the power of almost any individual, anxious to learn, to provide himself with the best books on a variety of important subjects at an insignificant expense. The effect of such a state of things in stimulating the popular faculties is incalculable. What we are taught at schools constitutes but a small part of our education. Men must, in great measure, be their own instructors, and, such as their natural proclivity to knowledge, that, if you place it within their reach, their own inclinations will prompt them to its pursuit without the application of any extraneous impulse. Vast numbers in this country have already, I doubt not, been awakened by the operation of this cause from mental torpor, and redeemed from the darkness of ignorance. What future triumphs it is destined to achieve, no human sagacity can foresee, or estimate. A large proportion of our reading men are in slender, though independent circumstances, and it is only by the strictest economy, that they can reserve out of their narrow income a small pittance for the purchase of books. The probable, nay, almost certain consequence of a material increase in the cost of literature, will be to banish these humble disciples of learning from the field of improvement, to damp the growing love of knowledge, and to blast the prospects of popular education.

When such are the inevitable effects resulting from the abolition of cheap literature, the question is, whether it comports with the duty of any government, much less of ours, to assail, either by direct, or indirect legislation, a system so beneficial to the great body of the people. All ultimate power under our institutions resides in the mass. They hold the sovereignty, the authority to create, or destroy, to alter, or abolish, every thing in the frame of our society. They elect all public officers, either mediately, or immediately, and, by force of the responsibility thus produced, control the whole practical administration of the government. It is, therefore, of indispensable importance to ensure prudent and just legislation, as well as a wise management of affairs, that public opinion should be sound, and the popular mind enlightened. To verify the maxim of our politicians, that the people are capable of self-government, it is necessary to infuse enlightened views into the multitude, to teach the mass to think and reason, and to supply them with materials for the exercise of the understanding. Until this is done, the proposition is ridiculous, I had almost said, mischievous. It would be to place those that can see under the guidance of the blind, to exalt ignorance and prejudice to the chair of wisdom, to entrust the direction of the most delicate and complex machine to persons unskilled in the first principles of its construction. The most prominent duty of an American statesman, therefore, is to use every means to enlighten the people, to employ every engine calculated to promote the general circulation of knowledge. Cheap literature is a powerful engine for that purpose, and so far from counteracting its operation, or weakening its force by the agency of International Copyright, he would violate the most sacred obligations, did he not remove every obstruction, and give full scope to its beneficent influences: nor could he be justified in an opposite course, even by the design of securing to our own writers the chance of dubious, or at most trivial advantages, much less of promoting the interest of foreign authors, already enjoying a rich reward from the patronage of their own governments.

There is another inconvenience which, I am persuaded, we shall experience from the introduction of International Copyright, and which, though of subordinate consequence, should not be overlooked. When that system is adopted, our literary connexion with Britain must necessarily become more intimate than it has ever been since our political separation from that country. In that state of things, I fear that our publishers must sink beneath the competition of superior skill and capital: that the whole business of publication will be transferred by a process not easily evaded, or countervailed, to trans-Atlantic labor and enterprise. Large capitals, it is evident, require a smaller percentage of profit, and this advantage England possesses beyond any country in the world. In addition to this, her capitalists can always command the services of artisans of consummate skill and at the lowest wages. Having the ascendancy over us in these important particulars, her publishers can appropriate out of the proceeds of any work, a more liberal allowance for the labor of an author, and still leave a residuum sufficient to defray the usual profits of their business. Moreover, when authors have the privilege of Copyright in both countries, they will be sure to publish in that where they will incur the smallest pecuniary risk, and where literary property can be most readily disposed of for adequate prices. In all these aspects Britain has the preëminence over the United States, and must, in the absence of any restriction, absorb the literary traffic of both countries. Our legislature will, I doubt not, endeavor to counteract this natural and inevitable course of things by the imposition of heavy discriminating duties on books of British manufacture; but the trans-Atlantic publisher may easily elude such regulations, however cautiously contrived, by transporting a portion of his capital and business to the United States. With a foot thus planted, as it were, on each side of the ocean, he may defy legislative restraint, and drive with impunity all American competitors from the market. Without meaning to question the motives, or the intelligence of those who differ with me on this subject, it seems to me, I confess, a strange hallucination, that American citizens should, zealously, and I doubt not honestly, recommend a policy to the approval of their own government, which, without any equivalent of honor, or profit to themselves, sacrifices the interest of a numerous body of their countrymen to the promotion of foreign literature and enterprise.

The tendency of International Copyright to augment the price of books and diminish their circulation furnishes, in the opinion of your correspondent, E. D., no argument against the adoption of that measure, because cheap literature is, in his estimation, an evil to be eschewed, and whatever is calculated to suppress it, is a blessing to be desired. But why is it an evil? Because, says E. D., it disseminates dissolute books among the people, and thereby corrupts the public morals. In his view it is an engine impotent for good, but infinitely fertile in mischief. Why are vicious works printed and circulated? Simply because there is a demand for them. But there is an infinitely greater demand for good and useful works, and, as profit is the moving principle of the cheap press, the presumption is, (unless we embrace the improbable belief that men will do mischief, not merely gratuitous, but against their own interest,) that a much larger number of the latter kind will be printed and circulated. And if the annals of cheap literature be consulted, do we not find the fact to correspond with this conclusion? When printing was substituted for the slow process of manual transcription, and books were multiplied with an increased celerity, and diminished cost before that time unprecedented, a reduction of prices, much greater and more sudden, took place in the literary market than has occurred at any subsequent period; but was that reduction succeeded by a deluge of impure works, and the consequent debasement of moral sentiment? On the contrary, has not the mental illumination, produced by that great event, wrought a gradual and constant amelioration of manners and morals in every successive generation to the present age? And yet, I doubt not, the enemies of change at that time, always prone to gloomy forebodings, augured, from the discovery of printing, similar, perhaps more disastrous, consequences than are ascribed by E. D. to our cheap system of publication, and with just the same degree of plausibility. In whatever mode books are communicated to the world, whether by manuscript, or the press, loose productions will be written and circulated, so long as wicked men are found who delight in such disgusting compositions. If the press panders to such a depraved appetite, it ministers, on the other hand, to the noblest faculties and propensities of our nature. If it presents the base, it also furnishes the antidote.

Because a few vulgar, or immoral works have been issued by the manufacturers of cheap books, E. D. attributes such an occurrence to the inherent vices of the system, and is filled with alarm, lest this prolific monster should overrun society with the same filthy brood. As well might it be affirmed, that the dearth of books in the reign of Charles the second was the cause of the licentious writings of that period. The juxtaposition of two successive events by no means justifies the inference, that the one was the effect of the other: else there would be no absurdity in the logic of the Englishman, who maintained that Tenterden's step was the cause of Goodwin sands. The truth is, as I have already remarked, a vicious age will always beget immoral writings, because those who write and publish for profit, will inevitably cater to the prevailing taste. Such works will never disappear from the literary market, until there is a thorough and total reformation of manners.

If there be any strength in his objections to cheap literature, does not E. D. perceive that International Copyright, which he proposes as a remedy, is wholly incommensurate to the virulence of the disease? While he would shield contemporary books from this abomination, he leaves the whole field of literature, from the revival of letters to the beginning of the eighteenth century, open to the invader. What obstacle does International Copyright interpose to the publication of the works of Rousseau, Smollett, Fielding, Farquhar, Congreve, Wycherly, and a host of others in the cheap form imaginable? And will he say, that modern depravity has produced any thing comparable to these in obscenity, in abandoned licentiousness, in audacious contempt for all the decencies of life? There is nothing in the whole range of modern literature parallel to these foul performances in grossness of language, in shameless profligacy; and yet, notwithstanding their disgusting ribaldry and open derision of the most sacred obligations, the brilliancy of wit and the magic of eloquence have combined to shed a fascination, a splendor around them, which have almost extinguished our innate abhorrence of their pestilential and demoralizing principles. Such a perversion of genius would never have occurred in a sound state of public opinion, and is much more the effect than the cause of moral contamination. Though the literature of the present age is not free from this reproach, and never will be until vicious passions are eradicated from the human heart, yet the licentious writer is constrained by the refinement of modern taste to render an involuntary homage to virtue by disguising his impurities, and clothing his insidious lessons in a garb less offensive. The famous remark of Burke, that "vice loses all its evil by losing half its grossness," though liable to the charge of rhetorical exaggeration, is not wholly destitute of truth. The change I have adverted to in the character of modern books, is to be attributed to a more healthy state of moral sentiment; and this salutary revolution has been wrought, notwithstanding the constant circulation of profligate writings, composed by men of the first order of talent, and notwithstanding the rapid decline in the cost of literature produced by new mechanical inventions, the cheapness of labor, and the accumulation of capital. When, therefore, E. D. stigmatizes our cheap literature as the vehicle of immorality, and indulges in such gloomy vaticinations as to its pernicious tendencies, I must be allowed, with all due respect, to express my incredulity.

I do not participate, I confess, in the apprehensions of those worthy people, who are filled with consternation at the sight of licentious books; who shrink from them as from the touch of a poisonous reptile; who believe that the whole mass of society will be polluted by their perusal; and who, therefore, declaim with such vehemence against their propagation. That they are productive of some evil I will not deny; but, while I would willingly remove this reproach from literature, I cannot concur in ascribing to it such a baneful and predominating influence on the characters of men. If such an incurable taint is imparted to the mind by immodest images and expressions, by an acquaintance with the language and principles of vice, our condition would be wretched indeed; for the best of us have seen and heard enough of such things to corrupt a saint, and our only resource would be to renounce all intercourse with the world as the sole chance of escaping contamination. To expect that in the crowded theatre of human affairs, in the active bustle of life where we must be jostled by men of every shade and variety of character, all improper ideas and objects can be banished from our observation, is altogether utopian and visionary. Experience should teach us to dismiss these imaginary fears, which would drive men from the path of social duty and immure them in the cell of the anchorite. The most blameless men and women in the circle of my acquaintance have occasionally read works of this description, nor has this casual indiscretion left upon their minds the slightest visible trace of corruption. Apart from the superhuman influences of religion, there is in virtuous natures a principle of vitality which works itself clear of these impurities, and repels the adhesion of all that is foul or loathsome.

Evil into the mind of God or man
May come and go, so unapprov'd, and leave
No spot or blame behind.

The danger from such things consists, not so much in a momentary acquaintance with them, as in familiarizing to the mind by frequent repetition, the vulgar language and seductive images which serve as the conduits of their subtle poison. A disposition to do this, indicates a nature already depraved. Far from handling these disgusting implements of vice, a man of unsophisticated feelings would recoil from them with fear and detestation. Upon the whole, if the prodigious influence on human character, imputed to these foul excretions of the press had a real existence, instead of the improvement which has actually taken place, there would, evidently, have been a constant deterioration of public morals in all the nations of Christendom.

In controverting some of the opinions advanced by your correspondents, I have not been wanting, I trust, in the courtesy due to gentlemen and scholars. As compositions, the essays of E. D. and Mr. Simms are worthy of all commendation, and many of their sentiments meet with my hearty concurrence. I regret, however, to observe, that Mr. Simms has fallen into the illiberal practise of vilifying England, of holding her up as "our hereditary enemy," of representing her whole intercourse with us as a tissue of mean jealousy and insidious hostility. It has become a fashion of late years, I know, in this country to heap every abusive epithet on the English nation and government, to discover in their most indifferent actions the traces of some deep and dangerous design against our interests; and public opinion is rapidly approaching that point, when an American, who refuses to join in such indiscriminate invective, will only incur odium, and expose his patriotism to suspicion. These ebullitions of distrust and resentment can serve no purpose but to embitter the feelings and indanger the peaceful relations of two countries bound together by the strongest ties, and, considering our commercial rivalry, will be attributed by many to the malignant impulses of spite and envy. Let the unthinking mob on both sides the Atlantic, inflamed by the tirades of hireling scribblers and designing politicians, exhaust the vocabulary of Billingsgate in mutual recrimination; but let not the men of sense and education in either country lend their aid to swell the savage outcry, or forget the reciprocal obligations of candor and justice. A generous mind frankly applauds even the virtues of an enemy, and disdains to wreak an ignoble revenge by disparaging his reputation. But is England, as Mr. Simms asserts, our hereditary enemy? True, we have waged two wars with that country; but we are now at peace, and a "brave man should forget in peace the injuries of war." By blood and by inheritance she is not our foe, but linked to us by the ties of kindred, of a common language, a common ancestry, and these ties are strengthened and cemented by the still firmer ligaments of mutual interest. Let us, then, speak of her without rancour, and in a spirit of fair, of even liberal appreciation. When she insults, or injures us, let us demand reparation in bold and manly language; let us be prepared to encounter the last extremity, rather than submit to an infringement of our rights; but let us scorn to engage in a war of words, to bandy vile epithets, to retort the scurrility of her venal presses with congenial ribaldry. True dignity, we should remember, is equally remote from truckling servility and gasconading defiance.

England has great faults and great virtues; but she has transmitted to her offspring in this country whatever of good, or evil distinguishes her national character. She has impressed on us the indelible marks of her maternity; and when she sneers at our deformities, she derides the faithful reflection of her own image. We should pardon her overbearing pride, her all-grasping cupidity, since the rudiments of the same vices are to be found in our own bosoms; but we may justly exult in the inheritance of her dauntless enterprize, her ardent love of freedom, her indomitable spirit of independence. We should remember, that when other countries bent the knee to despotism, England remained erect and fearless; that when political darkness brooded over Europe, liberty found her last resting-place in that fast-anchored isle. The spark of freedom, nursed by our forefathers in the toils and dangers of the wilderness, and transmitted to us by those hardy adventurers, was kindled at her altars. The representative system, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, institutions which lie at the foundation of all free government, are part of that splendid inheritance bequeathed us by our British ancestors. Contrast our character and situation with that of the colonies planted by other European States, and we shall at once perceive the value of our descent. England may be fierce in anger and unrelenting in hate; she may have been guilty of lawless violence and injustice, but nothing base or insidious belongs to her character. It is a soil where treachery cannot take root. No country can produce a more illustrious throng of pious, enlightened, brave and generous men; such a galaxy of genius in science and letters. Such a nation is not to be despised; and, despite the railings of prejudice and passion, it must always be our greatest boast, that we share her blood, and are not unworthy of our lineage.

THE DEAD MAN'S RACE.*

BY W. GARDNER BLACKWOOD.

A moral this my tale combines,
A truth from bad example taen;
Which, to youth told at evening time,
For like pursuits the eager wish
May antedote, and serve to wain.

The Pilgrim: A Tale

Over a wild and trackless moor,
Homeward-bound, an honest boor
Urged on his jaded steed;
The sun was sinking down to rest
On th' bosom of the blushing west,
And o'er the earth, dark shadows prest
Along with quick'ning speed.

The bat went flapping round and round,
Dense gnat-clouds, with a murmurous sound,
Waved in the fetid air;
And in some stunted pine-tree hid,
Shrill cried the gauze-wing'd Katy-did,
To answering cricket's chirp, that chid
The silence broken there.

*The subject of this poem was a short anecdote read by the author in some now forgotten journal a few years past.

And whip-poor-will, with plaint of wo,
 Hung o'er the marsh, whose sedge below
 Frogs creak'd in sullen mood;
 Whilst might be seen oft, here and there,
 Some lonesome bird, that scanty fare
 Found in the wither'd fern and bare
 Soil of the solitude.

Apace, blind night, abroad the sky,
 Veil'd e'en these objects from the eye
 In pall that mock'd the sight;
 The stars, that but a moment shone,
 From out the firmament were gone,
 And the Queen-Moon shed from her throne
 A wan and ghastly light.

The night was chill; scarce through the dark,
 Shimmer'd the fire fly's fitful spark
 Above the grassless plain;
 Anon, big drops of rain fell fast;
 White vapors rose like genii vast,
 And th' fingers of th' winnowing blast
 Play'd with the steed's loose mane.

On went the farmer, his mind fraught
 With visions wild, by fancy wrought,
 Of fiend and spectre grim;
 The goblin tales of boyish years,
 By Memory whisper'd to his ears,
 Roused in his heart its midnight fears
 Of a dark fate for him.

He saw, cast wide in fitful change,
 The mandrake's charnel fires strange;
 Jack with the lantern shone.
 High on a crazy gibbet, hung
 In heavy chains, that clanking rung,
 To and fro a skeleton swung
 With dull and mournful tone.

His fever'd brain delirious grew;
 Red sparks, with many a gairish hue,
 In circles round him spread;
 And shapes, to his distemper'd eye,
 From realm of dream came wandering by,
 In garbs that rustled horribly,
 Like crisp leaves o'er the dead.

Some old tune whistled, loud he sung;
 His voice in clamorous echoes rung,
 It startled him the more;
 He bent him to the howling blast,
 That told of tempest gathering fast,
 And press'd the steed, whose rein he clasp'd,
 E'en swifter than before.

From cloud-sheath black the Storm-God drew
 His lightning blade; that flaming, threw
 Around a ruddy glare;
 Asudden, saw the boor, at hand,
 With joy, a sheltering cottage stand,
 And were dispell'd the spirit-band
 With inward matter'd prayer.

From the wet saddle to the ground
 He straightway leap'd with nervous bound,
 And smote the half closed door;
 No voice return'd; he push'd it back;
 Revolv'd the hinge with jarring crack,
 And a faint starbeam found a track
 Across the gloom-spread floor.

He entered there; an owl scared out
 The crumbling wall, flapp'd round-about,
 With shrill Tu-whit Tu-whoo;
 A snake wound up the tottering roof,
 A spider left its swinging woof,
 And a foul toad, from these aloof,
 Close in a corner drew.

He groped about; just then, her light
 The Queen-Moon shed forth, clear and bright,
 Through mist-caul parted wide;
 A straggling ray, like spirit tall,
 Glided along the cottage wall,
 And swept its sombre hanging pall
 With white-robed arms aside.

Cold shrunk th' roots of his bristling hair,
 Blanch'd his numb cheek, grew fix'd his stare,
 Ceased his heart-pulse to beat:
 With sweaty brow and curdled blood,
 In formless horror wrapp'd, he stood,
 As coffin'd, shrouded white, was view'd
 A stark corpse at his feet.

Again the dreary heath he scours;
 But now, 'neath mantle murk, air-powers
 About him seem'd to fly;
 With eyeless skulls, before, behind,
 Shapes strove his rushing limbs to bind
 In fetters forged from the weird wind,
 That menacing went by.

The tempest, from the lowering cloud
 That wrapp'd its slumber-like death-shroud,
 Has woke to raging strife;
 Broad sheets of lurid flame flashed light
 Through marble halls of black-browed night,
 And deep-voiced thunders, in dread might,
 Leap with electric life.

A rainy deluge showers fast,
 Until the waste, like-ocean vast,
 Gleams with phosphoric glare;
 Each dark-cloak'd tree bends low its head
 Beneath the storm-god's angry tread,
 And leaves and crackling branches dead
 Whirl through the fear-struck air.

With arms about his steed's neck flung,
 Closer and closer th' farmer clung,
 As broke the thunder-peals;
 Suddenly, smote his ears a sound
 Like his called name, he look'd around,
 And lo! came rumbling o'er the ground
 A coffin set on wheels.

Upon the lid a demon lies,
 With forked tongue and lidless eyes,
 And tail in arrowy pride;
 Blue lambent fires blaze on its brow,
 Around it spreads a sulphurous glow,
 And it nods like horse-plume, to and fro,
 Some unseen power to guide.

Right onward press'd the steed's wild race;
 Right onward held the spectral chase,
 Over the gleaming waste;
 Through red-seeth'd pools, with flashing sound,
 The snorting courser's wing'd hoofs bound,
 And they clatter o'er the turfy ground
 In hot and breathless haste.

Fled heaven above, fled earth below,
Flash'd the white foam as on they go
With whizzing sounds and din;
Like ghosts, unhallowed, from the tomb,
Frore mists glide rustling through the gloom,
Chill winding-sheets for those whose doom
Not earthly goal must win.

The farmer wax'd still deadlier pale;
The laboring courser's strength gan fail,
The death-fiend neared his side;
It twitch'd his loosely flying rein,
Clutch'd at his steed's erected mane,
And struggled fiercely, nor in vain,
To stay the ghastly ride.

A loud shriek from his pent up breast
Frighted the night-bird to her nest.
He fell upon the ground;
On the cold sod he senseless lay
Through that dread night; the coming day,
His helpless form was borne away,
By friendly rustics found.

A burning fever on his brain,
His reason's voice forever seal'd—
In lucid intervals of pain,
The farmer this strange tale reveal'd.
Some said he at a neighboring fair
The eve of that dire night was seen;
That pledging gay companions there
In madding bowls, he late had been;
And that the spirit fiend had wrought
The scenes with which his mind was fraught.
But even supposing that such was the case,
There were many believed in THE DEAD MAN'S RACE.

PRETENSION.

CHAPTER IV.

"The only amaranthine flower on earth
Is virtue; the only lasting treasure truth."

[Cowper.

— "Above all, to thine own self be true—
Thou canst not then be false to any one."—Shakspeare.

Almeria arose the next morning after the party in unwonted good humor with herself and the whole world. Her dreams had been the brightest, for they were of love and Sinclair. Ministering spirits of good hovered around her—'tis true, in those visions she saw that dark and turbid stream flowing between youth and old maidenhood, but which she could then view with self-satisfied composure, no longer harassed by the awful fear of plunging into its chilling deadly waters. Her fairy feet had just touched lightly on its barren and dreary banks, when lo! Cupid gently placed her on his wing: the next scene was, she stood beside Hymen's altar, whereon the little urchin was busily lighting a torch. It blazed high—she grasped the hand of a noble being beside her, the light revealed the speaking face of Sinclair, and again she grasped his hand, when lo! the bright scene faded away—she awoke, and found it was the bed-post. But then fond memory came to her aid—she whispered 'twas not all a dream, for Sinclair had indeed proposed, and on that very morning she was to consult ma chère mère. It was not at all surprising that an earlier hour than usual found her in the breakfast room. As she was giving an animated description to her mother of the Brownalows' attempt and of its perfect failure a note was handed Mrs. Clifton, which she opened and read.

"Mr. Edward Lorimor's respects to Mrs. Clifton and begs permission to wait upon her this morning, when he solicits a few moments of private conversation upon a subject of the utmost importance to him."

"What can it be about," exclaimed Mrs. C., bending a scrutinizing glance upon the pale and agitated Almeria, whose heart, although so ice-bound by selfishness and dissimulation, now throbbed with emotions of the most intense interest.

"I hope, Almeria," continued she, (her suspicions confirmed by her daughter's evident and unusual agitation,) "you have not been guilty of a thoughtlessness so absurd as encouraging the addresses of such a parvenue as Edward Lorimer! I presume some ecclaiçissement took place last night, and you referred him to me. I have recently admonished and warned you of my situation, and I now repeat my unanswerable objection to your wedding a poor man. This I shall certainly apprise him of and, if possible, remedy any difficulty, however far you may have gone."

Mrs. C. immediately despatched an answer of acquiescence to Mr. Lorimor, and awaited his appearance with unusual vexation and disquiet.

Almeria did not choose to undeceive her mother as to their supposed ecclaiçissement, or to inform her of his conduct towards her at the party, which might instantly have changed the current of her suspicions—for her vanity, which passion, "like Aaron's serpent, swallowed every other" within her bosom, immediately suggested the dear delightful thought, that it was materially connected with herself Mr. L. had sought the interview. She remembered how very punctilious his notions were, for he had arrived at that cold and formal age when men are always so in affairs de coeur. Doubtless he had suppressed his feelings, when he seemed so indifferent to her, and had withheld the dear confession of his love, only to secure the approbation of her mother.

What a tide of thick and coming fancies rushed o'er her mind when alone in her chamber where she had retired to array herself in the most bewitching morning costume, intending to accidentally appear before Edward had left. "Yes," said illoquized she, "he fears to leap the precipice."

all obstacles are removed—he thinks I am so obedient, and he cannot be insensible to mamma's coolness of manner whenever she has surprised us in a tête-à-tête. But what am I to do with Sinclair? He is richer, younger, and apparently of higher birth and ton than Edward—he certainly would be a more eligible match—still, how can the heart of woman be swayed by interest when she loves, for it is in vain to strive against the truth, that I do love Lorimor—yes, love him with a fervor almost incompatible with my nature. It is strangely disinterested, and if I do not marry him, ambition and pride will find me a blighted victim at their shrine. Would that I had made one effort to pacify mamma's aroused ire—but I was in such a flutter of unaccountable anxiety, I could not for my life have ventured a dissenting word; however, Edward's heart is made of such stern constancy, he will not be daunted by maternal opposition, the flame will only burn the brighter from attempts to extinguish it. Well, I must bide the result."

Edward Lorimor was not tardy in availing himself of the privilege Mrs. Clifton's answer granted, and scarce had her messenger returned, when he entered the parlor where that lady sat, more erect with dignity and self-possession than a band of inexorable judges. His manner betrayed much embarrassment, but he soon regained his usual calm demeanor on perceiving the stateliness of hers. His salutation was received with all due politeness and graceful ease.

"You are probably not aware, madam," commenced he, after mustering his courage to enter upon a matter so agitating, "that I have sought this interview to secure your approving consent to my engagement and union with —."

"I would willingly have spared you the pain and mortification of a refusal on my part, and although I regret my candor compels me to allege an objection, still I must be excused if I acknowledge an insuperable one to any engagement subsisting for the present."

"You will please name it," returned Edward with calm hauteur,—"perhaps I may remove it—for having been accepted, and feeling confident I am loved, I cannot resign my claims merely from some nameless objection."

"If she has been so thoughtless as to thus bind herself to one without apprizing me of so doing, I feel it incumbent upon me to disannul any engagement when I cannot sanction it. You must regard it as a hasty step attributable to youth and inexperience."

"She is certainly very young, and totally inexperienced in the tutored ways of the world. Ere I dared to breathe my love to her I examined well my own heart and considered those obstacles which I feared a disparity of our ages would probably give rise to—but they are removed in the assurance of her entire confidence and love. You will not be surprised, when I again repeat my resolution not to resign my claims—while I assure you, my happiness would be increased by your approval of our union."

Mrs. Clifton drew up herself in her most imposing manner, as she replied—"I have ever been accustomed to entire and implicit obedience from those over whom I feel it my duty to exercise a proper authority, and in a matter so important as the present one, I do not anticipate any disregard of my advice—I must, then, positively, and for the last time, decline any such proposal from you for my daughter."

At first, Edward Lorimor's face expressed the utmost chagrin and indignation, but as the concluding words, "my daughter," fell on his attentive ear, it was almost impossible to bite away the smile that involuntarily hung upon his lip when thus made aware of the awkward predicament arising from his not having been sufficiently explicit in the outset. It was with considerable relief that he immediately and respectfully replied—

"It appears that we have mistaken each other, owing to my awkward embarrassment. It is to your protégée, Miss Beaufort, that I desire your consent to my union."

It now became Mrs. Clifton's turn to look astonished. She actually started from her seat with consternation, while she shrieked—

"Evora Beaufort!—what a prodigious contre-temps. I am, nevertheless, still inclined to regard you with dubieté—for surely you are jesting when you say you have wooed and won her love under my very eye without consulting me—a mere child too! Impossible sir!"

"I hardly can think you have so unjust an opinion of my character, Mrs. Clifton, as to suppose I would be guilty of jesting upon a subject so important to me, and concerning the happiness of a being so pure-minded and dependent upon my respectful protection as Evora Beaufort is. I have long loved her, and although a mere child when her estimable aunt died—yet, even then, I felt she had entwined herself around my affections with a power and sympathy different from any I had ever felt for any living being. I only feared the disparity of our ages would forbid a full return of my idolatrous love—but I am blessed with her whole confidence, and an assurance of her first and warmest affection. I am, therefore, resolved to marry her, and any further attempt on your part to oppose our union I shall deem unjust and ungenerous—for your authority or responsibility I regard not superior to my own. Courtesy alone induced me to request your approbation, but it now prevents any longer continuance of our interview—I bid you good morning."

Edward Lorimor had hardly shut the hall door, when Mrs. Clifton hurriedly entered the adjoining room, where she saw Almeria pale with anger and mortification standing near the door ajar—having heard every word that had passed.

"Did you ever hear of such impertinence as Edward Lorimor has dared to offer me—to defy my authority. What absurd vanity in supposing one so old as he could be sincerely loved by that child. I've no doubt it was all arranged by her ambitious aunt before she died—and she, so young, to practise such consummate art." Mrs. Clifton rung the bell furiously. "Send Evora Beaufort to me instantly," was her order to the servant.

Trembling with fear and timidity, Evora entered—alternately pale and crimson was her innocent face as she stood before the stern and enraged looking Mrs. Clifton.

"Your very confusion is proof of your guilt, Miss," said she vehemently—"to be so artful and designing towards one to whom you are even indebted for a charitable protection. Encouraging your venerable and loving suitor without having paid me the common respect of consulting my advice and approbation. I suppose you thought I would rejoice in your very good luck, you ungrateful, intriguing girl; a pretty return truly for my three years' charity and patience towards one so heedless and troublesome." Mrs. C. was compelled to pause in her tirade for the want of breath.

"No wonder my pelerine was not finished last night, when she was so agreeably monopolized by love, and returning vows of unchangeable affection," scornfully remarked Almeria, with a look of the deepest vengeance. "I never heard of so much 'soft deceit' in one so young—you actually deserve a diploma in the school of dissimulation. Pray may I inquire how long the interesting and mighty plot has been working, provided you could frame a truthful answer."

But Almeria's question could not have been addressed to one more immovably silent. Not a word escaped the terrified, dumb-struck girl, who looked as if an opening of the floor beneath her feet, would have been a blissful relief from the torrent of angry passions showered upon her innocent head. Whether her silence arose from alarm or indignation—so it was, Mrs. Clifton did not deign to wait for her to recover herself.

"Oh! I presume all those delightful morning rambles may now be well accounted for. It was infinite happiness to roam o'er hill and vale with one so congenial—and even while I was worshipping my Creator in his holy sanctuary,—little dreaming of the wily serpent I was then cherishing—you were at home, in my own house, planning all your guilty intrigues, with the juvenile Mr. Lorimor to assist you. But mark this truth—deceit and falsehood never yet brought happiness to those who sought it 'neath such a hideous visor. My confidence in you is entirely gone, and nothing now would be too incredible for me to believe you guilty of"—

"Do, mamma, let the artful creature look out for another home—your charity has already suffered too long, and for the sake of your daughter you ought to discard one of such dangerous character. I tremble to be exposed any longer to such contaminating influences."

Almeria's last remark seemed to move Evora more than all their ventings of rage and injustice.

"Indeed, madam," replied she proudly—but with dignity—"I wonder that in such an atmosphere of dissimulation and heartlessness I have preserved my own heart from its blighting and unhallowed taint. I owe you the semblance of protection, but nothing to real kindness or friendship—and I now boldly, but justly, throw back upon you and your daughter, the truth of every unfeeling charge you have dared to insultingly offer me. 'With your own hearts confer' and see whether I now speak the truth. I would deem myself utterly unworthy of my own self-approbation, as also of the estimable instruction of my lamented aunt, were I to remain any longer a dependent, as you say, upon a charity, so false and hollow-hearted."

Evora had turned to leave the room, while her companions looked petrified at so unexpected a display of independent firmness in one, who had never before dared to demean herself, other than in the most meek and submissive manner. A proud and towering form emerged from the door, that had remained ajar, aghast and more trembling than the innocent Evora—their glance rested upon Edward Lorimor. Giving them both a quiet but withering look, he approached the equally astonished Evora, and taking her hand said, in a clear, manly voice—"You have indeed, dear, admirable girl, proved yourself worthy of your name, and of that valuable tuition so happily bestowed upon your earlier years. Fear not, 'malice ever drinks half its poison,' and you," added he, turning to Mrs. Clifton and Almeria, "may well now look the character you have so glowingly and truly ascribed to 'Heaven's own prototype of perfect womanhood.' I pity your present shame and deeply dyed guilt, while I despise your deceitful and ignoble pretensions. I was an unwilling listener to all you have so wantonly and cruelly showered upon this innocent and pure-hearted girl, having returned, fearing I had rather hastily and carelessly left,—the servant informed me I would find you here, but your unfeminine passion and malicious injustice rendered you insensible to every thing, save their guilty indulgence."

Mrs. Clifton and her daughter in vain essayed a contemptuous retort, but it was beyond their lips' utterance—a few moments found them alone with their humiliation, and withering 'neath the scorpion lash of conscience.

"Well," cried Almeria, "what's done can't be undone. I hope, dear mamma, the next proposal made for your consent will not be subjected to a dénouement so disastrous and unexpected." She then apprized Mrs. C. of Sinclair's offer, which tended greatly to smooth the deeply indented furrows on the brow of the disappointed, worldly-minded mother, and contributed to disperse the pangs of her remorse and self reproof. No one to have seen her gentle mein and amiable countenance a few hours afterwards, when listening to Mr. Sinclair's "honor of an alliance with her charming and deeply adored daughter" would have thought her "coined face" the same that had flashed such dire looks of scorn upon the orphan and her noble lover.

All due explanations and arrangements were made on the part of the wealthy and dashing Sinclair—while the fondly assenting mamma begged he would tenderly cherish her only child, whose youth and inexperience would probably give him some anxious care. She had ever been an exotic of the most doating attention and protection—however, I feel confident, concluded she, "that I commit her to one who can support her in her accustomed ease, and cherish her with the same fostering tenderness."

"The charming Almeria was not more willing to accept me than ma chère mère," said Sinclair when he left Mrs. C.—"but 'tis strange, every thing, and all subjects were discussed but the marriage portion—those expectations of the sole heiress! I hope the biter won't get bit—surely there can't be any pretension about their wealth and style of living. Aristocracy and fashion wont shoe the feet, or make the pot boil, as an homely adage says—but I dare say, with the fair and accomplished Almeria I shall receive a comfortable marriage douaire. The deuce knows it wont come before it is wanting—so hie thee on, ye little god!—be ever so speedy in thy arrangements for the very necessary noce."

It was not long afterwards a handsome carriage stood before the door of Mrs. Clifton's elegant mansion, into which Edward Lorimor handed the blushing Evora,—another drew up, more splendid, and mounted with livried attendants, in which the stately Mrs. C. was gracefully assisted by Mr. Sinclair—both drove off and again halted before St. Paul's church. A few persons were assembled around the altar, and soon the pastor, in his flowing robes, came forth to meet the advancing couple. Edward Lorimor never looked younger, handsomer, or happier, and if the reader could only have impertinently peered 'neath that jealous veil of the trembling Evora, he would have seen a face equally as happy, but whose loveliness was beyond expression's power to paint, so eloquent was it with delicate emotions. After the ceremony was over, all hearts offered their warmest congratulations, but the pressure of Mrs. Clifton's hand was coldly slight, and her eye glanced frowningly upon the young bride when she uttered her parting friendly wishes. Notwithstanding her chilling looks, Edward and Evora would look and feel happy—and without the least emotion, even of revengeful indifference, towards the charitable Cliftons, they left for a distant city, which was to be their future home. Happiness attend you, and may you ever continue to preserve in your hearts, untarnished, that brightest of jewels, truth—for "out of the heart proceed the issues of life."

Come, reader, if you are not already wearied, we will bid you attend another interesting ceremony, which, perhaps, may gratify your taste for the splendid and a la mode more than the plain and unpretending nuptials of Edward and Evora Lorimor. It is the wedding déjeuné of Almeria Clifton and the elegant Sinclair that we will now look in upon with our usual familiarity. Never was a bride more magnificently arrayed in embroidered muslin and mechin lace, and exquisite was every arrangement of her graceful person. Sinclair had not been remiss in the slightest act of devotion. A richly wrought casket had that morning been laid on her bridal toilet (it contained a splendid set of pearls, as also a beautiful corbeille, from which she drew a veil of surpassing elegance—they were from her generous fiancé. With a look of exultation and gratified pride, Almeria's fair hand soon arranged both with her rich dark hair, and after the toilet's all-engrossing duties were over, she breathlessly awaited the coming of her noble, refined Sinclair. Nor was he slow to appear, looking in truth the "glass of fashion and the mould of form." All the taste of the most fashionable tailor and perruquier in the city had been called into requisition, and well did his appearance justify their highest touch. Fashion never decked or smiled more graciously upon a more elegant looking couple. All of beauty, wit and ton were gathered to witness the much talked of nuptials. Not an accident or annoyance ruffled the pride and dignified equanimity of the fond mother, or the amour propre of the graceful bride, and after a tide of good wishes and a scene of affectionate outpourings from ma chère mère, all astonished, every one saw the happy couple start off to spend their honey moon in travelling. Alas! Sinclair, your expecting hand received no comfortable douaire—nay, not even a word, or note, of promise. "Never mind," thought he, "when we return it will be all in due form settled, which assuredly must be in a short time, for my borrowed funds can't last long."

"Well, well, people now-a-days have turned the world upside down, and wrong side out," said Mr. Brownslow, throwing down his morning's paper. "Here, wife, read about this 'marriage in high life.' I suppose when our gals get married you will be fool enough to do like old Mrs. Clifton, and give a dayshuna wedding, instead of a good old-fashioned one at night. If you are guilty of such ridiculous folly, may all the French sworay be a mere nothing in mortifying you. But I hope better things, seeing you and the girls had enough then of your pretensions and efforts to climb the mighty hill of fashion and getting into the first circles."

"I am truly rejoiced it is all over," echoed Mrs. Clifton, as she sat alone in her handsome parlor, after laying down the paper announcing the splendid wedding déjeuné of Miss Clifton and Mr. Sinclair. "It cost enough, Heaven knows! but he must help me to pay for it—which, doubtless, he can easily do—so great appears his wealth. I will break up now and make, I hope, a final move. I mean to spend the balance of my days with Almeria, for she has hardly left me half of the principal of my stock. Well, it was properly expended, all to secure her an eligible match, and as I have so well supported my pretensions, she must finish the picture. How the world has been deceived!"

The reader has only to read two letters, to see whether in Almeria's bright future was completed the picture to the entire satisfaction of her ambitious mother, and of her own high hopes.

FROM ALMERIA TO HER MOTHER.

"Sympathize with me, ma chère mère, for never was a poor creature so cruelly duped—nay, so utterly ruined in her every hope or prospect of happiness. Oh, what a fall from my once bright elevation—what an awful pause in my worldly career, to end the whole eventful scene in being the wife of a low-born parvenu shoe-maker's son, who has even had the audacity to tell me I must now go to binding shoes, instead of practising my music, or embroidering my useful ottomans. Yes, Mamma, you can now only boast of being the mother-in-law of a most shameful impostor. Not even the aristocratic name of Sinclair is left me; in its place stares on his coarse sign Joseph Sniggery. He has confessed the whole of his nefarious plot to me, that he married me for my money and ton, and after mutual recriminations of having been grossly deceived, he added that his art had not only supported high birth, talents and wealth, but of youth also, whereupon he doffed his Hyperion curls! Oh, horrors! I saw a wig lie at my feet, and falling along those matchless whiskers, while his hand extended towards my terrified vision, a fine set of teeth, those exquisite rows of ivory, and with the other he maliciously wiped from his face its spurious covering of paint, revealing a jaune sunken cheek and cadaverous complexion instead of the fresh and manly beauty of my once god-like mari. Besides all this inhuman deception, his family is so low and coarsely plebeian, the Brownslows would appear the personification of refinement by contrast—all his knowledge of French and foreign countries was gained when secretly following a gentleman of high standing to Paris as a pauvre humble serving compagnon de voyage. But this is not all—imagine my mortification and deep humiliation when I see from the close, pent up room of an upper story, Evora Lorimor daily whirl past me in a splendid equipage, looking the picture of happiness, as her eye rests upon her handsome husband at her side, who, to my infinite surprise, is one of the wealthiest and most influential lawyers in the city. 'Farewell, a long farewell to all my greatness.' May I not come to you, ma chère mère, to relieve my heart of its heavy weight of accumulated disappointments, and to escape from the noxious odor of leather, varnish, and the contamination of coarse vulgarity? Your own Almeria S—.

Never, no never can I write that horrid name in place of Sinclair or Clifton."

FROM EDWARD LORIMOR TO HIS FRIEND LOUIS MONTAIGNE.

"I hasten to answer your eager and many questions respecting my romantic marriage to the portionless protégée of Mrs. Clifton. The want of wealth was her only deficiency—the purest blood flows in her veins—the best of mental and moral instruction was bestowed upon her by her sainted aunt, and her beauty,—you know it is heavenly—besides all this I occupied the interesting position of guardian, mentor and friend at the solicitation of Miss Catharine Beaufort, who was my lamented mother's intimate friend, as also her parents, who died when Evora was a mere infant. Could I do otherwise than love her, and if I did, has it ever been my practice to weigh happiness in the opposite scale with mercenary interest? Never—and all that's bright in life now shines upon my pathway—I find her all that I wish, without a shade of false pretension, and free from the base alloy of worldly deceit. I would not woo her as the rich Edward Lorimor, on whom a few fleeting smiles of fickle fame had been bestowed, but I chose to seek and win her love for myself alone, and such I now warmly possess. I have emerged from my pretended obscurity as a poor lawyer—but the splendors surrounding my young wife never seem to throw in the shade the merits of her sedate, and, as she often says, "venerable mari." A truce to egotistical confessions. I'm sorry to hear of the downfall of the aristocratic Cliftons, but 'pride is the best looking glass for pride'—and such does, 'indeed, go before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.' It gives me pain, and often casts a shadow o'er the fair brow of Evora, when we hear such sad accounts of the disappointed Almeria, whose husband has consented to Mrs. Clifton's living with him, provided she bears a portion of the domestic expenses. But enough of them—it may be a lesson for them to look more to the cultivation of the heart, which alone contains those powers, capable of ensuring our happiness—while malice or deceit never yet has retained an invulnerable mask. I am glad to hear a better result attended the stumble of the Brownslows—or, as the good old man says, that their 'eyes are properly opened,' for really they were not wanting in good feelings,—and but for pretension, the girls would have reflected credit on themselves and honor on their parents. You say that Mons. Pierre has completely retired from fashionable société, and is now in the full enjoyment of literary celibacy? For the sake of the fair, I hope, unless he becomes reasonable, that he will continue alone in his intellectual seclusion. I wish all possible happiness to the languishing Emilie, as the wife of a plain coach-maker, and Josee, affectionate Josee, I have no doubt will make a good femme to the candid, unpretending Timothy Dobbins.

'O world, thy slippery turns.'

Adieu, your happy friend,
EDWARD LORIMOR.

And now farewell patient reader may you never become an actor in the little drama of pretension, or be more annoyed by its 'authority and show of truth' than when wading through our tedious, but I hope bearable, tale of 'Pretension'.

Fredericksburg, Jan. 1st, 1844.

THE POET'S MISSION.

The smile is fading from thy lip,
A grief is in thine eyes,
And poet! on that polished brow
Too deep a paleness lies.

Thou pinest for that perfect peace
No mortal lot may gain,
Thy searching is for sympathy,
The wild, and sad, and vain.

Thy voice, though very soft and kind
Hath sorrow in it still;
Too well I read, no earthly ties
Thy spirit's depth can fill!

The poet's solitary pilgrimage in far lands was past, and two or three months had elapsed since his long anticipated and fervently hoped-for return to his home. It has been well said that the truly happy are those who have never heard nor spoken "farewell;" and many bright days of life would Arthur have gladly sacrificed to have blotted out from his memory the sad occurrences which had come for him since that grief-speaking word had been uttered. He had entered on one of the eras which sooner or later dawn on us all—eras whose impressions mark and divide existence, concentrating into moments the moral influences of years, and writing on the brow and the heart a life-long and irrevocable history. There are blest ones for whom such epochs rise radiantly, and on whose memories the characters thus enscribed are the rainbow recordings of happiness; but alas! there are others, for whom, from the first, trials are familiar things, whose spirits, like Arthur's, have been darkened and sorrowful even from their youth, and who have early learned the sorrow which is knowledge. And now the dimness was heavy and palpable around him, and he was saddened by a grief whose consolations are not of the earth. Hope had spread her wings and flown afar, and his soul was dark and drooping beneath the mysterious shadows of death. He had returned refreshed and tranquilized from scenes that had changed and brightened the usual current of his thoughts, after years of that dreamy and memory-tinted absence which makes affection grow truer and fonder. He had come with sweetest visions, shining full upon him, to find his fairest expectations crushed; and the pure young love so unutterably precious with all its maidenly timidity had passed forever from his pathway. Theresa was dead.

To dispositions, constitutionally poetical and reflective, there is no restoration of their usual happiness after the loss of one beloved. Against other sufferings they bear up proudly and resistfully; the more practical troubles of the world, the departure of riches, or the innumerable and nameless disappointments of ambition leave comparatively slight traces on minds whose greatest and noblest wealth lies within themselves, and whose confidence ever rebels and soars loftier after temporary depression. The favored dweller in the dream-land finds beautiful comfort in his visions: his mental being is twofold, and the cares whose footprints sully the purity of his outer life, never profane the starry temple of the poet's ideal. But when it is to this inner sanctuary the sorrow comes, when all of thought and feeling, of remembrance and anticipation combine to render affliction deeper—then has the dreamer no mortal consolations, for the sunshine of his lovelier world is irreparably clouded, and the starlight of his most rapturous delusions fades away from his heart with the closing of the eyes that made its radiance. He turns despondingly from a past that grieves him, to a future that proffers no human comfort, and his mind, once so illumined with enchanting conceptions, shrinks dejected from a world that had dealt with it too hardly, and too distinctly realizes that the woes of existence are its only enduring truths.

It is a sad, but prevailing feature in humanity, that it seldom seeks the better and higher blessings of our nature, until it has completely tested inferior sources of happiness and found them vanity; that it refuses to acknowledge, save from mournful, and sometimes lengthened experience, that our common enjoyments are but vexation of spirit. But grief stands beside us like a solemn robed priest, and the sacred places of the heart are unveiled. Like the darkness preceding the dawning of day is the trial which summons the abiding sunshine to the soul, and such was the hallowing ordeal now existing for Arthur. He was in all respects visionary and enthusiastic; his emotions wild and impulsive, knew no medium, and his affliction was overwhelming and uncontrollable. With irrepressible and painful vividness came back recollections of the lost, and the sweetest words he had ever heard were silent in their tenderness now.

Death! death! what a fearful awakener of remembrance art thou; how the soul shrinks startled and affrighted from thy terrible spell, as the spectres of old times and broken ties glide darkly, mysteriously before us! They gaze upon us, their looks seem reproachful, and we turn appalled and self-convicting from the reproving of those still spirit-glances. They summon to our recollection words, perhaps, thoughtlessly spoken; we would sacrifice years to recall words that grieved the heart that loved us, words that haunt us in our troubled sleep. We stand beside the grave as penitents beside an altar, and have nothing to lay there but the valueless offering of sorrowful regrets and the knowledge of responsibilities learned too late. O! thou, who redest this page and lovest, who art yet ignorant of the terrible agony of bereavement, thou, for whom the dear one liveth yet, and on whose blest pilgrimage still shineth the beautiful lustre of an answering love—oh! be thou thankful that thou may'st yet gather and hoard up treasures for memory; that the brief time for kind deeds and tender tones hath not passed away for thee!

A change, the best and happiest one he had ever known, now dawned upon Arthur's character, and the nature formerly so impetuous and restless in its upward yearnings, its vague and deluding expectations, laid aside its wild unquietness, and became placid and peaceful as a sleeping child. His studies and occupations, always intellectual, assumed a higher and graver aspect, and the volumes of poetry were no longer his only companions. He had found in the pages of holier inspiration a loftier poetry than merely human genius has ever portrayed, a concentration of all the loveliness and promise his purest and brightest fancyings had ever framed. The earnest language of prophecy stirred his inmost thoughts, unfolding a world he had hitherto but dimly beheld, and revealing a voice speaking from the far past, to paint the truths of the farthest future. The touching assurances of solace and recompense refreshed his mind as the cool dew comforts and revives the drooping flower. The bewildering excitement, the vain aspiration, faded from his awakened spirit, as the dim shadows of twilight depart before the brightening stars, and he withdrew sadly, but not in bitterness, from a world that had misled and chastened him, to seek, with all a poet's reverential fervor, the promises that fail not, and the peace ever gained by the lowly and pure in heart.

With gentle and affectionate sympathy, Edith fostered and encouraged the tranquility whose hallowing influence was now silently blessing the poet, for well had she known and tested that other hopes have no reward for the soul's voiceless troubles and no realization for the enthusiast's loveliest dreamings. Arthur's career from the first, had been a lonely and depressing one. He had lost in early infancy the only affection that never varies, that has no taint of selfishness or deception, and the fresh years, whose impressions are indelible, had elapsed without the cheering and sanctifying guardianship of a mother's love. He had never experienced the buoyancy of disposition, the elasticity of feeling which are the beautiful and appointed portion of childhood. Sickness had been around him like a dark cloud, dimming his thoughts and rendering them prematurely melancholy, and then the painfully humiliating circumstances which had made his home worse than desolate, had too soon taught him to reflect, to conceal and to doubt. Afterwards, when the self-elevating pride of intellect, the involuntary conviction of power and genius brought him pleasure, and when, later still, with all the impulsiveness of a nature whose warmest emotions had hitherto slumbered in unconsciousness, he loved, there was constantly, even then, at life's most enchanting era, a lingering of the influences which had sullied his childhood. He had striven in vain to rely undoubtingly on Theresa's tenderness; there was always about him a visionary yearning for more than his experience had realized, an overweening and unceasing desire for an affection as engrossing, as all-absorbing as his own. This wish, he felt had been unfulfilled, though now that tenderness with all its placidity and restraint seemed more precious than any thing which remained for him in life.

It was nearly midnight, and Arthur was still seated beside the table, at which he had been busily writing for several hours. A pile of folded letters lay near him, which he was now occupied in sealing. Edith was seated there also, with a book open before her, but her sad eyes fixed tearfully on her companion's face. Well she knew, that those features she had loved for years to look on, might never meet her longing gaze again, for once more, and for an indefinite period, Arthur was on the eve of departure from his native land. The flushing light of youth, the purple light that gives to the hereafter its own glowing hue had passed from Edith's path, and maturer age is rarely full of hope. Her life had been a calm and useful one, and her early disappointments, whatever they might have been, had imprinted no visible trace; but the heaviness of some old grief lay darkly on her heart, and she had not attained, without prayerful sorrow, that freedom from selfishness, which is the holiest attribute of meek and enduring womanhood. Her affection for Arthur, with its peculiar blending of guardianship and sisterly sympathy, had long been her only source of happiness in this world, and we may not blame her, if her heart, too sorely tried, now turned repiningly from its dim and lonely future. She realized again, what sooner, or later, woman ever learns, that she never can be loved as she loves; wise are they who lay that mournful lesson early to their yearning bosoms, and trustfully believe that the hope for perfect sympathy which proved so vain on earth, will be one of the bright fulfilments of the holier life to come.

Arthur was gentle, attentive and grateful, and regarded her as his truest and most constant friend, but their aims, their destinies, were different. He was a man, affection was not his world, and he had loved another better. He had manhood's numberless resources too, its self-reliance and confidence, and he possessed also its courage to brave trial and encounter privation, while lacking the enduring fortitude which can suffer in silence, and, clasping the cross, be strong. His countenance now was pale and thoughtless, but not one lingering of its early, fitful clouds was on the tranquil forehead, enstained with its rich drapery of waving hair. The reflection of a mind at peace with all things shone on features that bore no sign of fretfulness or repining.

"I am glad you have completed your task," said his companion at last, "for it is late, and you require rest before encountering the fatigues awaiting you."

"Rest! dear Edith!" he replied with a smile, "occupation like this is not wearying, and you do not imagine how happy and tranquil I feel. How often, in my future wanderings, shall I remember your ever kind and tender watchfulness, whose solace was with me to the last."

"Then, Arthur, why will you relinquish it? why leave one who loves you so sincerely?"

"Because here I am surrounded by associations too sorrowful and humiliating to be laid aside, or forgotten; I do not feel contented and I would willingly taste the calm, self-approving enjoyment of those who forsake all things they hold dearest to go about to do good."

"But why deny me the same happiness, why refuse me the consolation of being your companion amid the perils and privations you are about to dare? O! I would so gladly go with you to share your efforts, and to soothe your despondings."

"Dearest, it cannot be. My life has nothing now to lose; for it has long ago parted with its youthful brightness; for me, the past is dim with many shadows, which the hereafter has no light to dissipate. My education and mode of life have wholly unfitted me for repose; I must be active to be useful, and I wish to obtain, by my own exertions, the comforting consciousness of having bestowed on others some glimmering of life's holier aims, and of feeling, for my own consolation, that I have not lived and suffered utterly in vain." He paused as if expecting a reply, but Edith's tears fell too fast for utterance, and as though dreading a silence, he continued: "The voyage I shall take will probably renovate my health, and the strong desire of conferring benefit will cheer me onward when my soul is sad, and my way seems solitary. Here I am wretched, and in quitting my native land, I shall leave nothing to regret but you. Do not urge me to commence my better course by an act of selfishness, for such it would be to allow you to sacrifice your present comforts, to separate you from a sphere of happiness and usefulness, and from many who love you. I must have my will in this, dear Edith; let us look forward to our meeting, and strive to forget the pain of our farewell!"

Ah! these were easy words to say, and the voice that said them was clear and youthful, but they were listened to with many tears, and a heart that had lost its trustfulness. Arthur spoke kindly, but with manhood's self-engrossed philosophy. He could not comprehend that he was sacrificing to his vague and visionary schemes of good, the feelings of one who had followed and cared for him with almost a mother's love. He told of a pleasant hereafter, while bidding her farewell for years, and he hoped and believed she would be happy, though he was leaving her to lengthened mental solitude. O! it is well for man's human happiness, that he looks into the spirit's depths so lightly, and better still for woman's peace in the time to come, that she has so often wept in disappointment and turned from her loneliness to heaven.

Arthur's intention was to go abroad, to traverse various lands lying in spiritual darkness, to seek out and relieve the poor, and to teach the ignorant he might meet in his wanderings. His wealth gave him advantages and facilities, and there was a tinge of romance around the scheme which not unusually blends with the missionary's visions. He proposed spending several years in these efforts for others' good, and trusted finally to return with a more resigned and contented disposition. It was the plan of an enthusiast, but its object was pure, and it was with a sentiment of honest pride in his self-control, that the poet laid aside his personal ambition and that strong desire for literary fame which had grown with his youth, and with the pilgrim spirit of endurance in his heart, went forth to battle with care and privation and disappointment.

Slowly passed the gloomy period of the visionary's exile; how slowly, they only can tell who, like Edith, have lived on with but one dream, one hope in life; and after long continued warring with constitutional feebleness, and a thousand ills and perplexities, Arthur had written to announce his promised return. The gloss had disappeared from his wandering existence alone among strangers, and his heart, though still high and brave, was sadder than he liked to believe. He began to realize that the spirit of benevolence which had carried him so far, might have been as usefully, and far more happily, exercised around his own home. In this conviction, while still untiring in his earnest desire to benefit, the pilgrim had determined to relinquish a crusade whose success was so unsatisfying, and whose cross pressed too heavily, and anxiously did Edith count the long interval that must yet drag on before their meeting. Ah! how many were the loving thoughts and prayers, that angel-like went forth across the wild sea to the poet's lonely dwelling!

The appointed time of restoration arrived, but Arthur returned not, and in his stead came a letter filled with a stranger's kind words of sympathy and condolence.

The Exile saw his home no more, and a solitary grave, in a far off and sunny land, told where the weary had found rest.—Poor Edith!

MR. MESSENGER:

A friend of mine, who has much of the vivid fancy and delicate sentiment of true poesy, has handed me the following response to the little song, "Not 'Again," in your January issue. The playful idealism of these lines will commend them to your pages.

M.

ONCE AGAIN.

Once again, once again
All my former hope returns;
Love within my bosom burns;
Brighter dreams, than e'er before
Swept my slumbering senses o'er,
Pass along, and, as I sleep,
Angels through the curtains peep,
Whispering, as they shake their wings,
Very many pleasant things,
Once again!

Once again, once again
Take I to my tingling lip,
Cups from which I used to sip;
How the purple bubbles shine!—
Air-ships on a sea of wine!
Wine and music! Ah! my lute,
Long forgotten, why so mute?
If I touch thy silent string,
Wilt thou for thy master sing
Once again?

Once again, once again!
Now my fingers, drunk with glee,
Sweep thy chords of melody.
Softly let thy numbers roll
O'er my disenchanted soul;
Drive the shadow from the glass;
Let my youth before me pass;
Teach my pulses how to swell,
And the same old love-tales tell
Once again!

Once again, once again!
Jane and Mary, Ann and Sue,
Carry with her eyes so blue!
Betty with her locks of jet—
Eyes a little darker yet!
Rosa, Mag, and Eva sweet,
Clustering in my vision meet,
With forty-seven other flames!
Shall I name their very names
Once again?

Once again, once again
Break my heart and see how soon,—
In the passing of a moon,—
It is whole, and beating free
Under woman's witchery!
Should ambition leap too high,—
Fame avert her Eagle eye,—
And the world grow cold the while,—
Go thou back to woman's smile
Once again!

LANDSCAPE GARDENING.

BY GEORGE WATTERSTON.

Landscape Gardening is a modern art. Previous to the last century, it may be said scarcely to have existed. The brilliant imaginations and inventive genius of the ancient poets had not bodied forth a creation which could be compared to the productions of an art now so justly admired, and which has been aptly denominated the "art of creating landscape." Until the age of Homer, the great father of Epic poetry, no higher notion of a garden was entertained than that of an enclosure of a few acres of ground, comprehending orchard, vineyard and kitchen garden, and even this meagre poetic conception the Greeks did not subsequently improve. That illustrious poet thus describes the garden of Alcinous, which, poor as it is, was the nearest approach which his creative mind could make to what the cultivators of the art have termed a landscape garden.

"Four acres was the allotted space of ground
Fenced with a green enclosure all around.
Tall thriving trees confessed the fruitful mould,
The red'ning apple ripens into gold.
Here the blue fig with luscious juice o'erflows;
With deeper red the full pomegranate glows;
The branch here bends beneath the weighty pear,
The verdant olives flourish round the year,
Beds of all various kinds, forever green,
In beauteous order terminate the scene."

The Greeks seem to have had, at no period, any idea of Landscape Gardening, and the Romans had not made much farther advances in the art. The only gardens they cultivated were those devoted to the production of esculent and culinary vegetables. As objects of pleasure and beauty, they are not mentioned by Cato, Varro, Columella or Palladius.

The Tusculan villa of Cicero has not been described by him, but it was far from being laid out and ornamented in the manner which the beautiful art of which we are speaking, would have suggested. "The Romans preferred," says Walpole, "grottoes, caves and hollows of mountains, or porticos; walks of plain trees, canals, baths and breezes from the sea," and in their gardens they seem to have been particularly partial to pine trees, and flowers, especially roses.

Fraxinus in sylvis pulcherrima, pinus in hortis.

The villas of the elegant Pliny were artificial and formal, ornamented with box, cut into the shapes of monsters, animals, letters and the names of the owner and artificer, and possessing neither rural nor natural beauty. The style was such as prevailed in France and England about two centuries ago. It may seem extraordinary, but it is nevertheless true, that neither the Greeks nor Romans had much taste for the beauties of nature, if we may judge from the works they have left us, especially for landscape composition. No where do we find any graphic descriptions of natural scenery, such as are frequently met with in the works of Sir Walter Scott, Cooper, Mrs. Radcliff, Thompson and other modern writers—and this is the more remarkable, when we consider the rich and splendid natural scenery of Greece and Italy. "Even the languages of Greece and Rome," says a writer on this subject, "appear to have been almost deficient in all those terms which are required for depicting inanimate nature, and many of which we moderns have borrowed from the painter's vocabulary. They have few that indicate form and outline with tolerable precision, still fewer that supply all the variety of coloring which landscape description has occasion for. While they set events and human actions and passions before us, in all their interest and energy, they disregarded, whether through inability to paint it or not, what relates to the local sense or background, be it landscape or architecture, and in this they may be said to have adhered to the system of their dramatic representations which, according to our modern notions, must have been nearly altogether destitute of the illusion produced by scenery."^{*} Their genius was more influenced by forms than natural scenery, more sculpturesque than picturesque. Though gifted with the most acute perception of what was beautiful and graceful in the animal structure, they had but little apparent sensibility for the varied beauties of inanimate nature. "Neither Theocritus nor Virgil can be considered as a master in the art of depicting rural scenery; with them it consists only of bald, vague generalities, which do not allow us to distinguish any individual features, much less are any of the features themselves expressed with such truth of coloring as to be embodied forth to the imagination."^{*}

Almost all the fine arts, too, except Landscape Gardening, were cultivated and perfected, and "in an age," says Walpole, "when architecture displayed all its grandeur, purity and taste; when there arose Vespasian's amphitheatre, the temple of Peace, Trajan's forum, Domitian's baths, and Adrian's villa, the ruins and vestiges of which still excite our astonishment and curiosity; a Roman Consul, a polished Emperor's friend and a man of elegant literature and taste, delighted in what the mob now scarcely admire in a college garden."[†]

Among the Jews, with a fine climate and surrounded by beautiful natural scenery, the art of Landscape Gardening was as little known as among the Greeks and Romans. Solomon mentions that he made "gardens and orchards, and planted trees in them of all kind of fruits;" and fountains and streams formed a part of their composition. But these were not the gardens which modern art has produced. Among the Persians we hear of the hanging gardens of Babylon, which are said to owe their origin to the Queen of Nebuchadnezzar, who, to pacify the regrets she experienced at leaving the country of her birth, which appeared so beautiful by contrast, erected the famous terraces, planted with trees and supporting rural seats and banquetting halls, and ornamented and refreshed with fountains, which became one of the wonders of the world. These, however, were limited in extent, and distinguished merely for their luxury and expense. In "other words," says Walpole, "they were what sumptuous gardens have been in all ages till the present, unnatural, enriched by art, possibly with fountains, statues, ballustrades and summer houses, and were any thing but verdant and rural.

The modern Italians, unlike their predecessors, began to develop a taste for gardening as an art, but it was too formal or geometric to be gardenesque and natural. The Italian and French style of gardens was artificial, but magnificent, and consisted of terraces ornamented with ballustrades, magnificent flights of steps, arcades and grottoes; clipped hedges of great elevation, with niches and recesses for statues, vases and other ornaments of sculpture. The Dutch style, introduced by William III., and which prevailed in England for about fifty years was not much better, and was distinguished for sloped terraces formed of grass, land and water made into regular shapes by art, and adorned with trees in pots, or "planted alternately and clipped to preserve the most perfect regularity of shape"—and leisure, "in trim gardens, took his pleasure." "The compass and the square," says Walpole, "were of more use than the nurseryman. The measured walk, the quincunx and the étoile imposed their unsatisfying sameness on every royal and noble garden. Trees were headed and their sides pared away; many French groves seem green chests set upon poles. Seats of marble, arbors and summer houses terminated every vista; and symmetry, even when the space was too large to permit its being remarked at one view, was so essential, that, as Pope observed,

"Grove nods to grove, each alley has a brother
And half the platform just reflects the other."

This formal, or geometric style was all the rage at the commencement of the 17th century in those parts of Europe where ornamental gardening prevailed, and the most distinguished artist of that age, if artist he could be called, was Le Notre, who acquired great reputation as a designer, and became so prominent a favorite of Louis XIV. as to receive from him several honorary marks of his bounty and regard. Le Notre designed and laid out the famous gardens of Versailles, and introduced his geometric style into England where it continued till Kent, and afterwards Brown appeared, who invented what has been called the modern style of gardening, and to whom and their successor, Repton, England is mainly indebted for the high perfection to which the art has attained in that country within the last century. Nature, under the direction of Le Notre, had been banished, or concealed by art. He seemed to have forgotten the maxim, ars est celare artem, and his great aim was to display the triumph of art over nature till it became so obvious and so uniform that it lost its novelty and ceased to please. Nature was the model of Brown, and Brown the model of his followers, who copied him without his genius or taste, till the fashion he had introduced was in danger of becoming more tiresome, insipid and unnatural than the worst style of Italian or Dutch examples.* What Walpole says of Kent, may with equal truth be said of Brown and Repton, his successors in this noble art. "He leaped the fence and saw that all nature was a garden. He felt the delicious contrast of hill and valley changing imperceptibly into each other; tasted the beauty of the gentle swell, or concave scoop, and remarked how loose groves crowned an easy eminence with happy ornament, and while they called in the distant view between their graceful stems, removed and extended the prospect by delusive perspective. The great principles on which he worked were perspective and light and shade. Groups of trees broke too uniform or too extensive a lawn; evergreens and woods were opposed to the glare of the champaign, and where the view was less fortunate, or so much exposed as to be beheld at once, he blotted out some parts by thick shades to divide it into variety, or to make the richest scene more enchanting by reserving it to a further advance of the spectator's step. Thus selecting favorite objects and veiling deformities by screens of a plantation; sometimes allowing the rudest waste to add its foil to the richest theatre, he realized the compositions of the greatest masters in painting. Where objects were wanting to animate his horizon, his taste as an architect could bestow immediate termination. His buildings, his seats, his temples, were more the works of his pencil than his compasses. We owe the restoration of Greece and the diffusion of architecture to his skill in landscape. But of all the beauties he added to the face of the country, none surpassed his management of water. Adieu to canals, circular basins, and cascades tumbling down marble steps, that last absurd magnificence of Italian and French villas. The forced elevation of cataracts was no more. The gentle stream was taught to serpentine seemingly at its pleasure, and where discontinued by different levels, its course appeared to be concealed by thickets properly interspersed, and glittering again at a distance where it might be supposed naturally to arise. Its borders were smoothed, but preserved their waving irregularity. A few trees scattered here and there on its edges sprinkled the tame bank that accompanied its meanders; and when it disappeared among the hills, shades descending from the heights leaned towards its progress, and framed the distant point of light under which it was lost, as it turned aside to either hand of the blue horizon.

"Thus dealing in none but the colors of nature, and catching its most favorable features, men saw a new creation opening before their eyes. The living landscape was chastened, or polished, not transformed. Freedom was given to the forms of trees; they extended their branches unrestricted, and where any eminent oak or master beech had escaped maiming and survived the forest, bush and bramble were removed, and all its honors were restored to distinguish and shade the plain. Where the united plumage of an ancient wood extended wide its undulating canopy and stood venerable in its darkness, Kent thinned the foremost ranks, and left so many detached and scattered trees as softened the approach of gloom and blended a chequered light with the thus lengthened shadows of the remaining columns." This very just praise was merited by the father of Landscape Gardening in England; but his successor, Brown, and after him, Repton, added greatly to the improvements which Kent had introduced; and making nature their model and guided by a finer taste, brought this beautiful art to the high state of perfection which it has now reached in England. Brown was self-taught and had originally been a kitchen gardener. His great excellence consisted in that rare faculty of prejudging, or foreseeing effects, which enabled him to know beforehand what would be the effect of any improvement he designed to make. His style of Landscape Gardening was admired and approved by all who saw and could feel its beauties. It was, however, rendered still more perfect by his successor Repton. Mr. Repton was born in the year 1752 of respectable parents, and educated with considerable care. He early indicated a fondness for gardening, was a great admirer of nature, whose beauties he studied with a painter's feelings and regarded with a painter's eyes. After trying various occupations for a livelihood, without success, "the possibility," says his biographer, "of turning to advantage that natural taste for improving the beauties of scenery, which had formed one of the dearest pleasures of his rural life, suggested itself to his mind," and bending his whole attention to the acquisition of the technical knowledge necessary for the practical purposes of his profession he became a "Landscape Gardener,"—a designation which he was the first to assume. To this profession he devoted himself with the most signal success and to the great improvement of many of the villas and seats of gentlemen in England, till his death in 1818, and to the very last his love of the beauties of nature was manifested in the wish he expressed, that he might be buried in "a garden of roses." His wish was gratified, and his body was interred in the graveyard of the picturesque church of Aylesham in Norfolk, and on a simple Gothic monument, erected to his memory, was inscribed the following beautiful epitaph written by himself:

"Not like the Egyptian tyrants—consecrate,
Unmixed with others, shall my dust remain;
But mouldering, blended, melting into earth,
Mine shall give form and color to the rose;
And while its vivid blossoms cheer mankind,
Its perfume'd odor shall ascend to heaven."

To the poets some have ascribed, if not the origin, at least many of the finest ideas on Landscape Gardening. Milton, long before the unnatural and geometric style had been exploded, conceived, with the prophetic eye of taste, the beauties which should enter into the composition of a garden. The following description was written fifty years before the introduction of the modern style of gardening.

—"Through Eden went a river large,
Nor changed his course, but through the shaggy hill
Pass'd, underneath engulfed, for God had thrown
That mountain as his garden mound, high raised
Upon the rapid current, which thro' veins
Of porous earth with kindly thirst updrawn,
Rose a fresh fountain, and with many a rill
Watered the garden—

—from that sapphire fount, the crisped brooks
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
With mazy error, under pendant shades
Ran nectar, visiting each plant, and fed
Flow'rs worthy of Paradise, which not nice art
In beds and curious knots, but nature boon
Poured fourth profuse on hill and dale and plain,
Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
The open field, and where the unpierced shade

Imbrown'd the noontide bowers. Thus was this place
A happy rural seat of various view."

Dr. Warton supposes, and no doubt justly, that the poet Thompson, by his Seasons, contributed to influence and direct the taste in this art. "The peculiar merit of the work itself," says Alison,* "the singular felicity of its descriptions and, above all, the fine enthusiasm which it displays and which it is so fitted to excite, with regard to the works of nature, were most singularly adapted to promote the growth of an infant art, which had for its object the production of natural beauty; and by diffusing every where both the admiration of nature and the knowledge of its expression, prepared, in a peculiar degree, the minds of men in general, both to feel the effects and to judge of the fidelity of those scenes in which it was imitated. By these means, and by the singular genius of some late masters, the art of gardening has gradually ascended from the pursuit of particular to the pursuit of general beauty; to realize whatever the fancy of the painter has imagined and to create a scenery more pure, more harmonious and more expressive than any that is to be found in nature itself."

It has been thought, too, that the study of prints and of the exquisite productions of the landscape painters has added much to the improvement of Landscape Gardening. Uvedale Price, in his Essays on the Picturesque, contends that the study of the works of eminent painters and a knowledge of the principles of their art are essential to the perfection of ornamental gardening, and these, he thinks, have been neglected, or were not possessed by Kent, Brown and other improvers. Painters see effects in nature which men in general do not see. Quam multa vident pictores, says Cicero, quæ nos non videmus! "The only models of composition," he observes, "that approach to perfection, the only fixed and unchanging selections from the works of nature united with those of art, are in the pictures and designs of the most eminent masters," and, he continues, "whatever minute and partial objections may be made to the study of pictures for the purpose of improvement, yet certainly the great leading principles of the one art, as general composition, harmony of tints, unity of character, and even breadth and effect of light and shade, are equally applicable to the other." Repton, however, will not exactly coincide in opinion with Price, and I think with some justice. There is undoubtedly a considerable difference between landscape painting and Landscape Gardening, though it is highly important that the professor of the latter should possess a knowledge of the former. Mr. Alison has drawn a correct line of distinction between these arts. "In the art of gardening," he observes, "the great materials of the scene are provided by

* Alison's Essays on Taste.

Nature herself, and the artist must satisfy himself with that degree of expression which she has bestowed. In a landscape, on the contrary, the painter has the choice of the circumstances he is to represent, and can give whatever form or extent he pleases to the expression he wishes to convey. In gardening, the materials of the scene are few, and these few unwieldy, and the artist must often content himself with the reflection that he has given the best disposition in his power to the scanty and intractable materials of nature. In a landscape, on the contrary, the whole range of scenery is before the eye of the painter."

Landscape Gardening is not an imitative or imaginative art. It is not a copy of nature, but nature itself. All the materials are prepared and even shaped by her, and the arrangement and disposition of them in such a manner as to render them beautiful and picturesque depend upon the skill and taste of the improver. He executes, with the materials with which nature furnishes him, the landscape he has previously formed in his mind and which he must adapt to the peculiar locality of the grounds he may be called upon to improve. It has been even doubted whether this is an art. "In our opinion," says a writer in the Foreign Quarterly Review, "it is rather selection and combining taste and good feeling that are employed in thus seconding nature, than that creative power which constitutes the artist and which enables him to draw entirely from the stores of his own fancy and embody at once his ideas." But I cannot conceive that the power of what Walpole happily terms the art of "creating landscape," is less an art than that of painting one, though the materials are different. The Landscape Gardener forms in his own mind what, when executed, becomes a beautiful landscape, and, though he employs ground, water, trees and buildings to fill up the outline of what his genius, skill and taste have created, it is not less artistical than if he employed all the necessary colors to embody his conception on canvass. It is true, that Landscape Gardening is freed from one essential portion of art and which is its principal charm in painting. We mean execution, which in gardening is left to nature. But this does not lessen the skill and talent requisite for such a purpose, "since," says the writer above quoted, "besides the painter's eye and sensibility, a master in Landscape Gardening must also possess a high degree of prescient vision, so as to be able to foresee results that will not develop and manifest themselves till long afterwards. The landscape painter can try an effect, and if dissatisfied with it, efface it and proceed afresh. Not so the Landscape Gardener, his process is far more slow and uncertain, nor can he alter at pleasure, unless in parts of mere detail."

Repton conceives that the difference between painting and gardening consists in the following particulars.

First. "The spot from whence the view is taken is in a fixed state to the painter; but the gardener surveys his scenery while in motion, and from different windows in the same front he sees objects in different situations."

Secondly. "The quantity of view, or field of vision in nature is much greater than any picture will admit."

Thirdly. "The view from an eminence down a steep hill is not to be represented in painting, although it is often one of the most pleasing circumstances of natural landscape."

Fourthly. "The light which the painter may bring from any point of the compass, must, in real scenery, depend on the time of the day. It must also be remembered, that the light of a picture can only be made strong by contrast of shade, while in nature every object may be strongly illumined without destroying the composition, or disturbing the keeping. And

Lastly. "The foreground, which, by framing the view, is absolutely necessary to the picture, is often totally deficient, or seldom such as a painter chooses to represent."*

In a painting, the eye is confined to a single point of view—but in Landscape Gardening, which is a copy of natural scenery, the foreground is constantly changing and becomes middle ground or distance as the spectator advances. In coloring too, they may differ, for the coloring which a painter would employ to give truth to a view in America, would not be such as would be proper to paint one in Italy, or France, where the masters in landscape have studied. But "it is not," says Repton, "from the coloring only, but the general composition of landscapes that the painter and Landscape Gardener will feel the difference in their respective arts; and although each may occasionally assist the other, yet I should no more advise the latter in laying out the scenery of a place to copy the confined field of vision, or affect the careless graces of Claude or Poussin, than I should recommend, as a subject proper for a landscape painter, the formal rows or quincunx position of trees in geometric gardening." But whatever may be the difference which exists between these two arts, Landscape Gardening may be considered as claiming the superiority both in beauty and utility, and is, in the language of a French author, "à la poesie et à la peinture ce que réalité est à la description et l'original à la copie."

In passing from the ancient, or geometric style, to the modern, or natural, the first improvers fell, perhaps, into an opposite extreme. This is the danger in all sudden transitions. They seemed to conceive that crooked lines, serpentine windings and carelessness were true objects of beauty, and declared that nature abhorred a straight line; and thus fatigued the eye by incessant curves. They did not seem to be aware, that in her sublimest works nature prefers the straight line, as is shown in the apparent horizon of the ocean and the rays of the sun. "This meandering and serpentine line," says Repton, "soon prevailed in every thing, whether it was a line of a road, a walk, a canal, or the surface of the ground, or even the fence of a plantation, till at length it became as monotonous as the straight line." Mr. Knight, in his poem entitled the Landscape, has thus happily ridiculed this extravagant propensity for curved lines:

* Inquiry into the changes of Taste, &c.

"Plain gravel walks, thro' which we winding go
In endless serpentines that nothing show,
Till tird, I ask, 'why this eternal round?'
And the pert gard'ner says, 'tis pleasure ground.'"

The Landscape Gardener who possesses taste, will of course avoid both extremes and follow nature in her simplicity, symmetry, variety and beauty. He will avoid; on the one hand, the absurdity of clipping trees into formal figures, and cutting hedges so as to resemble walls, and disposing gardens in the shape of the human body, as has been done; and, on the other, the equally censurable extreme of giving every thing the form of a curve, which, though the imaginary line of beauty, becomes tame and monotonous when carried to an extreme. By the improver of taste, a union of the old and modern style may be made to produce a harmonious and happy effect. A high degree of artificial beauty may be tolerated, if it does not become too obvious, and degenerate into the unnatural. The very idea of a garden, it has been said, is that of a carefully cultivated spot; consequently, the artificial character may be permitted to manifest itself decidedly in the ornamental species, if no violence be done to nature itself. In this species of gardening, the professedly ornamental and "which admits of the highest degree of richerché embellishments, care should be taken not to lose sight of artistical effect and sentiment, and as the style depends more upon details and the finish of minutiae than that of landscape does, it is better adapted for a small than a large scale, and for the immediate environs of a residence."* But the Landscape Gardener endeavors in his imitations, or rather his direction of nature, to reject every thing which has the appearance of being artificial. His must be, in the language of Tasso,

"L'arte che tutto fa nulla se scopre," and therefore it requires the nicest and most delicate judgment and feeling to conceal those contrivances which convert that which originally had no charms into a scene of striking beauty. "It is not," says the writer already quoted, "the factitious bloom upon the cheek of a beautiful woman so much as the unskilfulness with which it is laid on, that offends the eye; the offence consists in the imposition being detected. The Landscape Gardener should bear this in mind; he must beware of painting too thick,—of overdoing embellishment till he pushes beauty to the very verge of absurdity. Either he must make no attempt at concealing his machinery, or hide it most effectually, unless he is content to pass for a bungler."

Although the artist of genius will always endeavor to conceal his art, it is important that deceptions should be practised, as they always will be, in the highest works of art. The Landscape Gardener is always the most successful when he makes his work appear to be the exclusive work of nature. It is that which constitutes his excellence and the beauty of his work. Burke has asserted with truth, "that a true artist should put a generous deceit on the spectators and effect the noblest designs by easy methods. No work of art can be great but as it deceives, to be otherwise is the prerogative of nature only."* In laying out ground, these deceptions must be resorted to; the hill is formed to give it, in appearance, greater elevation; a stream is enlarged to make it resemble a river, or embanked to produce the appearance of a lake; and all these must seem to be natural, or they will cease to afford pleasure to the mind. These deceptions are nothing more than the result of "The art clandestine and conceal'd design."

It is its excellence to display all the natural beauties and conceal the natural defects of the situation which is to be improved,—to give the appearance of extent and freedom by carefully concealing the boundaries,—to make the whole appear the work of nature and not of art and to remove or conceal all objects of mere convenience and comforts, if they cannot be made ornamental and to blend harmoniously with the landscape. It is in these great requisites that modern gardening differs from the ancient. But in carrying out these principles, nature must be followed and not forced. The golden rule of the improver's practice must be

"To consult the genius of the place in all!"

"Avant tout connoissez votre site; et du lieu Adorez le génie, et consultez le dieu."—Delille.

Every situation will not admit of being formed into landscape; but still the art of the improver can make it more beautiful than it was, and his labor should be to dispose every thing with a view to effect. The principal aim of the Landscape Gardener is to create the picturesque and beautiful and but rarely the sublime—unless the genius loci will admit of it. But the wild and romantic are seldom within the range of human habitations. "Nature," says Rousseau, "flies from

* Foreign Quarterly Review, vol. 16.

* Essay on the sublime, &c.

frequented places; it is on the summit of mountains, in the depths of forests and in desert islands that she displays her most touching charms: those who love her and cannot go so far to seek her are reduced to the necessity of forcing her to take up her habitation among them; but this cannot be done without a certain degree of illusion." It may, perhaps, be questioned whether this art can succeed in producing any thing higher than picturesque beauty, or a harmonious mixture of forms, colors, lights and shades; but it is calculated, in the language of Alison, to "realize whatever the fancy of the painter has imagined and to create a scenery more pure, more harmonious and more expressive than any that is to be found in Nature herself." Shenstone is of opinion that it pleases the imagination by "scenes of grandeur, beauty and variety;" and Wheatley, who has written a very excellent work on the subject, declares that the business of the Landscape Gardener "is to select and apply whatever is great, elegant, or characteristic in the scenery of nature, or in art,—to discover and show all the advantages of the place upon which he is employed,—to supply its defects,—to correct its faults, and to improve its beauties." This is a just designation of the business of a Landscape Gardener, whose aim, moreover, should be the attainment of the highest degree of beauty which his own imagination can suggest, or the genius of the place and the circumstances of the proprietor will admit of. This is a noble and beautiful art, but it is one

Nor is this done at great expense.

"Ce noble emploi demande un artiste qui penses, Prodigue de génie, mais non pas de dépense."

Which has been thus paraphrased—

Nor spoil her simple charms by vain pretence;
Weigh well the subject, be with caution bold,
Profuse of genius, not profuse of gold."
The Gardens.

The elements which enter into the composition of this art and which constitute its sources of pleasure, are, according to Repton, the following:

1st. Congruity, or a proper adaptation of the several parts to the whole.

2nd. Utility—which includes convenience, comfort, neatness and every thing that conduces to the purposes of habitation.

3rd. Order. Including correctness and finishing.

4th. Symmetry. Both this and the preceding are natural to the human mind. It loves those beautiful proportions and that regularity which constitute symmetry. "Things," says Montesquieu, "that we see in succession ought to have variety, those, on the contrary, that we see at one glance, ought to have symmetry; thus, at one glance, we see the front of a building, a parterre, a temple; in such things there is always a symmetry which pleases the mind by the facility it gives it of taking in the whole object at once."

The preceding four heads are not favorable to picturesque beauty; but belong more particularly to the ancient style of gardening which I have previously recommended to be blended with the modern, where the buildings, limited extent of ground and other circumstances require its retention.

5th. Picturesque Effect. This furnishes the improver with breadth of light and shade; forms of groups, outlines, coloring, balance of composition and occasional advantage from roughness and decay, the effect of time and age. Price considers this head at great length and thinks that Kent and Brown and their followers have neglected it entirely.

6th. Intricacy. This, though distinct from variety, is so blended with it, that one can scarcely exist without the other. It is defined by Price to be "that disposition of objects which, by a partial and uncertain concealment, excites and nourishes curiosity."

7th. Simplicity; or that disposition of objects which, without exposing all of them equally to view at once, may lead the eye to each by an easy gradation, without confusion or perplexity.

8th. Variety. 9th. Novelty. 10th. Contrast, which supplies the place of novelty by a sudden and unexpected change of scenery, provided the transitions be neither too frequent, nor too violent.

11th. Continuity. 12th. Association. This, Mr. Repton thinks is one of the most impressive sources of delight; more particularly from that personal attachment to long known objects, perhaps indifferent in themselves, as the favorite seat, the tree, the walk or the spot endeared by the remembrance of past events. Objects of this sort are often preferred to the most beautiful scenes that painting can represent, or gardening create.

13th. Grandeur. This is a source of pleasure mixed with the sublime. It is, however, but rarely picturesque.

14th. Appropriation. A term employed by Repton to describe extent of property, the appearance and display of which are a source of pleasure not to be disregarded.

15th. Animation; or that pleasure experienced from seeing life and motion; whether the gliding or dashing of water, the sportive play of animals, or the wavy motion of trees.

16th. And lastly, the seasons and times of the day, which are very different to the gardener and the painter.

These are the principles on which Landscape Gardening has been founded, and the great sources of the pleasure which it is calculated to produce.

Whether it be a fine art or not is a matter of very little importance. It is one which is worthy of pursuit as a source of the purest and most delightful recreation, and suited to benefit the mind and body. "The enjoyment which it affords is at once sensual and intellectual, and if less stimulating than many other sensual gratifications, it has the superiority over them, that it is the least palling of any, or rather one that is incapable of satiating. There is, moreover, this great advantage attending the pursuit, that it is one in which decided failure is almost utterly impossible; for although the most may not be made of a situation, or the combinations produced become trivial and poor; there will still be the ineffable charm of the materials themselves, of verdure and vegetation in various hues and shapes; for even the smallest shrubbery which offers nothing answering the idea of landscape, delights the eye by nature's detail."*

Having shown what constitutes the sources of pleasure in Landscape Gardening, it may be necessary to mention briefly the knowledge and talents which the landscape gardener should possess to attain perfection in his beautiful art. He must not only be able to design an improvement but have the practical skill to execute it. The beautiful landscape which he may paint on canvass cannot be realized without a practical knowledge of planting, grading and removing earth. To his knowledge of drawing and painting must be added that of surveying, mechanics, hydraulics, agriculture, botany and the principles of architecture. But the most essential qualification he can possess is that of foreseeing effects, or that faculty which will enable him to judge of the effect of a design before it is carried into execution, and thus save himself the trouble and his employer the expense of remodelling his original design, and also the loss of time which it will require to judge of the result. Above all, however, it is important to study nature in her various phases of beauty, grandeur and picturesqueness. To the gardener, as well as the poet and the painter, nature, la belle nature, must be the model. In short,

"To build, to plant, whatever you intend,
To rear the column, or the arch to bend,
To swell the terrace, or to sink the grot,
In all, let nature never be forgot."

Of the elements necessary to constitute a Landscape Garden, namely, grounds, woods, water and buildings, we have not time to speak at large, nor is it, perhaps, desirable. It is by the judicious formation, arrangement and disposition of these, according to the best principles of taste, that beauty is displayed and the skill of the improver exercised. The objects in all operations upon ground are beauty of art or design and improvement of natural scenery. In both the ancient and modern style of gardening, the grand effect is produced by woods,

"which, whether in scattered forests, thickets, or groups, or in compact geometric squares, avenues, or rows, constitute the greatest charm of every country." A tree is always a noble and beautiful object. "It combines every species of beauty from its sublime effect as a whole, to the most minute and refined expression of mind, in the individual beauty of its leaves, and exhibits that majestic uniformity and infinite variety which constitute the essence of relative beauty." When the ground possesses no striking features of beauty, or grandeur, it may still be greatly improved by planting, which will thus impart to the scene variety of verdure, and the richness of woodland beauty. "From the tangled thicket to the light open grove, between the interstices of whose foliage the sunbeams dart and flicker upon the grassy sward,—from the plant and shrub to the majestically spreading tree—all these may be formed. Independently of their nobleness as objects of sight, the aspect of venerable trees and woods exerts a powerful influence over the mind; there is a charm even in the very monotony of a dense and uninterrupted screen of wood, and, when viewed from an eminence, such an expanse of foliage and verdure partakes, like the ocean, of the sublime."*

The parts which form a wood and constitute its varied and intricate boundary, are thickets, or clumps, groups, or single plants of either tree or shrub. We cannot dwell on the manner in which these are to be arranged. The effect of the whole must be kept constantly in view. In planting, we are told, uniformity, variety and intricacy as a whole and use as well as beauty in the parts, must never be neglected, nor forgotten. The natural surface will influence, in no small degree, both the groups and masses. The beauty of all verdant scenery depends more than on any other circumstance, on the inequalities of the ground. A few trees on the summit of a knoll will give it the appearance of a hill. A connected train of groups, placed along the back of a ridge, produces at once a bolder and more varied outline. "In recommending that hills should be planted," says Repton, "I do not mean that the summits should be covered by a patch, or clump; the woods of the valleys should, on the contrary, seem to climb the hills by such connecting lines as may neither appear meagre nor artificial, but following the natural shapes of the ground, produce an apparent continuity of wood falling down the hills in various directions." In extending this practice to mountain scenery the powerful effect of wood may be nobly displayed by the hand of the artist.

— "Rich the robe,
And ample let it flow, that Nature wears
On her thron'd eminence! where'er she takes
Her horizontal march, pursue her step
With sweeping train of forest; hill to hill
Unite, with prodigality of shade."—Mason.

* Foreign Quarterly Review, vol. 16.

* Foreign Quarterly Review, vol. 16.

"The outline of a wood," says Wheatley, "may sometimes be great and always beautiful; the first requisite is irregularity. The true beauty of an outline consists more in breaks than in sweeps, rather in angles than rounds, in variety, not in succession." Great art and skill are required in removing trees and thinning woods, for in this the Landscape Gardener is enabled to show "his knowledge of pleasing combinations, his genius for painting and his acute perception of the principles of an art which transfers the imitative, though permanent beauties of a picture to the purposes of elegant and comfortable habitation, the ever-varying effects of light and shade, and the inimitable circumstances of a natural landscape."

Next to woods the most important and interesting feature in natural, as well as artificial landscape, is water. Nothing so much heightens its beauties. Its silvery brilliancy, rapid flow, or quiet repose, reflecting the varied images on its banks, must always render it, in its various combinations, an object of pleasure to the eye. "If there be less of sparkle and animation there is certainly not less of picturesque and poetic charm in a scene where a stream or lake is embosomed among overhanging banks and shaggy trees that cast, if not absolutely a gloom, a dense mass of shadow over its surface." Gilpin, in speaking of water, says that its decoration depends upon the description of scenery around it. If it be wild, the accompaniments of the river, or lake should partake of that character. Broken banks and roots of trees, bared by the action of the water, with their stems occasionally slanting athwart a stream, will unite the river with corresponding boldness to the scenery around. But if the water reposes in the smoother lap of nature, its decorations should be adapted to the tranquillity of the scene. The smooth grassy bank sliding almost imperceptibly into the water, will be relieved by a jutting point, fringed with varieties of water plants, enriched with fragments of stone of different size and color, groups of alder, or willow will occasionally break the margin, or the pendant and massive foliage of the wych elm will throw its broad shadow across the retiring reach.*

The fourth and last requisite in Landscape Gardening is the buildings. These should be so constructed as to be both attractive and useful objects. Shenstone remarks that "to him a landscape is never complete without a building; considered merely in the light of a picturesque view, a building, in addition to merely verdant scenery, forms a better picture by giving a desirable feature, or resting place for the eye." The improvements of the ground should correspond with the building, or the building be made to harmonize with the grounds, and be, moreover, of decided merit as a piece of architecture. On this account it is necessary that

* Gilpin on Landscape Gardening.

the Landscape Gardener should possess such a knowledge of architecture as will enable him to construct a building in accordance with the scene he is about to create. Buildings should be made for use more than for mere ornament and every thing trivial and toyish should be studiously avoided. "Should a structure," says the writer, we have previously referred to, "be introduced as a distant object to mark an eminence, or to break the line of the horizon and so placed that a near access to it cannot be obtained, then, indeed, positive architectural beauty, beyond that of pleasing outline and proportion may be dispensed with, but in every other case it becomes essential. Nothing can be more ridiculously offensive than diminutive, toyish imitations of castles and abbeys; neither are sham ruins particularly to be recommended, though not always objectionable. A Gothic porch converted into a garden seat, or a window of rich workmanship, partly mantled over with ivy, might possess the merit of being a tasteful as well as a picturesque object. The site of a building ought also to be so selected as to set it off to the best advantage, so as to render it not only a useful accessory in the general prospect, but an effective and satisfactory feature, when it necessarily becomes the principal one in the scene."* If the style of architecture be Grecian, trees of a pointed, or conic shape will have a beautiful effect, by contrast—mixed with Gothic buildings they are apt to displease, "since the play of light and shadow in Gothic structures must proceed from those bold projections, either of towers, or buttresses which cause strong shadows in a perpendicular direction."† The lines of Gothic buildings, therefore, are better contrasted with round headed trees, as Milton seemed to think in the following lines—

"Towers and battlements he sees Embosom'd high 'mid tufted trees."

Such are the elements and requisites necessary to form a Landscape Garden, given as briefly as the nature of the subject would admit. We should be pleased to see greater attention paid to this delightful art in this country than has yet been manifested, and more expense, care and taste displayed by the owners of grounds in laying out and ornamenting them according to the principles of taste and art we have attempted to explain. We will now conclude with some just remarks of Mr. Repton. "In Sculpture we ought to admire the graces of a Venus de Medici as well as the majestic Apollo, the brawny Hercules, or the agonizing Laocoon. In Architecture there is not less beauty in the Grecian columns than in the Gothic spires, pinnacles and turrets. In like manner, gardens must include the two opposite characters of nature wildness and artificial comfort, each adapted to the genius and character of the place, yet ever mindful that near the residence of man, convenience and not picturesque effect must have the preference wherever they are placed in competition with each other."

SONNET.

BY D. H. ROBINSON.

No sleep for me to-night! A thousand things,
Whose hideous congregation serves to fright
The sweet restorer from my lids, this night
Come thronging here, with glaring eyes, and wings
Whose hue, on night, a deeper blackness flings!
Thoughts,—which are fiends,—with a most wild delight,
Crowd round my heart as if the vulture might
Of their foul talons now would rend the strings
Of that frail instrument! Yet shall the sound
That it gives forth,—the last that it may pour—
Spread sweeter music on the air around
Than it hath given in the days before!
And at my Lady's altar shall be found
One wreath of song—one vocal tribute more!

The Annexation of the republic of Texas to our Union is one of those important questions of general, national concern from which we do not deem that our position, or the character of our Journal requires us to keep aloof. As yet no political party has appropriated it, and it presents itself to the whole country.

Though some notes betokening discord between the North and South have reached our ears, yet they produced no alarm, and died away on the gale that bore them to us. Some who are not wont to cry "wolf" unnecessarily, may, for the want of better arguments against it, have predicted Disunion as the fruit of Annexation: others, who desire disunion, or at least care very little about the preservation of the Union, threaten only what they do not deprecate: others again, without duly considering the subject and viewing only one of its features, may seriously anticipate so awful a consequence.

The cry of Disunion can never have any music to our ears, but it should not be used to repress the discussion of great National questions. If there be now in this Confederacy any principles in operation, which will sever this beautiful Union, because of the admission of Texas to its benefits, will the exclusion of Texas arrest their progress! Will not such a tribute to their influence rather encourage and promote their extension, and produce a spirit of intolerance, which ere long may proscribe every measure that, apparently or remotely, conflicts with them? This Union was the product of brotherly love, of patriotic efforts, of mutual interests and concessions, of expanded philanthropy, and exalted wisdom. A Union thus formed and which has thus far so blessed us should not be, can not be recklessly severed. The nearer prospect of its dissolution would appal and drive back even those who now seem lightly to esteem its inestimable blessings, and whose course is even tending towards its destruction. Already have some, whose number and authority we will by no means exaggerate, begun to assail the spirit of Compromise on which our Constitution is based. Whilst these indications should not be magnified in importance, they may naturally lead even the patriotic mind to contemplate the possibility of dissolving the Union. It is a fact not to be disguised that the Union may be severed. But this fatal event ought not to be and can not be contemplated but with horror and dread;—only as a man revolves the possibility of taking human life in just self-defence.

These introductory remarks have been suggested by the course which some of the leading presses of the country, an ex-Senator and an ex-President of the U. S., with several of his associates in Congress, have taken upon this subject. But they need not be extended further at this time, since the Annexation of Texas is not a matter between North and South; but between our government and right and propriety,—between the United States and the world. It is to be viewed, then, as a great NATIONAL question, one of the most important that has ever arisen in our history; and as such we shall humbly endeavor to discuss it.

There are some preliminary matters to which it may be proper first to devote a little attention.

Though this is a measure preëminently demanding the most enlarged consideration, there are some influences that are likely to interfere with an impartial investigation of it. Already has it been charged that Speculators are at the bottom of the Annexation measure. No doubt, the interest of a large number impels them to be its noisy and zealous supporters. The activity of a small number, so deeply interested, can produce a considerable excitement, that may be confounded with an indication of the popular will.

But, then, is no attention to be paid to the sharp-sightedness of Speculators? Why did they stake so much upon Texas? Was it not from a knowledge of her fertility, her vast resources, her relative position to the United States, pointing her out as an adopted daughter, and the certainty of her becoming an independent and populous country? The very deep stake which the intelligent and far-sighted enterprise of our citizens has taken in that country may thus be made an indication of its value and importance to us. But the ablest advocates of Annexation have no direct interest in the subject. General Jackson has none; Senator Walker has none. Governor Gilmer was interested, but he visited the country, viewed it, obtained information respecting its prospects and resources, and upon this careful investigation made his investment. Is not this a stronger evidence of his convictions in favor of Texas, than it is of his judgment being subsequently influenced by his interest? Mr. Adams looks at only one thing, and would not have the most fertile fields if hoed by a slave. And is he not interested to keep out of the Union territory which, it is said, he once gave away, without a sous in return? The developments upon this subject are truly astounding. Accustomed to look upon Mr. Adams as venerable for his eminence and learning, notwithstanding his pernicious and obstinate course upon slavery, deeply would we regret to see him stripped of his integrity in his old age, and branded with the public scorn.

But it is illiberal to seek to invalidate one's arguments by the convenient mode of charging him with interested motives. No matter what impels a man, the true issue is has he seen the truth and does he properly vindicate it.

The other circumstances calculated to prevent an impartial investigation of the subject are of a political character. Though the Annexation of Texas has not yet been espoused by either party, yet there are strong indications of a tendency towards it. This is sincerely to be regretted and deprecated in reference to a subject so purely national. The moment party spirit becomes infused into the measure, men's minds will be blinded and the question, shall "Texas be admitted," will become synonymous with "who shall be President." Shame upon a narrow party-spirit, on either side, that would mar and distort so beautiful a scheme in its inception!

Again, it may be a sufficient reason for some to denounce the Annexation of Texas that it was projected and is now urged by Mr. Tyler. Mr. Tyler has been charged with making humiliating advances to the government of Texas; with folly and madness in hastily and recklessly pressing a treaty for Annexation, without consulting the Senate, and first ascertaining the will of the people; and the example of the peerless Washington has been arrayed against him. These objections and denunciations involve some important constitutional questions, and will, therefore, be briefly considered.

Had Mr. Tyler first consulted the Senate, as did the matchless Washington on several occasions, he certainly could not be censured for it. But he need not be condemned for not doing it. Various matters may transpire pending a negotiation of such importance as to operate upon the decisions of Senators, and until negotiations have proceeded nearly to a close, there is hardly any thing definite enough to propound to the Senate. In each case General Washington made to the Senate a definite proposition, the result of diplomatic deliberation.

The Constitution gives power to the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." The Senate must consent to the treaties made by the President, who may seek their advice in the formation of those contemplated by him. But does the Constitution imply that he shall always consult the Senate, and that in advance? He may see no difficulty worthy of such umpires, and should not be required to make the obstacles and objections that others profess to see the ground of his action. Much discretion is given to the President in the formation of treaties. He may even contract them when the Senate are not in session; and when he could not ask their advice, without calling them together. This he may do, but need not. Mr. Jay has well said,

"As in the field, so in the Cabinet, there are moments to be seized as they pass, and they who preside in either should be left in capacity to improve them." * * * "The Convention have done well, therefore, in so disposing of the power of making treaties, that although the President must, in forming them, act by the advice and consent of the Senate, yet he will be able to manage the business of intelligence in such a manner as prudence may suggest."*

The President may, "with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint foreign ministers, judges, &c."; but he never asks them whom they will accept. In their approval or rejection of his nominations their advice is given. A treaty proposed for ratification is but the nominee, as it were, of the President.

But the will of the people should be ascertained, fairly and fully! And strange to say some who are clamorous for the "will of the people" oppose even a discussion and agitation of the question, "at this time." By their own showing, the President is urging a treaty and the question will soon be presented: light, then, should be instantly spread before the people. But away with the introduction of such levelling, radical doctrines into the exalted Senate of the United States! Long before any such circumstance arose, before any such appeals were made, or any such ultra notions entertained, the people have deliberately and wisely expressed their abiding will, in reference to all matters involved in Treaties, by committing the whole subject to the President and Senate. For their wisdom, their patriotism and the confidence shown to be reposed in them by elevating them to such eminent positions in the Government, it is the deliberate, predetermined will of the people, that all matters relating to Treaties should be intrusted to them. This is an expression of the people's will as to this whole class of subjects, and they are to be considered as radicals and undoers, who would now bring in a resolution, agitation, public meeting, newspaper expression of the popular will, in the place of that heretofore constitutionally declared. Let all such ponder the almost prophetic words of Mr. Jay.

"However useful," says he, "jealousy may be in republics, yet when, like bile in the natural, it abounds too much in the body politic, the eyes of both become very liable to be deceived, by the delusive appearances which that malady casts on surrounding objects. From this cause, probably proceed the fears and apprehensions of some, that the President and Senate may make treaties without an equal eye to the interests of all the States."*

With the political capital, which it is alleged Mr. Tyler expects to make out of Texas, we have nothing to do. But it is obvious that this will be one of the greatest perturbing influences.

As to the charge of haste and secrecy.—It is well known that secrecy and despatch are the great requisites in international negotiations. The extent to which these may properly be carried must be determined by the facts and circumstances of the case; which necessarily are often, nay generally, known only to the contracting employés. What, if matters of delicacy towards Mexico, in order to satisfy the scruples of those who would deprive Texas of the substance of an Independence, which has been formally recognised, are under discussion? What, if the various rumors of the efforts and intentions of England be for the most part true? What if preliminaries of delicacy and difficulty are to be settled? Are these things all to be laid bare prematurely to satisfy the curiosity of the impertinent, or to silence the charges of the captious? By the adoption of the treaty making provision of the Constitution, the people have long since declared, "we will patiently wait for these developments. We have entrusted the entire business to those, whom we have selected. We have done this in advance, when our judgment was carefully formed and deliberately expressed."

"The matters," says Mr. Jay, "which in negotiations usually require the most secrecy, and the most despatch, are those preparatory and auxiliary measures, &c." * * * "Thus we see that the constitution provides that our negotiations for treaties shall have every advantage, which can be derived from talents, information, integrity, and deliberate investigation, on the one hand; and from secrecy and despatch on the other."†

As these objections have been urged by some of no inconsiderable influence and authority, and seemed to contain some important errors, we have deemed it proper thus to notice them. Having now cleared away these preliminary matters, and declaring that we have no manner of personal interest in the matter, we will proceed to the more direct examination of the subject.

The opponents of the Annexation of Texas fortify themselves behind the Constitution, under no less a champion than Mr. Webster. What a position for him to occupy! Its obvious inconsistency must destroy his authority; and it will offily be admitted that the great intellect of Mr. Webster can find arguments against his own principles. Even if the purchase and admission of Florida and Louisiana do not settle the Constitutional question, under the treaty-making power, Texas may still be admitted constitutionally in other ways. The author of strict construction presided over the admission of one of those territories; and all deemed that the importance of their acquisition justified the measure. Hence it might only be inquired whether Texas could be brought into the same category of importance for her to be admitted. Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison manifested their sense of its importance, when they refused to give up any part of it even to secure Florida. But, as stated, there are other and lawful modes of adopting her.

The Constitution (Art. IV., § 3,) says;

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

It is obvious that the first clause is the only one that has the least reference to the question before us. Does the power of Congress to admit new States apply solely to territory belonging to us, at the time the Constitution was adopted? The section quoted does not say so; and a reference to the proceedings of the Convention of 1787 will show that such a restriction was proposed, but rejected and the present general provision inserted.* The situation of our country, too, at that time, its incomplete boundaries and the important positions on our borders then in the possession of foreign powers render such a restriction highly injurious and improbable.

But it may be said that the above power is confined to the Admission of New States only; and under it Texas must be admitted as one or more States, at once; whilst many of the friends of Annexation wish Texas to be for some time, at least, only a Territory. Under this grant of power, then, one or more States must be immediately erected upon the introduction of Texas. We see no great objection to this; and there is no imperative reason for retaining a Territory in probation. But if the right of Congress to admit new States into this Union be not confined to the Territory within our limits, does not the Constitution necessarily imply the power to take all the steps preparatory towards the admission of new States out of Territory recently acquired? If so, and the ground is certainly a very plausible one, then Congress may admit Territory with the certain view of forming it into new States, as soon as it can properly be done.

Another mode of receiving Texas into the Union is also pointed out by the Hon. Senator Walker. The Constitution (Art. I., Sec. 10,) says,

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with any other State, or with a foreign power."

Hence, he argues, that with the consent of Congress, Louisiana, or Arkansas might enter into a compact or agreement, by which Texas would become a part of one of those States. But the mode in which Texas is to be dealt with after this is not pointed out. It would probably be ceded to the General Government, as was done by Maryland and Virginia; and then admitted as new State into the Union.

Did the honorable Senator advert to another clause of the same section—"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation;" without any reference to the consent of Congress. This clause is different from and yet must be reconcilable with the one quoted above. If the former would seem to sanction the supposed "compact or agreement," does not the latter utterly prohibit it? The two are to be reconciled by a nice and accurate definition of the terms "compact" and "agreement" as contrasted with "treaty," "alliance" and "confederation." We will not undertake this task; but would not the supposed junction with Louisiana, or Arkansas be as well embraced by the term "treaty" or "confederation," which is prohibited, as by the term "compact," or "agreement," which is permitted, with the consent of Congress?

Under the views, thus feebly presented, of the various modes of annexation proposed, we feel best contented and most certain in relying upon the precedents of Florida and Louisiana, believing it to be idle to urge any other consideration to a mind not satisfied with them;—uniting as they do in their favor the opinions and acts of the Congress, Presidents, Secretaries, Ministers and people, and these, too, antipodes in their views of the powers granted by the Constitution.

A large South Western Territory, of which Texas was a part, was acquired by the U. S., along with Louisiana, from France, by treaty, under Mr. Jefferson's administration, in 1803. By the right of discovery, Spain held the Floridas and Mexico. France held possession on the Mississippi. Along the Gulf towards Mexico, there still extended a large unknown territory, which was settled by La Salle, in 1685, under a commission from Louis the XIV. of France, by planting a Colony at the Bay of St. Bernard, (Espirito Santo,) on the Western Bank of the Colorado of Texas. The possession thus taken, in connexion with that on the Mississippi, gave France an acknowledged right in the Country as far as the Rio Bravo. It is said, that by actual treaty, in 1760, the Western boundary of Louisiana was fixed at the Rio Bravo, or Grande. Owing to some secret articles which the treaty contained and the unimportance of the boundaries agreed on to any but France and Spain, the treaty was never made public.*

In 1763, France ceded her possessions to Spain, who now held the whole of the Southern part of North America. In 1800, Spain retroceded Louisiana to France, with the same extent that it had when France possessed it; and we obtained it in the year 1803, from France, with the same metes and bounds. But in our treaty with Spain in 1819, conducted by President Monroe and Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, the Western boundary of the United States was fixed at the Sabine river, far to the East of the Rio Grande. At that time it was insisted that our territory extended much farther West; and the treaty was violently opposed by many for yielding it up. Mr. Clay contended that the Union had no right to cede away territory, and that the treaty was null and void. Mr. Adams is now charged with having culpably relinquished our claim, when he was persuaded of its justice and had been informed by our Minister at Madrid that Spain would even form a treaty acknowledging the Colorado as the Western limit of the United States. General Jackson afterwards wished to extend our Western border beyond California to the Pacific, and this will yet have to be done to complete our boundaries.

The charges made against Mr. Adams are very serious, but are repelled, and we will not now indulge in any farther consideration of them. Whether he did as Secretary of State designedly abandon our Western possessions to Spain, or not, it is certain that when he was President, in 1825, and 1827, he was convinced of the importance of regaining them, and made overtures for that purpose to Mexico, before, too, her Independence was recognized by Spain. Why does he oppose it now?

President Jackson and his successive Secretaries of State made repeated proffers to Mexico concerning the Annexation of Texas. If it was not humiliating in these Presidents to solicit negotiations with Mexico, why should it be so for another to make offers to Independent Texas, who had, too, long since made them to us? Thus, we have eminent politicians, no less antipodal than Mr. Adams and General Jackson, Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren, all in favor of the acquisition of Texas and having no doubt as to the Constitutionality of the measure. This, too, was years ago; and what was prophecy then is fulfilment now; what then was hope is realization now; what was conjecture and inference then as to her resources and relations to foreign powers have now become historical and statistical facts. Two hundred thousand inhabitants are developing her immense wealth; millions of annual production of the most varied articles of commerce,—useful, as cotton and sugar, precious, as gold and silver, and beautiful and luscious as a fertile soil and genial climate can make them,—attest their industry, at a time, too, when only the left hand guides the plough; for the right must hold the sword. When peace, which Annexation to the United States will secure her, shall have spread her wings over this bounteous land; when her pure sky unobscured by the dark clouds of war shall again smile upon her fertile fields, cultivated with swords converted into plough-shares, and with a vigor and industry nerved by the hardships, the privations and the indebtedness of a protracted war, who can estimate the stores which she will produce and her rapid progress towards a great and populous nation? A bold current of energy and enterprise, the most valuable capital, would immediately set towards her, and the products of her rich soil and genial climate would be almost miraculous! Her position, her wants, her dangers, the necessities of which nature in her compensations has deprived her, the spirit of the age and of true policy forbid that she should remain alone. Who shall have her, but the United States? Who wants her more? Into whose lap is she so willing to pour her boundless treasures? Her united people have asked for Annexation to us. We alone of all the world should have her, except her own brave people, who have rescued her from the grasp of Tyranny; and they desire her to be adopted into our happy family of lovely sisters.

Texas having been once a part of the U. States, much stress has been laid upon it; and that fact is supposed to have some influence both upon the constitutionality and expediency of receiving her again;—since it will be only a re-admission of what was once our own, but was culpably surrendered. Thus the Hon. Senator Walker, throughout his very able and eloquent letter, speaks only of re-annexation. On page 8, he says.

"This is no question of the purchase of new territory, but of the re-annexation of that which once was all our own. It is not a question of the extension of our limits, but of the restoration of former boundaries."

It is true, he also says, p. 6.

"Here, then, are many grave questions of constitutional power. Could the solemn guaranty to France, and to the people of Texas, (the guaranty in the treaty of 1803,—not to surrender the territory, to incorporate it into the Union and to secure to the people of Texas the enjoyment of Liberty, &c.,) be rescinded by a treaty with Spain? Can this government, by its own mere power, surrender any portion of its territory? Can it cut off a territory without the consent of its people, and surrender them and the territory to a foreign power? Can it expatriate and expel from the Union its own citizens, who occupy that territory, and change an American citizen into a citizen of Spain or Mexico? These are momentous questions, which it is not necessary now to determine, and in regard to which I advance at this time no opinion."

* This is stated by a writer in the Richmond Enquirer of April 2, 1844. A copy of the boundary article, duly authenticated, of the said Treaty of 1760 was obtained from the Department of Foreign Affairs in France, by a Mr. Jos. M. Davis.

Yet by the stress laid upon re-annexation and the drift of parts of the argument, a solution of some of them is strongly implied.

With due deference, we present the following views. Such questions as those propounded by the Hon. Senator are properly raised when the ratification of a treaty is proposed. Most of those stated by him arose and were discussed, in the ratification of the treaty of 1819. We have remedies against the formation of improper treaties; but they are preventive rather than restorative, which according to a popular adage, we know are far better. The President and his Cabinet gravely discuss these important measures, and they ought to be no bad expounders of the Constitution. This at least is the theory of our Government. They must then pass through the trying ordeal of our enlightened Senate and receive the seal of Constitutionality and expediency from two thirds of that august body. We will not disparage the station and preëminence of these high dignitaries, by deeming this an ordinary or insufficient test.

But a Law may pass both houses of Congress, and the Senate by a majority of two thirds, yet be unconstitutional, and so the Supreme Court shall decide. This is remotely possible. As a practical question, however, the deliberate judgment of two thirds of the Senate is as likely to be right as the decision of a majority of seven Judges. The House of Lords in England is the highest appellate court; and in some of our States, as in New-York, a part of the Senate sit with the Judges in the Court of Errors. May not the Constitution, then, have confided the final determination of Treaties to the Senate? Foreign Countries are not likely and can not be expected to know much of our peculiar system; and they must have some security, some final ratifier of their compacts with us. National faith requires that great sanctity should be attached to Treaties; and none held this in higher regard than the framers of our Constitution, which declares that all treaties "shall be the Supreme Law of the Land." This paramount authority of treaties was subjected to many assaults; but there it stands, a guaranty to the nations and a fixed law to us. Though, according to the theory of some very able doctors of the Constitution, the Federal Government is not Sovereign; yet in reference to this subject it must "exercise the powers and functions of Sovereignty." New negotiations may be opened for relief from oppressive treaties; and if the circumstances justify the risk of opprobrium and an avenging war, a Sovereign nation might repudiate the treaty and defy her adversary. This would require an almost unprecedented case of fraud, or other malpractice, of which each nation must be her own judge, with a due respect for the opinions of enlightened Christendom.

Admitting then that Texas was ours; that Spain cheated us out of it, even with the connivance of Mr. Adams; and that it was all decidedly wrong, nay unconstitutional, if this can be, we are now estopped from going behind subsequent transactions, in order to assert our claim. What and against whom would be our remedy? How and where could we plead the unconstitutionality of a treaty formed, ratified and involved in important subsequent events?—events no less than revolution and acknowledged Independence. If Spain defrauded us, in what Court of Chancery can you plead her fraud? Such a one as it was proposed to put Bounaparte in! War against Spain is our only remedy, for she can not possibly restore us to our former position. But we hope and believe that this is not hinted at by any. Mexico threw off the yoke of Spain and we have acknowledged her Independence. Texas was then a known and avowed part of the Republic of Mexico. Now, Texas has thrown off the yoke of Mexico, and we have acknowledged her Independence. What, then, can the fact that we once possessed Texas be to us, at this time, but a matter of mere history and perhaps some sort of pursuasive inducement to receive her into this Union? If the Cession of Texas to Spain in 1819 was voidable in foro gratum, for the alleged fraud of Spain; or, if possible, void ab initio, on account of its unconstitutionality, we must also set aside two recognitions of her Independence, upon us as well as others, and then we have a right to pursue and take her in whosoever hands she may be. Hence, too, we ought to have fought for her in her war with Mexico, as a part of our territory, according to our guaranty to France in 1803, and have a right to take her now, without even her own consent. These seem to us to be necessary deductions from the doctrines of re-annexation; as having any difference from a substantive, independent, stipulated annexation of the acknowledged Republic of Texas to this Union.

Our government has always insisted upon enforcing neutrality in the war between Mexico and Texas. Though General Jackson was so anxiously in favor of acquiring Texas, and his sympathies with a struggling people—sympathies which formerly marked a feature of his character and which even led him to favor the disorganisers of Rhode Island,—so strongly moved him, never for a moment thought of treating Texas as our own and rendering her any assistance. She is now "free and independent as she of right ought to be,"—severed from us and the rest of the world and that acquiesced in. If we get her again it must be by treaty with her, as with Spain and France in the case of Louisiana and Florida. If annexation per se is not expedient, right and Constitutional, the prædicta Re with all the facts it involves can not alter in either of these respects. But if a tract of country situated as Texas is, should be elevated above the water by an earthquake, it would be expedient and constitutional for the U. States to take possession of it, if without inhabitants, or to purchase it, should it be claimed by any animals "half horses and half alligators with a touch of the earthquake," which we understand to be the nature of some of the South-Western people. It may have been inexpedient to resign territory and still inexpedient to regain it. The proposition to regain a lost possession must be justified by its own intrinsic merits.

But these facts will furnish arguments to silence the objections, or at least destroy the authority of some of the prominent opponents of Annexation.

But some who take, as we think, a just view of re-annexation, as contradistinguished from Annexation, run into an opposite error of denying the Independence of Texas, at least so far as to authorise us to treat for her Annexation, with due respect for our stipulations with Mexico. The high authority of Mr. McDuffie, when Governor of South Carolina, is relied upon to show that we can not treat with Texas until Mexico pleases to acknowledge her Independence. Beautiful subserviency of a sovereign power! Most liberal tribute to the rights of Sovereignty!—of Mexico, certainly; but what becomes of those of Texas and the United States! Sacrificed to cowardly fear!—or, at least, false notions of national comity.

We doubt if Mr. McDuffie holds any such doctrine. In his Executive Message he was enforcing the duty of neutrality towards Mexico. It was in the first years of her war with Texas. In his earnestness he goes quite far, and does seem to countenance the doctrine above stated. But this is by no means conclusive that now, when we have waited seven or eight years since his message, when Texas is still Independent, though battling for her Freedom, Mr. McDuffie would contend that we should wait until Mexico acknowledged her Independence.

According to such a doctrine, the actual Independence of a country would not depend upon her ability to maintain it; nor upon the recognition of Sovereign States; but upon the pride and caprice of the mother country; and would be delayed in proportion to her obstinacy, tyrannical disposition, means of annoyance and the inequality of the contest. Thus a premium would be placed upon delay, jealousy, hate, obstinacy and injustice; and the most noble and gallant nation might be longest kept from being treated as Independent, because she happened to have asserted her freedom against the meanest and most tyrannical of mistresses. Many a man has been badly whipped, whose pride still kept him from hollowing "nough." If a disappointed and defeated State is thus to be rewarded for her injustice and can thus keep the nations of the earth at a distance from her former provinces, whom they acknowledge to be Independent, she may keep up a show of re-conquest, threaten much and loud, and thus be a standing scarecrow for all Christendom.

If Texas be Independent, she ought in all respects to be treated by us as such. How can it be ascertained? She says she is and will be and has established an Independent Government. The U. S. says she is. But she, they say, must not judge. Well, England, France, Holland, Belgium say she is. Shall their judgments be relied upon? The recognition of a new State in the family of Nations is not a matter of course and granted capriciously. Evidence of Texas' Independence and title to be Free was presented to each of them and they were satisfied. Certainly those who say we should wait for disappointed, defeated Mexico, have very little idea of National dignity and Sovereignty. Already have we paid the greatest deference to the rights of Mexico. We gave her a fair field, and shewed Texas no favor. When Texas proposed it, and her whole people with the exception of ninety-three voted for Annexation to us, we held her off in respect to Mexico. Six or seven years have elapsed; Texas is free; Mexico has been forced to agree to an armistice, which has been duly executed; her prisons have been emptied of the Texan prisoners; and an Independent organization is still in operation under the influence of the "Lone Star." Still we must wait for Mexico to liberate Texas! The Sovereignty of the United States prostrate before the footstool of Mexico! Yet a few years ago, we offered to buy this same country from her whose nod we now await, when she was contending against her Spanish Mother.

We did not hastily or unadvisedly acknowledge the Independence of Texas. From the Journal of the Senate, the following facts will appear.*

June 18, 1836, p. 448.

"Mr. Clay, from the committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the several memorials praying the recognition of the Independence of Texas, made a report, accompanied by the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil Government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an Independent Power."

With his usual promptness, President Jackson inquired into the condition of Texas through official agents.

On the 1st July, 1836, (Journal, p. 516) Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution as an amendment to that reported by Mr. Clay:

"Resolved, That the Senate has seen with satisfaction, that the President has adopted measures to ascertain the political, military and civil condition of Texas."

The vote was taken on both resolutions together, and they were unanimously adopted.

On the 22nd of December, 1836, Gen. Jackson communicated to Congress the substance of the information he had obtained in relation to the Government of Texas, which was of the most favorable character.

On the 12th of January, 1837, (Senate Journal, p. 110) Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution :

"Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent Governments; and it appearing there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war of Mexico against said State, it is expedient and proper, and in conformity with the laws of nations, and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States."

No vote was taken on its adoption until 1st March (Journal, 311,) when 23 Senators voted in the affirmative and 19 in the negative. The next day Mr. Ruggles moved to re-consider the vote, which motion was lost by a tie—24 to 24.

We have not traced the action of the House of Representatives on Mr. Walker's resolution. It is sufficient to say that it was adopted, and became binding on the Government. The Independence of Texas, as a nation, was fully acknowledged.

Shall we, then, deny the fruits and incidents of an Independence thus carefully recognized? Shades of Grotius, Puffendorf and Bynkershoek forbid it!

But, it is replied, the armistice you spoke of was with the Department of Texas and so expressly stated. The title which Texas chose to adopt can not affect or invalidate well established facts and institutions. The shadow can not destroy the substance. There is still an independent organization in Texas and will be, during and after the armistice. Such magnifiers of shadows would make good "homeopathic soup"—casting the shade of Mexico's displeasure not only over the whole of Texas and the Gulf of Mexico; but over this Union also.*

But when all these objections have been swept away, another meets us. We have enough, perhaps too much, territory already; our system will be too unwieldy; we shall crumble to pieces by our own weight; new interests will be introduced to disturb our harmony and endanger our peace.

This objection was urged against both Florida and Louisiana. Farther than this, it was urged against the union of the blessed "old Thirteen." The pen of Madison silenced it then and shall do so now.

* Homeopathic Soup. Some doctor who did not believe very firmly in the infinitely small doses and subdivisions of Homeopathy burlesqued them by the following receipt. Take two starved chickens, and hang them in the kitchen door, where a ray of the sun comes in, so that their shadow will fall on a pot on the fire, containing ten gallons of water. Boil the shadow for an hour; then take one drop of the soup, put it into a wine glass of water and give the patient one drop every ten days.

The beauty and completeness of our Representative system removes this objection entirely. Hence Mr. Madison says :*

"In a democracy, the people meet and exercise the government in person: in a republic, they assemble and administer it by their representatives and agents. A democracy, consequently, must be confined to a small spot. A republic may be extended over a large region." * * *

"The natural limit of a republic, is that distance from the centre, which will barely allow the representatives of the people to meet as often as may be necessary for the administration of public affairs. Can it be said, that the limits of the United States exceed this distance?"

"On a comparison of this extent, with that of several countries in Europe, the practicability of rendering our system commensurate to it, appears to be demonstrable."

But the comparison then instituted by Mr. Madison may be better substituted by that of Mr. Walker.†

"British empire—area, 8,100,000 square miles; population, 200,000,000.

Russian empire—area, 7,500,000 square miles; population, 75,000,000.

Chinese empire—area, 5,500,000 square miles; population, 250,000,000.

Brazil—area, 3,000,000 square miles; population 6,000,000.

United States (including Texas)—area, 2,318,000 square miles; population, 19,000,000.

Here is one monarchy, (the British empire,) nearly four times as large as the United States, including Texas; and one monarchy and three despotisms combined, largely more than ten times our area, also including Texas; and to assert, under these circumstances, that our government is to be overthrown or endangered by an addition of one-seventh to its area, is to adopt the exploded argument of kings and despots against our system of confederated States."

Favorable as is the representative system to a large territory, our peculiar confederated system is probably more so. The local interests, which would jar if brought under the control of the Union, are settled peaceably and quietly at home. Thus every day, are the State Governments readily adjusting matters, perhaps unknown beyond their borders, which, if brought under the cognizance of the General Government, would shake the Union to its centre.

It may be said, that Mr. Madison intended his reasoning to apply only to the present state and immediate prospects of the country at the time he wrote, (1788,) and never to the almost indefinite expansion which we seem to advocate. Mr. Madison himself approved of every extension of our area thus far, and also of the annexation of Texas. Certain it is, we have not yet attained the limit which he laid down even in 1788; and he anticipated an extension of it by new improvements. His patriotic visions could then reach no farther than the shortening and mending of roads and the construction of canals!! What limits would he assign to modern improvements! With Atlantic and Pacific steamers, from various ports on the East and from Columbia River and California in the West, almost pheric, or even common rail ways and magnetic telegraphs, the earth itself would scarcely be too large for the domain of a Confederate Government, like our own. What, if these United States should yet be the Liberal mistress of the world! The harmony and peace of the Union have been rather promoted by the enlarging of our borders. Disaffection has never raised its gorgon front in any of the new States. Hand in hand, in Peace and in War, have they moved on with the old and with each other, beautifully, bravely and triumphantly.

Still a cry as of some one in great perplexity assails us, asking "will you overwhelm the country with the immense, unknown debt of Texas, with her domain all covered by patents and alienated by grants!" If the debt of Texas be so unknown and unascertainable as some assert, wherefore is it so immense! It need not necessarily be like Walter Scott "the great unknown." It is only a small insect that has got into the telescopes of political philosophers and seems to be a huge monster in the "Lone Star," at which they are gazing.

The reader will perhaps be as much astonished, as we were, to learn the amount of this enormous debt, which it is said, and correctly, the United States will have to assume. We are informed by high authority, that the debts of Texas were estimated by a Committee of her Congress, in 1841, at $7,400,000; and that this is about the amount now due. With interest, it may amount to $8,000,000. But let us double this, nay quadruple it; and will a debt of $32,000,000 overwhelm this union! A few years ago, a surplus of $30,000,000 so encumbered our treasury, that it was virtually distributed among the States; and subsequently a sum more than sufficient to pay the whole debt of Texas has actually been distributed among such States as would receive it. Texas could be paid for and the burden not felt; and we would receive incalculably more than we would have to pay, even at thirty two millions. It is impossible to calculate the immense value of Texas as a Commercial position, during a continued Peace, and her importance would only be enhanced by a War. But besides all this, she has an area of 318,000 square miles; equal to about 203,000,000 of acres,—of which 136,000,000 of acres are reported by her land office to be public lands. Surely one hundred and thirty-six millions of acres of Texas lands will discharge a debt of thirty or forty millions of dollars. But ten millions would be a most liberal estimate of her existing public debt. When a man buys a house, or a farm, he has to pay something for the beauty and eligibility of its situation. The position of Texas in relation to our teeming Western Valley, with her desirable harbors, is worth more than all her debt, in Peace or War; and as each year will increase her productions and those of all that fruitful region, her value will augment continually.

We desired to give more attention at this time to the objection based upon Slavery and the Dissolution of the Union; but must confine ourselves to a few words.

Is this question of slavery likely ever to dissolve the Union! If so, is it the duty of the South alone to bear and forbear! Are we to be told continually by many "hush! hush! give up! give up! You'll dissolve the Union!" and then by others to be threatened that the Union shall be dissolved, if we do not in every measure, however remotely connected with slavery, yield to their direction! Where shall we stop! The admission of slave states is not the only form in which this question is to meet, or has met us.

Abolition, or to use a milder and we hope a truer term, emancipation in the North is but a feeling, a movement of philanthropy, often mistaken, and with many, Oh! how misguided! Ignorance and prejudice, too, mingle with and often incite it. Slavery in the South is an Institution, vesting rights and conferring property,—recognized and guarantied by the Constitution. Shall the latter,—substantial, existing and Constitutional, be made to yield to the former,—shadowy, visionary, interfering, fanatical and unlawful! The South dearly loves the Union and will not break it. She wishes that it may not be broken. But having rights, which she knows and must (even for safety) maintain, she may not always yield to those whom she thinks can be and ought to be brought to moderation and right. Unless the sentiments and policy of Mr. Adams and Mr. Webster and their followers are changed, a worse question than Annexation may force our decision. Viewing the progress of anti-slavery sentiment from the time when Wilberforce and Clarkson labored for years to obtain, from the parliament of a land, the touch of whose soil, it is boasted, unshackles every slave, even the abolition of the nefarious slave-trade, down to the present time, when an English minister has openly declared to the Chargé d'affaires of this same Texas,* that her majesty can not tolerate the existence of Slavery any where, we must be convinced that it is not likely to recede. We then behold it crossing the Atlantic and steering North, lest it should be deterred by the groans and horrors of emancipated Domingo, taking root and flourishing here in this Union. Its strength and dispositions ought to be tested; and we firmly believe that the result will be greater harmony and a closer union. Instead, then, of Annexation dissolving the Union, it will confirm it and test and expose the strength of abolition.

These suggestions do not proceed from any excited feeling towards the North. We have none;—quite the reverse. But the question of slavery has nothing to do with the Annexation of Texas; and if it be lugged in, they who do it must bear the blame and the consequences. Not intimidated by threats, not influenced by fear, even of Disunion, which she sincerely deprecates and does nothing to promote, the South will adhere to her own rights and to the true interests of the whole country.

* See letter of the Earl of Aberdeen to the Hon. Ashbel Smith. National Intelligencer of the 10th April, 1844.

We have thus considered very hastily, as we were compelled to do, most, if not all, the objections to the Annexation of Texas. It was deemed proper to endeavor to remove these, before entering upon the direct arguments in its favor. But in answering them, many of the advantages of Annexation have been necessarily adverted to and partially enforced. Every important measure must have some strong considerations in its favor; and surely if the objections to it can be effectually combated, this of itself is enough to justify it. In the case before us, not only do the objections appear to be susceptible of refutation; but allowing them the full force which their supporters claim for them, the arguments on the other side greatly preponderate. The consideration of these, however, must be reserved for another occasion; and, unless rendered entirely useless by some unforeseen occurrence, will be entered into more at large, in our June number.

Our beautiful and blessed Union being preserved, the good of the North is the good of the South; and the reverse. The Annexation of Texas, then, would extend the South Western boundary of the United States, according to the dictates of interest and the arrangement of nature; leaving it hereafter to be completed by the acquisition of California and the interjacent country. Then, with a Naval Depot and National Armory on the Mississippi, and Key West and the Tortugas well fortified, as suggested by our very gifted and estimable friend, Lieut. M. F. Maury,* this Union would be more in the position that a great, Independent nation should occupy. These should be, whether Texas joins us or not.

Texas would afford a large additional market for the manufactures of the North. She has already opened wide her marts for their reception; and before she was thrown upon foreigners and strangers, consumed in one year (1840) over one million and two hundred thousand dollars' worth of our products,—nearly the whole from the North. Though this has been reduced more than one million of dollars, by her intercourse with other countries, it would all be restored and largely increased in an accelerated ratio, if she were adopted by us.

A market would also be opened for slaves; and abhorrent as this may be to some pseudo-philanthropists, it will effectually promote their final emancipation. Already has slavery gradually receded towards the South. Every census has exhibited a great decrease in every old slave State.

* "Maritime Interests of the South and West." Southern Quarterly Review, October, 1843.

This gradual disappearance of slavery is the only possible way of getting rid of it. It will not plunge itself into the Gulf of Mexico; it can not jump across. It will slide on towards Texas;—thence into Mexico, to be amalgamated there, if any where, with its free inhabitants. This, a sensible quaker merchant of New York plainly perceives and enforces in a letter to the Hon. R. I. Walker.* As the best and only means of gradually getting rid of slavery, Annexation commends itself to those who desire its abolition.

To the South, the Annexation of Texas would bring no benefits peculiar to it, farther than the increased protection of its frontier from the ravages of war. In another war, the South would probably be the greatest sufferer,—and would have to bear the brunt. But the North also, as a part of the Union, needs the same protection.

On the contrary, it is plain that Texas, being necessarily an agricultural country, would compete with the Southern States. They will have, indeed, to encounter this competition in any event. But Annexation will quicken it and bring it to bear sooner and more directly. Emigration, even from the fertile and sunny South, will flow into Texas, and Southern lands will inevitably fall. Slaves will rise, which may partly compensate for the fall of lands, but not altogether; and then they will take their way to the better market of Texas, as we have before intimated. Still the Southern States will go on filling up, the places of the slaves sold or removed must be supplied from the more Northern Slave States, and thus the decrease already so considerable will be accelerated. But the products and settlement of Texas can in no wise affect the Northern States disadvantageously. The more she produces, the greater her means of buying from the North; the sooner she is filled with an industrious population, the more consumers of Northern manufactures. But the South should, for the prospective advantage to herself and the Union, be willing to submit to the temporary depreciation of her lands and abstraction of her citizens. She has ever been self sacrificing for the general welfare.

This is the national view which we love to take of this important and engaging subject. But if any will have us disunited, let us, for their benefit only, take a one sided glance.

The dark and gloomy hour has arrived! The Constitution is annulled! Its fathers' hopes, intentions, counsels, prayers and pledges are all blighted, disregarded and broken! Two branches of the same family once united and happy, their fate ruled by the same stars, worshipping the same God, under the same vine and fig tree, can not any longer live peaceably together! They have burst the bonds of kindred and of union and become as strangers in the land of their fathers !

* See letter of Aaron Leggett. Richmond Enquirer, March 22nd, 1844.

We will not here attempt to draw any pictures of the scenes to be anticipated from the dire disruption. Let us, in charity and fond hope, suppose peace at least to prevail between them.

The North has the Old World and will soon have a good portion of the Southern States to compete with her manufactures. Her own territory will hardly, if it all, supply her necessities. She will be excluded from our markets ; and from the affections of our people. If she should propose a treaty with us ; the first requisite would be, " you must let alone slaves and slavery among us, and surrender every offender against those laws which we have made respecting it." Without this, she could have no communion with us. Then why not do these under the Union and the Constitution ? There are very few, scarcely any foreign countries with which she could make advantageous commercial treaties. Old countries are not agricultural, but manufacturing and they would be the rivals and not the allies of the North. Thus secluded, the ingenuity of her people might get them along, but their situation could not be envied.

Her profitable carrying trade would be destroyed. Having so few markets, not already overstocked with their own manufactures, she would soon have but little to carry : of course, we would exclude her, and her crowded marine would be thrown without employment upon her hands. The Barques of the East would no longer plough the waters of the South. But the iron of Virginia and Tennessee, the hemp of Kentucky and the pine of the old North State, with the exhaustless live-oak of Texas, wrought into stately ships by Southern skill and enterprise, would spread our abundant exports over the world, bringing us in return the riches and the products of every clime. Prosperous commerce would be carried on along our whole Atlantic coast and our Western Mediterranean would present a more thriving scene than was ever witnessed by Venice, throned on her hundred isles, in her proudest day.

In all this, too, England would be glad to unite with us, in order to give occupation to a part of her immense marine.

The South, moreover, on account of her agricultural products, could form commercial treaties with England, France and every country that has more mouths than food to fill them, and more manufactures than she can consume at home. Should they exclude us, as they certainly would not do, Virginia, whose facilities are as great as any in the world, could soon produce manufactures enough for the whole South ; and with, or without foreign alliances, she would become a large manufacturing State, and Richmond surpass Lowell itself. Norfolk, Richmond, Charleston and Savannah would receive the commercial wealth that now fills the coffers of Boston and New York. Even glorious old Yorktown would be revived ; and disunion thus give life to the spot that witnessed the consummation of our Independence. The stream of wealth, too, that now flows from New York down the Great Mississippi valley, would then seek the Ohio through the James River and Kanawha canal which would be completed in " the twinkling of an eye," for its reception. The great South Western trade, that will be so greatly promoted by the Annexation of Texas, will under the Union advance the completion of this stupendous undertaking. New Orleans is, in any event, destined to be one of the greatest emporiums of the world. The Mississippi may be confined within its banks ; but a flood of wealth will ere long pour in upon her, that will overflow her levées, inundate her wharves, fill her storehouses, though constructed on a scale of unrivalled grandeur, to the highest apartments, and overspread the whole Gulf of Mexico. New Orleans with all her treasures will be a Southern City, supplying us and the world with the abundance of her stores. If Texas can then be had by us, we will have her ; and will open, if possible, a way to the equally bounteous California, when the East, with her luxuries and her demands for many of our staples, will be brought almost into our laps. The South would then have her depots and arsenals on the Mississippi, and Key West and the Tortugas would be strongly fortified. War would affect her relations and interests as it does those of all nations. Slavery has never yet sapped the valor of a people, and the weakness of the South on account of its existence might be found not so great as has been imagined. More negroes would be found fighting by their masters' sides, or enduring merciless stripes rather than betray them, than would be arrayed on the side of their enemies. This has been and will be again, if another occasion should offer, which Heaven avert !

But we trust that the South will forever be a part of the Union and that Texas will be admitted to it, for the good of the whole. As the Honorable Senator Walker observes, Texas is but a part of the Mississippi valley, of which New York may be considered the head. The United States should possess the whole of this teeming region. Texas is quite essential for the protection and full enjoyment of that which we now possess.

This immense and fertile valley is destined to be the spinal marrow of our confederacy and seems to be a perpetual bond of union between the slave and non-slave States. We have sometimes been quite wrapt in visions, when contemplating its future prospects and productiveness. The inland sea, which geologists tell us once swept over its bosom, seems but a type of the flood of wealth which it is destined to send forth to the South West. No limits can be set to the almost creative energies of its rich loam ; and nature seems to have given its great rivers their unceasing onward flow to bear more swiftly its teeming products to those waiting to receive them. Shall not Texas as a branch of this fruitful valley be allowed to enjoy and contribute to swell its streams of wealth? For natural advantages she can compare favorably with almost any country;—in the variety and luxuriance of her products vieing with the tierra templada of Mexico, whose soil and climate rendered her almost a paradise three centuries ago; the descriptions of whose beauty and magnificence so graphically drawn by Prescott warm the imaginations of the least enthusiastic. Gold and silver, sugar and cotton, fruits and flowers, the vigor of the mountains, the luxuriance of the tropics, beauty and grandeur, all are hers. Her rivers, forests and plains are filled with their respective tenants, her fields return multifold into the bosom of the husbandman, and in many parts the air is so pure that it taints not the fresh spoil of the hunter.

All these are tendered to us and the offer has been in part accepted. A treaty now awaits only the confirmation of the Senate. As its provisions have not transpired, we will not indulge in rumor. If we do not receive Texas, her "lone star" will be dimmed or extinguished by dependence on an overshadowing power. Like the star of old in the West it goes before our "wise men" to show them where the young Republic is. If we are true to ourselves, it will be taken to our firmament and emblazoned on our flag, under whose protection and increased splendor our ships will bear our products and hers over every sea.

POESY.

The bright green Earth in beauteous guise,
Beautiful still, as in days of old;
How she wooeth the soul with her witching eyes,
And her robe of gems and gold!
That radiant robe, where the silver sheen,
Of the drops of dew, and the lake serene,
In glory vie, with the emerald green
Of the clustering vines,
Where the ivy twines,
And the insect skippeth in dulcet play,
And the wild bird trills its caroling lay.
O Earth! thou art the Poet's theme;
The brightness of the Beautiful!
More gorgeous than his pictur'd dream,
Of fairy-fancy full.
The sea—the sky—the bright array—
The radiant sun that sheds for aye
The splendor of his glorious ray;
The thousand things,
On happy wings,
The dying all—the breathing whole—
O twine they not the Poet's soul?
The purling play of murmuring streams—
The flowery mead—the winding dell—
The Beautiful! O there the dreams
Of Poets ever dwell!

Nor dreams alone: before that shrine,
Where God has set his signet-sign,
—The impress of a hand divine—
O there his soul,
Doth seek its goal,
Striving for aye that goal to win,
And drink its inspiration in.
And thus, and thus, the Poet sings;
Wedded unto his holy art;
And thus for aye he fondly clings,
With love's unfaltering heart!
Sorrow may try the gifted sore;
Neglect may pierce his bosom's core;
Chill Penury, with open door
And horrid grin,
May bid him in,
And scorn and malice blast at will,—
The Poet is a Poet still.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

IPHIGENIA AT TAURIS.

We finish this month the translation of this beautiful production; one most worthy of the original; and take great pleasure in accrediting it to Judge Beverley Tucker, Professor of Law in William and Mary College, and our honored preceptor. Taste he has long possessed,—genius always; but he has only recently devoted his attention, in the intervals of very arduous duties, to the acquisition of the German. His example and success may well be a lesson and an encouragement to others. We particularly commend the whole of Iphigenia to our readers. Go back and read it, if any have omitted it, and dwell upon the matchless manner in which Iphigenia subdues the anger, and sways the purposes of the King. Disclosing all, she trusts to the power of virtuous innocence and earnest eloquence and is victorious.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

We wished to give this month some account of the proceedings of this patriotic association, at its first general meeting in April last. Its noble aims demand the highest praise; its national character and prospective, nay immediate, benefits entitle it to the fostering care of Government, and to the zealous coöperation of every one who can appreciate the relation of Literature and Science to the honor and prosperity of the Country. Their last, first meeting was something more than a commencement.—It was a decided achievement. More men of letters were there; more was done and said, and better, than might have been expected. Present enjoyment was found, when it had been mere anticipation; and though Hope is still the proper feeling, it is stronger and blended well with exultation.

We shall publish next month an article intended to be read before this "Institute," on the relation between the Caucasian master and the African slave, dedicated to the Hon. C. J. Ingersoll.

THE HOME LIBRARY—POETICAL SERIES

The Whitefooted Deer and other Poems; by Wm. Cullen Bryant. New York. J. S. Platt, 1844.

The Home Library is a new enterprise in which authors are somewhat interested. It is intended that they shall proportionately partake in the per-niary profits accruing from their productions. The first number of the new series begins with a small collection of poems from the pen of the ablest of the American poets. The peculiarities and characteristics of Mr. Bryant's verse need not be insisted on, at this late day, in referring to a new volume of his verses. His manner, modes of thinking and expression, the charm of his description, the delicacy of his fancy, the purity of his taste, are all familiar to the very humblest of those, in America, who read. This little volume, while it is undistinguished by any of those remarkable poems, such as "Thanatopsis," "The Prairies," &c., which have placed our author among the first of contemplative poets, is yet full of proofs of the presence of the same thoughtful mind, and observing eye. Gentle, placid and clear, the stream of Bryant's song runs along through woods and meadows, as charmingly and winningly, as the fair brooks, on whose banks he so much loves to wander and to meditate. We fancy, if there be any change in his song, it is in an increasing thoughtfulness—a deeper shadow gathers in his musings, and the tone, while it is equally solemn as before, is more subdued. Mr. Bryant does not often yield his muse to passing occasions. When he does so, he is singularly successful. Take for example the following lines which were chaunted at the funeral service of the late Dr. Channing. Occasional verses are well calculated to try the powers, and they commonly baffle the efforts, of the poet. Few succeed in them. These seem to us to be very happy. They are equally true to the characteristics of the author, and appropriate to the occasion.

THE DEATH OF CHANNING.

While yet the harvest fields are white,
And few the toiling reapers stand,
Called from his task before the night
We miss the mightiest of the band.

Oh, thou of strong, yet gentle mind!
Thy thrilling voice shall plead no more
For truth, for freedom and mankind;
The lesson of thy life is o'er.

But thou, in brightness far above
The fairest dream of human thought,
Before the seat of power and love,
Art with the truth that thou hast sought.

The Poem on Washington, is also an occasional performance, sung, we believe, at some popular celebration. It seems to us a very sweet classical hymn, not unworthy of the subject. We give it to the reader, but beg to be understood as presenting these poems, not because they are superior, or even equal, to the rest of the collection, but simply because they show us the Muse of Mr. Bryant in fields in which she has not much been accustomed to stray.

WASHINGTON.

Great were the hearts, and strong the minds,
Of those who framed, in high debate,
The immortal league of love that binds
Our fair, broad empire, State with State.

And deep the gladness of the hour,
When, as the auspicious task was done,
In solemn trust, the sword of power,
Was given to glory's unspoiled son.

That noble race is gone; the suns
Of fifty years have risen and set;
But the bright links those chosen ones
So strongly forged, are brighter yet.

Wide—as our own free race increase—
Wide shall extend the elastic chain,
And bind, in everlasting peace,
State after State, a mighty train.

We commend the Home Library, thus happily begun, to our reading and literary public. It is a series at once small in price and tasteful in execution. It deserves the patronage of all who would encourage the author, in some degree, with the printer.

Notices of New Works.

CAREY AND HART: Philadelphia, 1844.

THE ROSE MANUAL; containing accurate descriptions of all the finest varieties of Roses, properly classed, with directions for their culture and propagation and the destruction of insects. By Robert Buist, nurseryman and florist. pp. 176, 8vo.

This tasteful and acceptable present from Mr. Buist arrived just in time to rescue from the bugs a few favorites, now languishing under their attacks and our ignorance of rose culture. The work is beautifully printed and bound and we commend it to the lovers of fragrance and beauty.

A NEW AND COMPLETE FRENCH AND ENGLISH, AND ENGLISH AND FRENCH DICTIONARY. Compiled and prepared by J. Dobson, Member of the American Philosophical Society, &c., &c. pp. 1376, large 8vo.

This is also a very opportune arrival, for which we thank the publishers. A very neat pocket edition of Tibbins, a sort of companion for several years, has suffered much damage from the thumbings of a little friend; and lo! its place is supplied by the extensive work before us, based upon the new royal Dictionary of Professors Fleming and Tibbins. We have often found words in Tibbins not contained in other Lexicons, and doubt not that this work, so greatly enlarged and improved, will be to the changing and increasing language of the French, what Webster's is to the English. We unite with the N. American Review in highly commending it. The size of the type is very favorable to the eyes of the Student. Drinker & Morris have it.

HARPER AND BROTHERS: New York, 1844.

RELIGION IN AMERICA; or an account of the rise, progress, relation to the State, and present condition of the Evangelical Churches in the United States. By Robert Baird, author of "L'union de l'église avec l'état dans nouvelle Angleterre." In two parts. pp. 343, 8vo.

No doubt many like ourselves have wished for some general work of this kind. Partial histories of some church, able and engaging, have frequently been written; but there still seemed a demand for one like the present. Mr. Baird prepared it more particularly for Europeans, from whom the first edition met a very favorable reception. It is now to be translated into several of the languages on the Continent of Europe.

Milman's Gibbon. Nos. 6 and 7.

Neal's History of the Puritans. No. 4.

M'Culloch's Universal Gazetteer. No. 10.

Martin's Chuzzlewit. Part 5.

Kendall's Life of Jackson. Part 4.

Drinker & Morris have all these at 25 cents a number.

D. APPLETON AND Co: New York, 1844.
GEO. S. APPLETON: Philadelphia.

APPLIED CHEMISTRY; in Manufactures, Arts and Domestic Economy. Edited by Edward Andrew Farnell, author of "Elements of Chemical Analysis," &c. pp. 175, 8vo.

The applications of Chemistry to the useful arts are exceedingly beautiful and instructive; and are matters with which nearly every one has something to do. Thus they teach the utility, beauty and simplicity of what is too easy to disparage by calling it scientific. All nature is a laboratory and all are more or less chemists, for all to some extent observe her operations. The work before us contains the processes of dyeing and calico printing, illumination by gas, and preservation of wood. It is cheap and should be extensively read.

The Chemist is not content with watching these operations of nature, as they take place before him; but he dives into their causes and ascertains their laws. It is thus that he learns to reproduce effects which delight or benefit; and to imitate at will some of her sublimest workings. When she has produced, he must undo, to discover her mysteries and the elements she uses. These he sifts to see if he has them in their simplest forms. For this he employs different modes from those used in the applications of principles. These modes philosophy has greatly simplified and systematised, as will be found in the following treatise.

ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTION IN CHEMICAL ANALYSIS. By Dr. C. Remigius Fresenius, Chemical Assistant in the University of Giessen. Edited by J. Lloyd Bullock, late of the Giessen and Paris laboratories. pp. 284, 8vo.

WOMAN'S WORTH; or hints to raise the female character. With a recommendatory notice by Emily Marshall. pp. 180, 12mo.

This is woman's era and we have her in all shapes from the press, from infancy to motherhood. One of her sex says she is an enigma; and we would sooner undertake to puzzle the Sphinx than to calculate "Woman's Worth." Some are worth the world and some are just what they tell their poor lovers—not worth having. The little book is like a woman who gives a party—inviting; read it and profit by its hints.

THE ADVENTURES OF DANIEL BOONE, the rifleman of Kentucky.

One of "uncle Philip's" books for boys. Daniel Boone built the State of Kentucky in the back woods for his own private use. But finding that new comers intruded upon him, he soon became like the old woman in the Goose Melodies—"all he wanted was elbow-room." He shouldered his rifle and marched off to Missouri.

Drinker & Morris have all these works.

LEA AND BLANCHARD: Philadelphia.

WEIRD AND ODDITIES, in prose and verse, by Thomas Hood, Esq., author of the "Comic Annual," "Tynney Hall," &c. A new illustrated edition, complete.

An amusing and laughter loving book. One might have as great a propensity for punning as he who is mentioned in the memoirs of the renowned Scriblerus, over which we have roared not a little; and yet forbear in the present company.

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF MEDICAL SCIENCES. April, 1844. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. $5 a year.

The present number contains a large mass of valuable Medical information. We are pleased to see so many of the contributors from our own section. Five of the twelve memoirs and cases are by Southern physicians.

MEMOIRS OF THE LOVES OF THE POETS. Biographical sketches of women celebrated in ancient and modern Poetry. By Mrs. Jamieson. Authoress of the "Diary of an Ennuyée."

This is a very interesting quasi-gossiping account of the "affaires du coeur" of the poets, and abounds with anecdotes widely gathered, and many gems of that poetry which lovely women inspired. The authoress disclaims all pretension in the work; and it should not be regarded as an attempt on her part to criticise or compare, but merely to collate and detail. Yet her own observations, often pertinent and instructive, well connect and illustrate the numerous branches of her fascinating subject. We leave it now with reluctance, promising to resume it.

Messrs. LITTLE AND BROWN, Boston, have sent us the last volume of the Library of American Biography. Conducted by Jared Sparks. Second series. pp. 398, 8vo.

This volume is in the best style of Boston publication, whose excellence is almost unrivalled, and contains memoirs of two very conspicuous men. The Life of La Salle, the settler of Louisiana, is from the pen of Mr. Sparks, to which the admirers of Washington, Franklin and other American worthies are so greatly indebted; and that of Patrick Henry, our own forest-born Demosthenes, from the pen of Alex. H. Everett, LL. D. The fame of Patrick Henry's eloquence must always rest with tradition, like that of Bolingbroke. Several persons of note were expressing a wish for the intellectual relic which they most desired to see, and one said he had rather have one of the lost books of Livy; Lord Chatham said he had rather have a speech of Bolingbroke. The eloquence of the noble Lord may have been more polished, and more fascinating, but it was hardly as effective and inspiring. The Biography by Mr. Wirt, with all its faults, is exceedingly interesting, and has doubtless been much used by Mr. Everett. The complete series will make a handsome collection and should be in the libraries of all who can afford it.

REVIEWS.

THE NORTH AMERICAN, for April, contains several important and interesting articles. Mr. James is handled somewhat after our taste, and the injustice, ignorance and impertinence of Mrs. Mary Howitt are exposed as they should be. Chapter and verse are fully given. The Messenger gave her a well merited rap and the N. American has truly followed it up. J. W. Randolph & Co. agents.

SILLIMAN'S JOURNAL, for April, is also before us, well stored as usual; but we can not dwell upon its contents farther than to mention the Tithonometer of Prof. Draper, and the Ice-mountain in Wallingford, Vt., similar to the one in Virginia. The writer adopts the solution of Mr. Hayden.

CAMPBELL'S SEMI-MONTHLY. Whilst Littell and Arden are squabbling, this beautiful and excellent Magazine is bearing off the palm.

BLACKWOOD, FOR MARCH, is a good number, containing amongst other things, Ethiopia, the Pirates of Senegal, part 1. Marston, Goëthé, and more of Free-trade and Protection.

THE WESTMINSTER, for March. The leading article on Shakspeare is enough to make the number, though it contains other excellent articles.

These are Leonard Scott & Co's. Reprints. J. Gil's the Richmond agent.

PAMPHLETS.

We are indebted to various friends and acquaintances, for addresses, poems, reports, lectures, &c., for all of which we make our acknowledgments. The author of "Poems to Man;" and the author of "Shelley and other poems" also please accept our thanks.

JOHN S. TAYLOR & Co: New-York, 1844.

THEOPNEUSTY, or the Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. By S. R. L. Gaussen, professor of Theology in Geneva, Switzerland. Translated by Edward Norris Kirk. pp. 410, 8vo.

This work is in the usually neat style of the publisher, and has gone through several editions in French and in English. The subject is important and interesting. The author insists upon the full Inspiration, as opposed to the partial Inspiration of the Scriptures, contended for by many theologians.

THE WRONGS OF WOMAN. By Charlotte Elizabeth. pp. 303, 8vo.

Woman's woes by woman wept over, but by man to be redressed. May reparation be speedy and complete. These handsome volumes have been sent us by Messrs Perkins, Harvey and Ball of Shockoe Hill; who have many others to go along with them.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

JUNE, 1844.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE S. L. MESSENGER.

The following Essay was prepared to be read before the National Institute, at their meeting of April 1st, 1844. The writer, having been invited to deliver an address, or to read a paper before that assembly, accepted the invitation, and announced that his subject would be "the Moral and Political Influence of the Relation between the Caucasian Master and the African Slave." He was aware that apprehensions might be entertained, that, in the angry and excited state of public feeling, this subject might be brought forward by a Citizen of the injured and insulted South, with some purpose of recrimination. Hence he took the precaution to assure the Secretary of the Institute, that he intended nothing of the sort, and that the views he proposed to present could not, by possibility, give offence to the most sensitive. Still he was not surprised at receiving in reply a letter advising him to forbear the subject. He had learned indeed that "a soft answer turneth away wrath," but he knew, too, that there are circumstances under which every attempt to soothe does but exasperate. There are some substances which, in combustion, decompose and convert into explosive gas the water that is used to quench them, and Philanthropy, it seems, is supposed to possess an analogous property. He therefore readily accepted the advice so kindly given, and forebore to press the claim of the South to plead at the bar of public opinion against the charges on which she had been condemned unheard. Rhadamanthus castigat, auditque. He punishes first, but, if the victim has any thing to say, he will then hear him. The methods of philanthropy are yet more stern. She will not hear even then.

The writer on his part, delighted at an opportunity to plead the cause of Humanity at the bar of Philosophy, and before a Jury de medietate, had immediately addressed himself to his task, and before the receipt of this discouraging letter, had written more than half the following Essay. Having begun, he determined to go on with it, and, in handing it to the Messenger, sees no need to throw it into a different form.

It will be seen that he has treated only the moral part of the subject. He soon found that he could not do justice to the whole in a single essay of appropriate length, either for a public audience, or the pages of a periodical. At another time he may ask you to give place to his thoughts on the political effect of domestic slavery.

TO THE HON. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL.

Sir: I am happy in an opportunity to dedicate the following Essay to one who has shown a wish to know the truth, and to judge with candor and justice on the subject of which it treats. It is so convenient to let prejudice supply the place of information; so easy to censure what we do not understand; so pleasant to magnify faults which we have no temptation to commit; and so consolatory to repent of the sins of other men, that he who magnanimously denies himself these cheap enjoyments, well deserves to receive some equivalent therefor. I have nothing better to offer than my poor acknowledgments. I beg you to accept them, and with them the assurance that the people of the South are not insensible to the candor, justice and humanity which characterize your conduct in regard to an interest which lies not nearer to their purses than to their hearts.

With assurances of the highest respect,
I beg leave to subscribe myself
Your obedient servant.

AN ESSAY

On the Moral and Political Effect of the Relation between

THE CAUCASIAN MASTER AND THE AFRICAN SLAVE.

Intended to have been read before the National Institute at their meeting in April, 1844.

Gentlemen: I am not sure but that some may think that I owe an apology for introducing the subject to which I invite your attention. Did I propose to treat it in the angry and contentious spirit it so often excites, no apology ought to be received. I beg leave to assure you, in advance, that I have no such purpose. The subject is one intimately connected with the happiness and the duties of a large portion of the inhabitants of the United States. It is at least important that they should understand it rightly. These, on their part, have reason to wish, that they whom it does not so immediately concern, and who judge of it at a distance, should see it in its true light. The love of reputation is natural to man, and it is not easy for any one to sit down under the reproach of the world, entirely satisfied with the judgment of his own conscience. This indeed is indispensable, but this is not all.

In this assembly, devoted to the cause of science, the discussion of a subject connected with the two important sciences of Government and Morality can not be out of place. In a catholic association intended to harmonize the feelings and judgments of those who have so much in common, it is desirable that every thing possible should be done to convince all of the wisdom and justice of opinions and conduct which, though confined to a part, that part can not be expected to change. In an association intended to collect, as in a focus, the light emanating from every part of this extensive Union, it would seem the duty of each to bring forward his ideas on subjects which he most particularly understands, and these are the very subjects to which others, possessing less means of knowledge may be expected to give the most willing attention.

In an assembly, so enlightened as this, I should not presume to open my lips on a subject of general science. To attempt it, would be but to give back to the sun a dim reflection of his own light. And this society itself—what is it, but a member of that great society of scientific men throughout Christendom, which is in perpetual session for the discovery of truth, and for so disseminating it, as to make the knowledge of each the knowledge of all? It is true that the sun of science has but lately risen on this Western world; and it is not to be expected that much will be discovered here in departments which the learned of Europe have been long exploring, with all the advantages that we possess. Although something of this sort has occasionally been accomplished, yet Europe may be expected to look coldly and discouragingly on such researches. The praise due for discoveries and improvements actually made has been grudgingly awarded. But let us speak of what is peculiar to our own country and straightway the jealousy of our European masters in art and science is appeased, and the most learned are the most ready to become our pupils, and to increase their ample stores of knowledge from our authentic materials. Cuvier himself would take instruction from the illiterate miner, and draw from his facts conclusions to elucidate the great marvel of CREATION.

To the great marts of science, where its votaries congregate for the exchange of knowledge for knowledge and thought for thought, each man should come freighted with that which his own country yields, and especially that which can not be found elsewhere. Should there appear among us an inhabitant of the interesting but unknown country of Oregon, professing to tell us of its soil and climate, its streams, mountains and minerals, we should listen with patient interest to all he might say concerning these, though, on any other subject, his best thoughts might be unworthy of notice. In like manner, gentlemen, I, who, on any other topic but that I have selected, should sit in the place of a learner, venture respectfully to claim the attention of this enlightened assembly to what I shall offer, concerning the great moral and political phenomenon which forms the striking and peculiar feature in the character and history of some of the States of this Union.

I am aware I may be met with the sound legal maxim, "Nemo in propria causa Judex." But my business is to reason and to testify—not to decide. Reason stands for itself resting on its own strength; and in an assembly like this we owe it to each other to receive testimony as true, and even judgment as candid. Why should it be otherwise? No claim of right, no interest is involved in any discussion here. Elsewhere, unfortunately, this is not the case. In the only other place where this topic can be discussed between those among whom the institution of domestic slavery exists, and those who are strangers to it, it is so blended with questions of political power and individual interest, that it is always a subject of altercation, and not discussion. Do not the very bitterness it excites, the angry crimination, the fierce recrimination it provokes, demand a calm and candid investigation of its real merits? Shall I not stand excused for offering the results of a life's experience and reflection on a subject so differently understood by those who, it is to be wished, may be brought to see it in the same light? Shall I be blamed for offering to pour oil upon the wave which is beating against the foundations of the Union, and threatens to wash it from its base? The empire of opinion has its tribunals before which all are liable to be arraigned, and none should deny their jurisdiction, who do not desire to see that mild and ameliorating authority exchanged for the restored empire of the sword. The spirit of our institutions and the spirit of the age alike demand an account of every thing which seems like a disturbance of the natural equality or an invasion of the natural rights of man. Our large experience of the blessing of personal and civil liberty awakens in every benevolent mind a desire to see that blessing extended to every individual of the human race. But what is liberty, and how far it may be enjoyed by all, are questions of acknowledged difficulty. While we believe it to be the will of God that the life he has given should be a life of happiness to all, and that the sources of happiness distributed throughout the earth should be enjoyed by all, we can not shut our eyes to the fact that he himself has thrown obstacles in the way of that equality of enjoyment which we have assumed to be his general purpose. He has made the sources of enjoyment more accessible to some than to others, and He has endowed different individuals with capacities for enjoyment yet more various than the faculties and opportunities by which its means are to be procured. These two points of diversity in the human race have led some to charge their Maker with partiality: while others, well pleased to observe that whatever advantage is allotted to some over the rest, is in their favor, are quite ready to acquiesce in the justice of the arrangement.

Both are in error, and the error in both is proved by the false corollaries they themselves deduce from their reasoning. In the first it leads to envy, hatred and malice, and to all those crimes which it is the office of Government to restrain and of law to punish. In the last it stifles sympathy; it nourishes false pride; it engenders false appetites and stimulates to indulgence and excess, by which the moral and intellectual man is transformed from the image of his God to that of a beast. These indeed are not denounced by law as crimes, for no law can reach them. But they are not the less evil because incorrigible.

But how shall we vindicate the justice of the Creator, unless we find some principle of compensation for these glaring inequalities? And where shall we find one, unless indeed one of these inequalities affords a compensation for the other? Let us see how this may be.

Money is the common measure of values, and wealth supplies the fund with which most enjoyments may be purchased. There are few sources of happiness to be explored and appropriated, to which wealth will not procure access, while it furnishes the price we must pay for them. The faculties which are most rare and most valuable to others, afford the possessor the surest means of acquiring wealth. Foremost among these, because rarest and most precious, are the powers of the mind, knowledge, genius, readiness of comprehension, originality of thought, soundness and sobriety of judgment, and all that marvellous combination which chiefly distinguishes man from his fellows, and to which collectively we give the name of talent. These have but to name their price, and it is readily, cheerfully, thankfully paid.

In this assembly I see myself surrounded by those whose presence here is a proof of high excellence in these endowments. But are these the wealthy of the land? By no means. And why not? There is not one present whose consciousness will not testify to the truth of the answer I am about to give.

It is because the gift of intellectual superiority is, by the wise dispensation of the Creator, associated with peculiar tastes and desires. The gifted son of genius does not so much as stretch forth his hand to take the wealth that courts his acceptance, because his thoughts are fixed on some of the few sources of enjoyment that wealth can not purchase. The delight of revelling amid the creations of fancy, the hardy joy of tasks of thought, the love of knowledge, for its own sake, the desire to diffuse the light of truth, and to advance the empire of mind, the desire to promote the welfare of our country and the happiness of the human race; above all, the love of honest fame, the just reward of intellectual excellence and moral worth, and active service in the cause of humanity—these are the instincts of greatness. Turning from the low pursuit of wealth, it is with these that minds of a high order satisfy their natural cravings. Disdaining to scramble for the draff and husks that fill the common trough, they take nothing from the fund that supplies the enjoyments of others. On the contrary, the fruit of their labors is to replenish that fund. The rich man is made richer, and the comforts of the poor are increased by their discoveries in art and science, and the happiness of all is secured by their wisdom and justice. Is it the worse, or the better, for those who court wealth; for those who delight to revel in the pleasures of sense; for those who wisely limit their desires to moderate competency; or for those who find their happiness in the bland sweets of domestic life, that God has been pleased to endow each man here present with faculties of a higher order than theirs, and to implant in each bosom a source of enjoyment which would be ill exchanged for the mines of Golconda?

I am persuaded, Gentlemen, that there is not one member of this assembly, who does not bear within his own breast a witness to the truth of what I have just said. It would be superfluous to add examples to illustrate the means devised by the Creator for equalizing the opportunities of happiness among his creatures, and multiplying the sources of enjoyment in proportion to the number who partake of it. But other instances abound in which the very antagonism of tastes, capacities and powers is made reciprocally a source of happiness to all concerned. I beg you to observe the multiplied diversities between the male and female character, contrived with a view to the happiness and to the moral and intellectual excellence of both. Is it by chance, or by any necessary consequence of his sex, that man is bold, hardy, enterprising, contentious, delighting to struggle with difficulty, delighting in contests with his fellows, and eager to bear away the prize of every strife? Woman, on the contrary, timid, feeble, helpless, shrinks within the domestic sanctuary, and feels that the great want of her nature is security for herself and her offspring. This she owes to the exercise and indulgence of the distinctive powers and passions of him to whom she looks for protection, while he, in her trusting helplessness and grateful love, finds the reward of his toils, the crown of his triumphs and the consummation of his felicity.

So far, without any stretch of presumption, we may venture to believe that we understand the design of the Creator. But the world is full of phenomena, physical and moral which admonish us that many of his ways are "past finding out." We every where see a sort of affinity of opposition, a sympathy of antagonism, a combination of incompatibilities, while one strange wild strain of harmonious discord rises from the whole. In all things we find a sort of polarity, which suggests the idea of absolute incongruity between things to all appearance irreconcilably hostile to each other, when presently we see them drawn together by the power of an irresistible and exclusive attraction. On this strange law depends the whole theory of chemical affinities. Substances similar, or not much unlike, may mix and blend, but each retains its own properties. Contrast and opposition are necessary to that intimate combination which produces a new substance. In this, all the sharpness and asperities of the constituent parts are lost forever, and things which before seemed eager to contend with each other to make the life of man their prey, unite to form a healing drug that restores him to health and vigor.

In the moral world we see much analogous to this. It is surely not by chance, that the human race, sprung from one common parent, has undergone the various modifications that make the difference between the intellectual Caucasian, the fierce Malay, the soft Hindoo, the rude but docile Negro, and the brutish and intractable New Hollander. If we inquire after the modus operandi by which these changes were wrought, the naturalist may tell us of the influence of climate. But who made climates to differ, and who shall limit the power of the Most High to counteract their influence were such his will? It was clearly his design that these diversities should exist. Shall we deny ourselves liberty to investigate his purpose in this? Let me not be told that it is presumptuous to scan his purposes. To question their wisdom and justice is indeed presumptuous. But the instinct of religion in the heart of man has taught him, in all ages, to inquire his Maker's will, that he might live in conformity to it. Hence the universal craving after revelation. Hence the readiness with which every thing professing to be revelation has ever been received. Man has felt it to be his duty to know the character and purposes of his Creator. He has felt that the Creator must desire to reveal himself and his will to his creature. The research which was piety in Socrates, Plato and Tully—can it be impious now?

But God has himself revealed his great purpose in the creation of the human race. It is the eternal happiness of all, through faith in the Redeemer of the world. It is his declared will that all shall come to the knowledge of that truth on which eternal life depends. Can we believe in any purpose inconsistent with this? In contemplating the divine tactic according to which the whole human race is marshalled, are we not bound to seek some way of reconciling the details to this great end? Are we not authorized to believe that, in some way incomprehensible to us, these and all things else are subservient to it? We see the various products of the earth so widely scattered over its surface, as to invite to a universal exchange of commodities. In the universal intercourse of man with man to which this leads, we find the motive to this distribution. It diffuses knowledge over every part of the globe, and makes the seed of Shem and Canaan partakers of the great truth committed to the restless and enterprising race of Japhet. The diversities in the human species may be intended to conduce to the same great purpose. They suggest the idea that each race may be useful to the other, and may lead to combinations by which the condition of all may be improved, and the light of truth diffused among all. We plainly see how the other races may derive advantage from their intercourse with the Caucasian. It is not as yet so plain what benefit we may receive in return from the Malay or the Hottentot. Time may show. But in the case of the negro the discovery has been made. It was seen that his labor might be appropriated and turned to profit, and this led the white man to seek to open intercourse and form a connexion with him. The motive was indeed unworthy and sordid, but the result has been the physical, intellectual and moral improvement of the inferior race, and, in some respects, of both.

I proceed to show this; for I freely admit that, if the connexion between the Caucasian and African races has not been attended with moral good, every apology that can be offered for it must be rejected.

On the other hand, it may be fairly contended, that, if the temporal results are good, and promise well for the future welfare of both parties, then, though such results may not justify the means used to establish the connexion, yet the connexion itself is good and ought not rashly to be sundered. The actual working of the great machinery contrived by the All-Wise Creator can not be far from right, when it tends to the great declared purpose of the creation,—the temporal and eternal happiness of his creatures.

It is a striking fact, that, of all the sons of Adam, that particular family to which God chose first to commit his oracles, have always proved themselves, God being himself the witness, the most stiff-necked, rebellious, intractable and unteachable. It is in perfect harmony with this, that the European nations, to which the Gospel of Love, and Peace and Humility, was first communicated have been distinguished in all ages by systematic far-seeing, concentrated Selfishness, by a Taste for War, by restless Ambition and indomitable Pride. Is there no reason for this: would the Jews, who hardly believed when God spoke to them in thunder from Sinai, have received the testimony of man? And is not their stubborn incredulity, at this day, the strongest human evidence of the truth of the Old Testament, which even they believe? Were all Jews, would all believe in Jehovah, unless every mountain were a Horeb—every stream a Jordan witnesses of his miracles? And the Anglo-Saxon race, the great herald of moral and political truth—were they to whom they carry their tidings and their lessons such as themselves, would they submit to be taught, unless their teachers could sustain their testimony by miracles such as authenticated that of the Apostles? The stream which is to water the land and replenish the ocean must flow from the mountains, and the vapors that feed them must be raised from the earth by a power which is not of the earth, that they may be collected and precipitated on eminences which must otherwise be doomed to eternal drought. To turn back the course of the rivers to the mountains would be hardly more preposterous than to attempt to diffuse truth by sending it from the credulous to the sceptical, from the humble to the proud, from the timid to the bold, from the stupid to the intellectual. Hard as it was to make believers of Jews and Christians of Europeans, it was with them that the task of enlightening and evangelizing the world had to commence.

When I thus show, that the precious truths of the Gospel have been first imparted to us for the benefit of others, to the end that, having freely received, we should freely give, it will be seen that I have at least entitled myself to the praise of candor. I have made a case of solemn and important duty imposed by the blessings we enjoy, and prescribed as the very condition of their enjoyment. How we have performed this duty is a question we are bound to answer, and in doing this we must not palter with our Maker, or shrink from the strict account that the giver of all good demands.

It would be worse than disingenuous, it would be false to pretend that the first intercourse between the sons of Japhet and Canaan took its rise from these considerations. The attempt to trace their connexion to such a cause would be absurd and impudent. It originated in cupidity; it was effected by violence and outrage; and characterized by the most barbarous cruelty. These things I do not propose to palliate. I have no wish, and I can have no motive to do so. It is a matter that touches us not. The sin is not ours nor that of our fathers. But whoever were the perpetrators, candor suggests a sort of apology, not only for their first fault, but for their more recent zeal to redress the supposed wrong of their victims. We have but to think of the African as he appeared at first to the European, hardly bearing the lineaments of humanity, in intellect scarcely superior to the brutes, and mainly distinguishable from them by the greater variety of his evil propensities, and by a something answering the purposes of speech better—though not much better—than the chattering of monkeys. Use has made us familiar with the color of the negro, and experience has made us acquainted with his heart and mind. Having learned to love him, let us not marvel to find a sympathy for his supposed wrongs in the breasts of those who once may have doubted whether he had a soul to be saved, or how his Maker could hold him responsible for the faults of a nature at once his crime and his punishment.

But it is not to censure, to palliate, or to justify that I advert to this. I speak of it only as a fact; as the starting point from whence we are to trace the moral influence of the actually subsisting relation between the two races.

That, since that relation was first established, there is a great moral improvement in both will not be denied. The remarkable fact is that this is greatest in those particulars which most influence, and are most influenced by that relation. So far as hatred has given place to love, dishonesty to fidelity, licentiousness to modesty, so far the change must meet the approbation of him, who, regarding the heart as the seat of crime, condemns every one who, even in thought, commits murder, adultery, or theft. I am well aware that this change is, in part, attributed, by those who view it from a distance, to a sort of moral coercion exerted by public opinion in this enlightened and moral age. It were well if this were so. The same opinion might also exert its influence in favor of the peasantry of the old continent and the laboring class in Great Britain. But, strangely enough, it has happened that while the white man was learning to appreciate the good qualities peculiar to the negro, and while the slave was learning to love his master, a change of precisely opposite character was going on in Europe. That change has deluged her realms with blood and still threatens to overthrow all her institutions, political, social and moral. One who will acquaint himself with the passionate loyalty, on the one hand, and the mild paternal authority on the other, of the Irish peasant and his landlord a century ago, will find something not widely different from the mutual sentiments of the master and slave at this day. What may be seen in Ireland now is surely not much better than the slavery of the African ever was in its worst form. The bond of sympathy that once connected the landed proprietor with all who lived upon his land is severed, while a like sympathy has been engendered between the white man and his negro slave.

If it be true that "Love is the fulfilling of the whole Law," then, in a moral and religious point of view, the growth of this sentiment between two races before divided by the strongest antipathies, is an approach toward that blessed condition when all the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and all hearts shall be knit together in love for the sake of Him who loves them all. In that day, we are told "that the lion shall eat straw like the ox, and the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand in the cockatrice's den." How is this to be understood? Literally—of the beasts of the fen and forest? By no means. The lion must cease to be a lion in his physical nature before he can cease to live on flesh. May we not rather understand it of the lordly white lion of Caucasus, of the patient negro ox, of the fierce red wolf of our Western wilds, of the meek Hindoo lamb; of the serpent-like Malay, with his envenomed creeper, and the foul Hottentot hyena gorging on garbage? All these are to be brought to harmonize and live in peace and love. The first step has been taken. The amicable union of two of these races has been brought about, though by means at first promising no such result. If these means were to be now used, the end might not justify them. It is not for us to do evil that good may come, for it may never come, or it might be divinely accomplished at no expense of evil. But when it is accomplished, shall we reject it? When the price has been paid and cannot be recalled; when God has been pleased to overrule the evil to his own good purposes, shall we cast away the benefit? Above all, shall we make it a brand of discord between brethren of the same race, to consume, like withes of straw, the ties of a common origin, religion and language? I beseech you, Gentlemen, let not this be so; and I pray you to hear me candidly, while I endeavor to show that the amelioration of the condition and character of the African slave in the United States, and the mild virtues which have taken place of savage cruelty in the breast of his master, are not the result of extrinsic causes, but the proper and natural fruit of their mutual relation; acting on the radical diversities between the Caucasian and the African races.

The only sound morality is the morality of the Gospel. Its sanction is faith—faith by which the heart is made better;—by which the will and affections are subdued to spontaneous obedience, through love to the author and founder of that faith. Its corner-stone is humility—its essential characteristic is subordination of the heart. Whatever habituates the mind of man to this, prepares him to receive God's truth in the love of it.

Such, I maintain, is the natural and proper effect of slavery on an inferior race placed in direct subjection and immediate communication with a master race of unquestionable superiority,—a superiority clearly admitted and manifested in all the affairs of life. So circumstanced, the love of the slave for his master is developed by a sort of vis midi catris Natura. They who vindicate slavery as a prolonged war, offer but a lame defence; for war itself—what is it but violence and wrong? And what must be the condition of both parties living together in a state of rankling hostility? Must not both be eager to escape from a condition so wretched by cultivating in both a more kindly sentiment? The slave particularly, who sees no escape from his thralldom, and whose master is ever present to him in person, or by a power which is felt continually, feels the necessity of engendering in his own breast a sentiment, by virtue of which his fate, otherwise intolerable, may be made happy. He must learn to love his master or be miserable. On the least encouragement his affections gush forth like a healing balsam issuing from the wound itself. This upward tendency of the slave's affection for his master points directly to the throne of God. Let it be extended in the same course, and it terminates there. It prepares the mind for a faith congenial to its temper, and never thrown off. It is steadfast and endures to the end. It may not always thoroughly sanctify. It may sometimes be so mixed with error as to fail to reform him; but it is never renounced. The spirit that chafes and frets at control, and would not have had God to rule over it has been already subdued to the authority of a human and harder task-master, and the slave finds a sense of enlargement, not restraint, in bowing to the will of Him who is Lord of all.

Many persons believe, (and the thought is so beautiful it well deserves to be true,) that the distinctive characteristics of some inferior animals were given for the edification of man. Qualities which make some pernicious to the human race become associated in our minds with abhorrence, loathing or disgust. Others seem set before us as lures to virtue for which we cherish them, which we learn to love in them, and to cultivate in ourselves. The child is easily turned away from vices habitually stigmatized with epithets coined from the most hateful names in his nursery states. A whole volume of reproof is conveyed to the infant mind, when he hears of wolfish rapacity, serpent guile or tiger-like ferocity. But apply to him the endearing epithets of lamb or dove, and his bright smile and laughing eye tell how sensibly he feels the approbation and love implied in such expressions. The moralist has availed himself of this, and the heart and mind receive few lessons more touching or more profound than are learned from the fables of Æsop and Gay. The latter avows that his apologies are written with this view. Every man who will analyse his own mind must be sensible how much he has learned from them, and no father would willingly dispense with such efficient helps in the great task of education.

Of all the creatures by whose mute teachings and exhortations the mind is enlightened and the heart made better, there is none that inculcates a lesson so salutary as that of the humble, faithful, affectionate and cheerful African slave to his proud, self-seeking, restless, discontented and unthankful master. Does he ask, as he sometimes does, why he should love God, who requires of him that he should eat his bread in the sweat of his face; why punishes all his misdeeds and short-comings; who sometimes afflicts him when conscious of no fault; and whose eternal wrath is denounced against hardened impenitence? How must he stand rebuked, if he lifts his eye to mark the look of affectionate solicitude, which, at the moment, is scanning his troubled and moody countenance; when he hears the kind tone that asks to know his wishes; when he sees the ready smile that accompanies the prompt obedience; and then reflects that these things come from one not his creature; whose powers and faculties are not of his gift; but of whom he requires all that God demands of him, and on whom he has sometimes inflicted severities he knows to have been unjust?

I beseech you, Gentlemen, reject not this idea because it may seem new and strange. It is not new. It is not strange. It is God's truth which he has often spoken to the heart of each one of you who is a father. The application alone is new. How often, when your heart has relented over the meek and affectionate repentance of an offending child, have you heard those gracious words; "Like as a father pitieth his children!" And what does he demand in return? That you should love him as a child! Aye; and more than that. That you should love him as a slave loves his master, if he be only not harsh, oppressive and cruel. The love of the child may be warmer and fonder: but it is not so meek; not so trusting; not so patient; not so enduring, not so Christian. The child buries the father, and divides the inheritance, and makes him a family of his own. The love of the slave cherishes his master's memory, when all besides have forgotten him, and watches over his grave like the meek and loving boy by his Redeemer's cross, when all besides had forsaken him and fled. The last tear that flows to the memory of a kind patriarchal master, trickles down the cheek of a slave.

Do you demand the rationale of this? Do you insist that I shall show how it can be so? Will you continue to believe that I labor under some strong delusion, (my sincerity you can not doubt;—I know it—I feel it) until I have proved by argument a priori, that such should be, and must be the natural and necessary result of his condition? I am ready to do so, for I derive the answer from the same divine example, which can not mislead.

God demands our hearts. He loves us as a father, and seeks our love in return. But does he seek it by the same means we use toward our children? His love is the same, but his discipline is far wiser. He does not expect love as the return for unpurchased benefits. All our comforts are the purchase of toil and care. He does not woo it by fond indulgence. "Jeshurun waxes fat, and kicks." He does not soothe by weak mistaken clemency. "He scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." He does not seek to make a temporary relation, a relation soon to terminate in complete independence, the basis of an enduring empire over our hearts. He has bought us with a price. We are his, body and soul—for time and for eternity—now and forever. He gives us food and raiment and bids us be therewith content; and he cheers our progress along the path of life by that gradual melioration of condition, which rarely fails to attend on honest industry, and which our own experience tells us is best for happiness. The unfortunate fortunate few, who, without merit and without exertion, are suddenly advanced to situations and circumstances for which they are not prepared, who, envied at first, are found in the end to be objects of commiseration, seem set for examples from which the multitude may learn patience and contentment. Such are his methods with us, and precisely these he commends to the master in his treatment of the slave, by making such treatment conducive to his own comfort and prosperity.

It is no part of my plan to speak of the physical condition of the slave. But I am constrained to advert to it here, so far as to show the justness of the analogy I have pointed out. Without descending to details I will go so far as to say, that his condition is one of steadily progressive improvement, in physical comforts and enjoyments. I will instance only one proof of this general proposition, which rests not on the testimony of individuals, but will be verified by all persons whose memories go back as much as half a century. It is the gradual increase of the stature of the slave and his gradual improvement in personal appearance and personal habits during that time. In this assembly it would be superfluous to argue from these facts, that there must have been, during that time, a corresponding improvement in all the elements of comfort and enjoyment. The most unpracticed eye will be, at once, struck with the difference, in these particulars, between those who have been for many generations among us, and those whose ancestors have been more recently introduced. If this advancement were more rapid, it might presently come to a stand, like the precious prosperity of nations that get rich too fast. What follows is a form of wretchedness from which there is no escape—the wretchedness of those who continually and hopelessly cry, "who will show us any good?" I rejoice to think that many generations may yet pass away before the African slave or his master will reach the pinnacle of splendid misery. In the mean time it may be hoped that both will continue happy in that condition most favorable to virtuous contentment, a state of steadily progressive advancement in the comforts of civilization, and in the moral and intellectual improvement that civilization imparts.

Were it my purpose merely to vindicate the institution of domestic slavery, by showing that the relation actually subsisting between master and slave is favorable to the growth of religion in the hearts of both, I might rest this matter here. But this would be an imperfect view of its beneficial results. To say that any thing makes men religious is to say that it makes them better. But not only has slavery proved a nurse to virtue through the agency of religion: It comes in aid of religion to carry on the work of reformation in the heart and life of the slave.

The improvement in the condition of the negro has a direct tendency to counteract some of the vices that formerly characterized him, both in his native country and in the early years of his sojourn among us. The white man found him a naked savage, prone to the unrestrained indulgence of sensual appetite. His disregard to cleanliness and his indifference to decorum were not at once removed. The rudest garment that could shelter him from the inclemency of the seasons at first satisfied his desires, and this, on the approach of summer, was impatiently thrown off. It is in the memory of many persons, that they considered clothes as an inconvenient incumbrance, and that they were often almost at the age of puberty, seen in a state of perfect nakedness. By degrees a sense of shame was awakened. A taste in dress has been encouraged by the better clothing provided, as the feelings of the master became more kind and sympathizing. A feeling of self-respect has been inspired, and this has brought with it pride of character, modesty, chastity, and, not unfrequently, refined delicacy of sentiment. The proportion of females of irreproachable virtue is perhaps not greater in the lowest class in any form of society; while those who put away shame and give themselves up to licentious practices are as effectually put out of better society among them as among us. Many are still betrayed into youthful indiscretion, but the connubial tie is now commonly held sacred. There is an increasing disposition to consecrate it by the solemnities, and to strengthen it by the obligations of religion. The Episcopal minister of the village in which I live, celebrates the rites of matrimony between as many blacks as whites; the white members of the family, with their most intimate friends, sometimes witness the ceremony, and the parties, with their numerous guests, close an evening of festive hilarity with an entertainment of which the most fastidious epicure might be glad to partake.

Can the moral effect of these things be questionable? Even admitting, that, in the essential quality of female purity, the slave may come short of the class which fills the same place in society where slavery is not known; yet it is not with that class, but with the negro, in his primitive state of wild freedom, that the comparison is to be made. The improvement in this respect is moreover progressive. At intervals of ten or a dozen years a change may be distinctly seen to have taken place, and but little farther progress is wanting to place this once degraded and brutish race on a level in this respect with the lower classes of society in the most moral country under the sun.

In another particular a change of equal importance is taking place. Affection, on the one hand, disposes to confidence and on the other invites it, and confidence provokes to honesty. The savage is universally regardless of the rights of meum and tuum. The slave was, at first, universally a thief. At this day there abound among them examples of integrity absolutely incorruptible. A slave notoriously dishonest is held by them in abhorrence and contempt. The little liberties which children will take, under the strong temptation to indulge their appetites with delicacies, are severely punished by their own parents. Falsehood is perseveringly rebuked and chastised by them, and, in almost every family, there are servants who are unhesitatingly trusted with every thing the house contains. Nor is this confidence confined to the master. A verbal message, sent by a trusty slave, is all sufficient to obtain goods, or even money, from those with whom the master deals. This seemingly dangerous confidence is never abused. In their own transactions, too, a character for integrity is established, which ensures, in all their little dealings, a perfect reliance on their word. In the village in which I reside there may be 1,500 inhabitants. Of this number perhaps one third are slaves. Of these I am assured, by a retailer of proverbial caution, that not less than fifty (equal to half the whole number of adult males) can command any credit with him, which their own prudence will permit them to ask. Yet for such debts he has no security, no remedy. They are beyond the reach of law, and an appeal to the master might involve him in the penalties denounced by some antiquated statutes against such as deal with slaves.

These statutes and others of a congenial character afford a strong proof of the moral improvement of the slave population. They were, doubtless, called for by the state of things existing at the time of their enactment. At this day they are so utterly superfluous that no man is so strict as to enforce them, and none so scrupulous as to govern himself by them. They form collectively a code of extreme rigor, and go far to justify the abhorrence, so often expressed by good men, of an institution producing a state of things that can render such severity necessary. But the evil has cured itself. Thus it is that the wise use of the rod of parental discipline establishes the most affectionate confidence between the prudent father and the son that once trembled at his presence. Thus it is that military discipline, once having made obedience sure, makes indulgence safe. In almost every case where we see men living in relations best for the happiness of all, where power is gentle and obedience liberal, where passion rests under due subordination to reason, where the wisdom of the enlightened, and the virtue of the good, and the prudence of the sagacious are wisdom and virtue and prudence for those who, in themselves, possess none of these qualities, and the blind walk safely and confidently by the guidance of those who can see, the heart may shudder, if, turning away from the contemplation of these desirable results we look too closely to the means by which they were brought about. The laws I speak of are but memorials of what has been; like the trial by battle in the English law, long retaining its place in the same code that denounced the duellist as a murderer. They are but the scars of stripes formerly inflicted. They forbid the slave to be taught to read. Yet all whose minds thirst after knowledge (and if there be danger, these are the dangerous) have abundant opportunity. The child is encouraged to impart the first rudiments to his nurse, and her access to books and newspapers is unrestrained. She has all the stimulus to the cultivation of her mind, and all the aid that intelligent conversation supplies; and nothing more strikingly shows the unintellectual character of the race, than the general indifference to these advantages. Each one who makes use of them may instruct the rest, and the leisure of all is much more than the laboring class enjoys in other parts of the world.

The penal code abounds too with laws denouncing capital punishment against slaves; and the trial by jury is denied them. The effect of these things was probably as harsh, at one time, as the laws themselves now seem. In Virginia the slave is not committed to a jury sworn to try whether he be guilty or no, but to a sort of discretionary power exercised by a bench of justices bound by no specific oath. The question with them often seems to be whether he shall be punished or no. This is appalling. But let humanity take heart. At this day this discretion is exercised altogether in favor of the slave. For offences not affecting life or limb he is commonly left to the jurisdiction of his master, whose punishments, falling far short of those denounced by law, fully satisfy the public. The idea of trying a slave for larceny, after he has been flogged by his master, is as abhorrent to our notions as the putting a free man twice in jeopardy for the same offence. Moreover the dissent of one of five justices is enough to acquit. To secure the unanimity necessary to conviction, in a capital case, the guilt of the accused must not only be proved incontestably, but there must be nothing to justify, nothing to excuse, nothing to extenuate, nothing even to awaken compassion. The court screens the accused alike from the caprice of juries, and the severity of the law. The importance of this protection can only be appreciated by those who are aware of the total want of sympathy between the negro and the white man who owns no slave. He is glad to escape from a jury composed of such to those whose daily intercourse with their own slaves has taught them to know and love the peculiar virtues of the African. Nor has interest any thing to do in this matter. The owner of a slave who is executed receives his price from the treasury. But such demands on it are almost unknown, for punishment is hardly ever inflicted or deserved.

The regulations I speak of are peculiar to Virginia. But the manner of their administration there is given in proof of the change wrought by time in the relation between master and slave. This change is progressive, and an accurate observer may see that, from time to time, the great body of slaves have become more attached, more content with their condition, less licentious and more honest; and that, meanwhile, their comforts have been increased, and that the master has become more kind, more indulgent, milder in his methods of government and more confiding. The voice of command is giving place to that of courteous request; the language of oburgation is exchanged for that of grave reproof, and it becomes daily more manifest, that, whatever griefs may fall to the lot of either party, both are happy in each other, and happy in a relation, with the duties of which use has made both familiar.

In much that I have said here, I am aware that I have spoken as a witness. In that character I speak reluctantly. But I am emboldened to do so by the assurance that the candid will be ready to believe my testimony because of its conformity with reasoning founded on the nature of things. I am supported also by the conviction that the knowledge and feeling of the truth of what I have said are in the hearts and minds of many in this presence. But were there none such here, who could believe me so absurdly rash as to venture on statements, which, if false, are known to be false by all those whose good opinion is the only fame I can hope for.

I feel assured moreover that thousands will adopt and own a sentiment, which, I doubt not, many present may hear with surprise. I am aware that the interest of the Southern master in his slave is commonly considered as a thing to be estimated in dollars and cents. It seems to be a prevailing belief, that we would be glad to give up our slaves if we could receive something in exchange not very far short of their value as commonly estimated. This may be true of many. Some may be satisfied, by calculations easily made, that they might turn the price to better account, by giving it in wages to hirelings. I have little doubt that this is true, and yet I am sure that multitudes, even of those most fully convinced by such reasonings, would make the exchange with great reluctance. I speak but for a smaller number, but there are certainly some for whom I may speak, when I say that they would not willingly make it on any terms whatever. With such it is an affair of the heart. It presents not a question of profit and loss, but of the sundering of a tie in which the best and purest affections are deeply implicated. It imports the surrender of friendships the most devoted, the most enduring, the most valuable. I have spoken of this already, but I must be pardoned for alluding to it again. I must be allowed to offer a word on behalf of the mother around whose bed there clusters a crowd of little ones from whom death is about to tear her. Who, when she is gone, will be a mother to the prattling urchin, unconscious of the loss he is about to sustain, and whose childish sports are even now as full of glee as if death were not in the world? Who but she, who already shares with her the natural appellation, and performs, with a loving heart, more than half the duties of a mother? She has daughters growing up. A roof may be found to shelter them; one whom the world calls a friend may usher them into society; instruction may be purchased for them, and the soundest maxims of morals, religion and decorum may be inculcated. But who is to be with them when they lie down, and when they rise up? Who is to watch and accompany their outgoings and their incomings? Who is to be with them in the dangerous hours of privacy, restraining, regulating, purifying their conversation and their thoughts? These are the proper duties of a mother, the importance of which renders her loss so fatal. Who is to perform them? There she stands. It is the same that supports the languid head of the dying mother, and holds the cup to her parched lips. The same, whose untiring vigilance, day after day and night after night, has watched by that bed of death, with a fidelity to which friendship between equals affords no parallel, and which the wealth of the Indies could not purchase.

But, if the devotion of the slave is so absolute, it may be asked where can be the harm of severing the superfluous bond which deprives his services of the praise due to them, by giving a semblance of compulsion to what is voluntary. The question is specious enough; but the answer is partly found in what I have already said. To answer it more fully, it is necessary to advert to a gross and fatal error in morals and politics, which has indeed but few advocates, but which, to a certain extent, influences the sentiments and conduct of many whose reason distinctly rejects it.

It is an error that took its rise in the alliance between genius and licentiousness, formed in the cloisters of the monastery a few centuries ago. In that dark time, when learning and power were monopolized by the priesthood, ambition lured men into the church, and the church condemned them to celibacy. But love is of all ages and conditions of society, and none more keenly feels its power than the sensitive child of genius. Restrained by the laws of his order yet more than by the laws of God, he could only evade the former by openly defying the latter. The plausible sophisms by which he sought to cheat the object of his licentious passion into preference of the joys of lawless love to that sacred union which upholds the order of society, and which God has declared to be honorable in his sight, were drawn from the idea that love must perish as soon as the restraints of law are applied to it. The echo of these sentiments has not yet died away. They are embodied in Pope's mellifluous lines.

"Love, free as air, at sight of human ties,
Spreads his light wings, and in a moment flies.
Should at my feet the world's great master fall,
Himself, his throne, his world, I'd scorn them all.
Not Cæsar's empress would I deign to prove:
No! make me mistress to the man I love!
If there be yet another name more free
More fond than mistress, make me that to thee!
Oh, happy state! when souls each other draw,
When love is liberty, and nature law;
All then is full, possessing and possessed,
No craving void left aching in the breast;
Ev'n thought meets thought, ere from the lips it part,
And each warm wish springs mutual from the heart."

Now this is very harmonious and very eloquent. But is it true? It may be so, if that we dignify with the name of love is nothing but a purely selfish preference of one person over another. The proverbial charm of variety will certainly have its effect here, and if, it is this sensual appetite or dreamy phantasy that is to be cultivated and indulged, then is there good reason in these ideas. But God has made the well being of society depend on a union that forbids the indulgence of this vagrant taste, and checks the caprices of fancy. How have men been brought to submit universally to such restraints? Is it not that the wise Creator has implanted in the heart a counterpollent principle? Is it not that the very restraint of which we are at first impatient, engenders, in every well constituted mind, a correction of the evil? The most profound thinkers have long since decided, that the indissoluble nature of the connubial tie teaches the parties to put a curb on the heart and imagination which restrains their wanderings; and men and women are found to pass long lives in harmony and mutual love, who, in the earlier stages of their connexion, might have parted forever, if separation had been possible. To render this union thus efficacious, it is wisely accompanied with such a community of interests, that neither party can engage in the separate and selfish pursuit of any permanent good. It is sometimes seen not fully to produce the desired result, when parties come together, each bringing children of a former marriage. These are the objects of peculiar affections and distinct interests, which often interrupt harmony, and prevent that perfect amalgamation, which the law contemplates and desires to effect. What would be the consequence, if, beside this cause of dissension, the husband and wife should have no children common to both, and each had a separate and independent faculty of acquiring property for their respective offspring, cannot easily be estimated. That the affection of the parties would be exposed to the rudest trials is quite certain. It would probably soon terminate in open rupture, not from a preference on the part of either for some new face, but from absolute disgust and well deserved hatred.

Now something like this would attend the emancipation of that female slave. She is sure of those necessities and comforts with which education and use have made her content, she has no faculty of acquiring property, she has no means of providing for her children, but she knows that they are well provided for already. She is thus in condition to give herself up to the duties of her station and a care of the children that have hung at her breast with her own, and on whose welfare she feels that that of herself and her offspring depends. Emancipate her; emancipate them: strip them of the protecting disabilities with which the law surrounds them, and she will see at once the necessity and the duty of living for them alone. She must do so, for the mistaken philanthropy which has turned her and her offspring naked and defenceless on the cold charities of the world at large, demands that every effort, every care, every thought be devoted to the almost hopeless task of saving them from want. In rare instances, uncommon qualities and exemplary virtue on both sides, might preserve friendship between her and her master's family. But a conflict of interests would have taken the place of a community of interests; and friendship, under such circumstances, would no longer result naturally from the relation between the parties. It would be a forced state of feeling, and would be liable to perish in a moment on the failure of any one of the innumerable conditions essential to its existence.

It may be added, that, if the value of slaves of this class is to be computed by estimating only such services as money can buy, these services are purchased at too high a rate. They may be purchased from hirelings for much less than is freely given to favorite slaves, by way of indulgence and gratuity. But the possession of such a slave, who is not only the servant, but the friend of his master, the vigilant guardian of his interests, and, in some things, a sagacious and faithful adviser, is a luxury of the heart, which they, who can afford it, would not part with at any price.

It is for no sordid interest then that I should plead, when, if addressing one having power to abolish this relation, I should implore his forbearance. Speaking on behalf, not only of myself, but of the slave, by whom I know I should not be disavowed, I would entreat him to pause and reflect, before sundering a tie which can never be reunited, a cord spun from the best and purest and most disinterested affections of the heart. I would con-jure him, by the very considerations so often invoked against us, not to break up that beautiful system of domestic harmony, which, more than any thing else, foreshadows the blissful state in which love is to be the only law, and love the only sanction and love the supreme bliss of all.

They to whom these ideas are new may think they savor of paradox and extravagance. I am not aware that they have ever been publicly proclaimed by any one. But I beg you to believe that I would not venture to utter them here, did I not know that they float more or less distinctly in the minds of all who can be supposed capable of appreciating and comprehending them. They may not be expressed in words, but they find a mute language in the cheerful humility, the liberal obedience, the devoted loyalty of the slave, and in the gentleness, the kindness, the courtesy of the master. These are the appropriate manifestations of those affections which it is the office of religion to cultivate in man, and I appeal to them as evidences of the ameliorating influence of this much misunderstood relation on the hearts and minds of both parties. That such results are universal, I will not pretend to say; but that the cause which has produced them will go on to produce them more extensively, I conscientiously believe. "If the thing be not of God, it will surely come to nought;" but so fully am I convinced that it has his sanction and approbation, that I expect it to cease only when, along with other influences divinely directed, it shall have accomplished its part of the great work of enlightening, evangelizing and regenerating the human race.

THE POET'S GRAVE.

O when the Poet comes to die,
When Death has twined his funeral crown
And shrouded up his glorious eye,
Where will ye lay him down?
The silver cord is snapp'd in twain—
The golden bowl is broke again;
Shall dust return to dust in vain—
"Unknell'd, unknown,"
With scarce a stone,
To tell the careless passer-by
That here, in fitting spot, the sons of Genius lie?

Ah! no; such cold neglect forbear;
Turn not away with heedless tread;
The Muses meet in silence there,
And weep the lonely dead.
O choose for them the loveliest spot,
Where blooms the bright forget-me-not,
And singing birds full oft I wot,
In choral swell,
The virtues tell,
Of him who yielded up his trust,
Ashes to ashes, and dust to dust.

Where the violet stands beside the rose,
And the tall green grass in beauty grows,
And the whispering winds in sadness sigh,
There, let him lie.

Where the flowrets smile in clustering love,
And the beautiful bowers hang thick above,
And the streams go winding sweetly by,
There, let him lie.

Where the wild bird builds its feathery nest,
And plumes the down of its gentle breast,
And waiteth and watcheth and lingereth nigh,
There, let him lie.

And if some lake, as Leman, lave
The minstrel's tomb—the poet's grave,
Whose tones like mournful music die,
There, let him lie.

Or if perchance in greenwood shade,
That fairy-spot, his dust be laid;
'Tis well: no need of tear, or sigh,
There, let him lie.

But oh! if in the stranger's land
He chance to fade—no gentle hand
Upon his brow—where Luna's eye
Beholds his lonely grave, there let the Poet lie.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

LETTER III.

Views in regard to an extension of the privileges of Copyright in the United States, to the citizens of other countries, in a Letter to the Hon. Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, member of Congress. By the author of "The Yemassee," "The Kinsmen," "Richard Hurdia," "Damsel of Darien," &c.

HON. I. E. HOLMES:

House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR SIR: In employing the phrase, "International Copyright," by which to distinguish the sort of remedy which the American author craves, for his security, at the hands of the American Congress, you are not to suppose that I am at all solicitous of any treaty-arrangement, between ours and any foreign power, in relation to this interest. I use the words, not because I approve of the particular measure which they imply, but because, from familiar and frequent use, they enter readily into the general sense of our people, and, thus far, form a very good caption to a series of papers, which have for their object a general survey of the condition of our Literature, and an inquiry into the proper modes of improving and elevating it. If we can obtain a proper adjustment of our claims at home, the American author will give himself very little concern as to the new rights which he may acquire in the British publishing market. His object is rather to obtain a proper footing in our own, than to extend his claims on any other. Let not this suggestion be answered with a sneer. I have shown already how numerous the works of Americans are republished in England. I have before me several of my own writings, in English type,—some of which have reached the second edition in London,—and this, without my taking a single step towards it, or seeking, or receiving a single shilling of British money by way of compensation. Could we be secure of the home market, on equal terms with the foreign author, we should not care a copper for the European. The United States, collectively, from Maine to Texas, would afford an ample field to the genius of our writers, whether their aims be ambition or avarice. Those persons, who, in opposing the friends of an extended Copyright, have dwelt with so much stress upon the cupidity of authorship as the source of the present application,—who have insisted upon their ravenous appetite for tribute from all the world,—have spoken not only foolishly, but knavishly. They knew better. Mankind knows better. The history of Literature is one which shows the author to be commonly indifferent to money—heedless equally of the present and the future. It is in becoming more prudent, more methodical, more careful of the results of their labors,—more solicitous of the welfare of their families,—and so, more moral and more deserving of social approbation,—that the authors of modern times have offended against those classes which have fed and fattened for centuries upon their brains, as the maggot is said to do upon those of the elk. For my own poor part, speaking simply for myself—though I believe I speak also the sentiments of all of the profession, I neither care for the British market, nor ask that our government shall trouble itself for a single instant to inquire what may be the laws of Copyright in that country. I prefer that ours should act independently in this matter, from her own head, and with as little reference as possible to the doings of any other nation. Let England do as she pleases. Let us do right. The question, like all others which relate to the rights of man, his sense of justice, or his interests, is determinable by intrinsic standards. It asks no argument drawn from foreign example. It needs no dicta whether of statesmen or schoolmen. Ancient men can tell us no more in regard to it than we can learn, at any moment, by a simple reference to the governing principles already in our hands; and I am free to confess I sicken at the humiliating deference which our writers and public men so constantly show to British authority,—as if Britain were not only always infallible, but always just. It is high time that we should relieve ourselves from this sort of slavishness—high time we should learn that, as a people, we have in our own possession all the means and material for forming, on almost every subject, a separate and independent judgment. The laws and books—the past wisdom and example—the trials and experiences,—the arts and the sciences—not of Great Britain only, but of the whole world,—are at our disposal,—in forms, more eligible and compact, more easy of use, and more accessible, than they are ordinarily to be found in Europe. In our hands they are remote from the bias of their origin—unfettered by the habits or the institutions in which they had their rise; and totally unimpaired and unqualified by the superstitions and the prejudices of their growing ages. They come to us in their matured and perfect condition. As a people, we start from a point which seems particularly to indicate a necessity for thinking out our own problems, and the constant and habitual exercise of this noble privilege, while it is the highest proof of our freedom, is the first great source of its preservation. It has been urged, as our reproach, that, as a people, we take nothing for granted. Perhaps this is our best security. Such a habit may make our legislation tedious, but it is apt finally to leave it true. I see no reason to rest upon, even if we refer to, the ipse dixit of other nations. Yet here, unhappily, is our usual pausing place. Thus far do we go—no farther. It is sufficient to be told, such is the usage of this or that ancient empire—whether barbarous or not, it does not matter—and the question is immediately shut; there we hang or hover, incapable of the effort to ascend and pass over the (most commonly) merely brutal obstruction. So far from our taking nothing for granted, it seems to me we take every thing for granted which the stranger tells us; even though it makes us angry. Why should this be so? It needs but a manly confidence in ourselves, and the exercise of those patient and pressing virtues which have placed our merely political securities where they are, to render those of our moral and social world precisely what they should be. Certainly, as relates to the present interest, I see not why we should refer to what is doing or to be done in England. Her principles, on the subject of Literary Property, are still singularly unsettled. Her legislation, in regard to it, down to a very recent period, has been scarcely superior to our own. It has always been contracted by the narrow question of expediency—always, more or less impaired in the results, by a reference to the warring claims of subordinate artists, printers, and publishers and paper-makers, in whose struggles of selfishness the author is commonly sacrificed. What England has yielded to her literary men has been grudgingly bestowed by the legislator, quite as much through a sense of shame, or of the merest policy, as through justice. The miserable dole, under the name of privilege, reluctantly given at the instance of some of her greatest intellects, is very far, even yet, from having reached that degree of concession which her best law-givers, her Mansfields and her Blackstones—not to speak of many others—minds capable of rising from the shallow technicalities of practice, to the fixed governing principles and reasons by which the mere rules of law are adjusted and determined—have long since insisted upon as the simplest measure of justice. Until she shall have recognized in the genius of her country a perfect right in its own creations—a right to use, to sell or to retain—so long as the commodity shall possess a value—she can urge no claim to be regarded as a model, in this respect, to other nations. Some of these, Germany for example, where Copyright is perpetual, have gone infinitely beyond her. Let us, therefore, not trouble ourselves about England. Let her frame her laws to suit her own purposes. The basis for ours should not be her suggestions, but our convictions—not her example, but our sense of right. I am the more earnest in insisting upon this point, as I feel that we have already too many treaty entanglements with a nation, which common interest must always keep a rival, and which circumstances have long since made an enemy.

The previous letters which I have written on this subject will show, if studied, sufficient reasons why a Law of Copyright should not only be independent of that of Great Britain, but why it should be thrown open equally to the whole world. It has been shown that because of the natural connection between the two nations, in consequence of their common origin and language, that the elder possesses an influence over the younger, which is inconsistent with our moral and intellectual independence. This is a sufficient reason why we should encourage, as much as possible, among us the circulation of foreign letters and languages, particularly the German; which, in the absence of a native literature, may neutralize, in some degree, the authority of that by which we are emasculated and enslaved. There are other reasons for desiring a general diffusion of the German literature and language among us, which, however, would only divert us now from the proper discussion. As the case stands at present, and as, I trust, I have sufficiently shown in preceding pages, the only hope of American authorship is—without falling into too bad an Hibernicism—in its ceasing to be American. The American author must expatriate himself. The American market, which affords him a Copyright, denies him a publisher. Such is the working of the laws. His remedy is to become a British citizen,—to yield his American Copyright entirely, and content himself with that of Great Britain, in lieu of his country. There, so far as he is effected by the laws, he enters the field on equal terms with the British author. There, his solicitude must be to conciliate the British reader. He does this by forbearing American topics,—by foregoing the American name. He must be particularly careful to suppress his identity with his birth-place. He must address himself to British prejudices,—he must be silent when the country of his birth and love is derided and denounced. This must he do in return for that patronage in search of which he abandoned his place of birth. That this must be the consequence of the present condition of things, may be inferred from our past experience. Long before the evil of which we complain had reached its present enormous magnitude, and while the American author could still procure the means of subsistence from his labors at home, we find certain of our writers addressing themselves so exclusively to the British reader, as, in that country, to have forfeited all connection or claim to their own. Some of them have dwelt abroad during the best portion of their literary lives; and their writings betray sufficient proof of the foreign influences by which they were fostered. They not only forbear to dilate in the vindication of their own land, but they are at some pains to obliterate her achievements. They say nothing of her claims: they do not yield themselves to the illustration of her history; and if they entertain any solicitude about her at all, it is that they shall not, by any imprudence of their own, be made to share in the odium of her name. Their works are devoted to rose-colored delineations of a foreign aristocracy, of their artificial and immoral modes of life; the luxuries of their retreats; the snug crannies where they rejoice,—in their cold-blooded exclusiveness,—while naked poverty grins and groans around them. Nothing, of the sunny side of this picture of human life, is too small; nothing too unimportant in connection with those whom they seek to conciliate, for the admiration and eulogy of these emigrant Americans. I could say more on this head—might show the slavish details which justify what has been said already,—but the subject is an ungracious one; and the reproach which is due to such writers must be shared by the country, whose ill-advised selfishness, or indifference, has subjected them to such humiliating necessities. The question is—shall this be the necessity—must this be the fate of American authorship generally. Must they, whatever their claims, however rich their endowments, or pure their patriotism,—unhonored and undesired at home, seek the more favoring countenance of strangers; and, in pandering to their ambition and their tastes, forget the country of their birth, and those institutions which, however much they might love, they are not permitted to maintain?

These are the dangers which threaten—nay, which are already beginning to be felt in their consequences. They may all easily be avoided. Our previous narrative has shown the mode. I have endeavored to make it appear that a privilege of Copyright extended in the United States to authors of whatever nation, will not only not injure the native author, but will not enhance the price of their writings to the public. Something more may be added to these suggestions, passingly, in the farther views which I have to present. It remains to show that an author has a perfect right in the productions of his own mind,—that he loses none of this right when, for the amusement or instruction of mankind, he circulates his productions through the press; that this right, being as perfect as any other, merits equally, with all others, the adequate protection of the laws: that this right being in the individual man and not in the nation, he should not be deprived of it on the pretence that he is a foreigner. These propositions will develop others, of not less consequence, as I proceed: their formal enumeration is unnecessary here. In their discussion I shall not scruple to avail myself of all the lights and learning which my reading has vouchsafed me, and which may seem important to a proper comprehension of the subject; and this, without deeming it necessary to make, as I advance, a special recognition of each authority. I am not aware that I shall owe much to my predecessors. They have expended more subtlety upon it than wisdom. They have shown themselves ingenious, rather than profound; and have repeated each other with that most marvellous facility, which is always to be expected in cases of novel suggestions, and where the standards of analysis have to be looked after in remote comparisons. I have now before me Burrow's Report of the Question Concerning Literary Property, determined by the Court of Kings Bench in 1769, in the cause between Miller and Taylor, with the separate opinions of the four judges;—the decision in the (Scottish) Court of Session in the cause of Hinton against Donaldson and Wood;—an argument in defence of Literary Property, by Francis Hargrave;—and the cause as determined on appeal in the House of Lords, of Alexander and John Donaldson, appellants, and a cloud of publishers, respondents. I am also in possession of numerous modern essays on the same subject, the arguments and illustrations of which, pro and con, seem drawn almost entirely from these sources. The first of these publications, the cause between Miller and Taylor, is undoubtedly the most valuable. It comprises very nearly all the arguments, on both sides, which are subsequently repeated in the several cases following. Three of the judges were in favor of the plaintiff,—but one, Mr. Justice Yates, dissenting. The opinion of the Court, which was delivered by Lord Mansfield, grasped the subject in a manly and comprehensive style, laid bare some of its most striking features, and conducted irresistibly to the conclusion which his lordship made his own. By this opinion it was decided that an author had a right at Common Law to his writings, after publication, which the statute did not impair or take away. The same question was afterwards made, on appeal, before the House of Lords, and this decision was reversed by a vote of eight to seven. In the cause before the Scottish Court of Session, the decision was adverse to the pursuer, (an English bookseller against Scotch appropriators,) on the ground that the Common Law of Scotland afforded him no remedy. The argument of Mr. Hargrave, though sufficiently elaborate, does not suggest any views of the question which may not be found, quite as strikingly presented, in the comprehensive analysis of Mr. Justice Willes and Lord Mansfield. The strongest argument against the Copyright claim is undoubtedly that of Mr. Justice Yates. To these I may chiefly confine myself. In all of the reasonings of those who have handled this subject, their great fault seems to me to be a reluctance to making the inquiry on original grounds and by a reference to its intrinsic standards. It is the error of the mere lawyer that he narrows his survey too commonly to a search after analogies. It is at best a bastard kind of criticism which depends for its judgment upon apt or seeming comparisons; and, where the question for adjudication is one equally nice and new, such a mode of analysis, (if it may deserve that title,) is particularly to be distrusted. The subject immediately under consideration is one that baffles analogy. It is one, the true points of which are very apt to elude the narrow vision; and when we find the controversialist descending to arbitrary definitions of property, framed at a time when half the present subjects of social enjoyment were totally unrecognized as such, we see at once that nothing is to be made of him. When Mr. Justice Yates declares that "nothing can be an object of property which has not a corporeal substance," we reply, the very antiquity of this maxim is an argument against it. It is a relic of the savage condition. What has it to do, as an authority, with a case like the present, where we show a right, associated with a value, and explain in what manner that right may be rendered valid and beyond dispute. The existence of a right and a value in himself establishes the claim of the citizen to protection of the object in question, and no arbitrary dictum of past periods should prevail against the principle. If Mr. Yates had regarded the reason of the maxim more closely, and its mere dictum less, he might have argued more honorably and justly. Why was a corporeal substance thought necessary to a property? Simply for its identification. Where the writings of an author are susceptible of proof, the old axiom of the law is defeated in its mere letter, while its substantive spirit is maintained. Another brief sample of Mr. Yates' reasoning may be shown, here, in order to exhibit the sort of mental obliquity with which the subject seems to have been approached. While arguing against the Common Law right of the author to his writings, he insists that the popular recognition of it could not be immemorial, because the art of printing was not known in the kingdom until a certain period still within the memory of men. The absurdity of the objection is at once apparent to those who think. As the wrong arose, and could only arise after the discovery of printing, it would be silly to look for a usage to secure the right against such a wrong, prior to the discovery of the art. It would suffice, in such a case, to show prescriptive usage contemporary with its introduction or immediately after it. Immemorial usage applies as much to the subject matter as to the popular memory; and the remark of Mr. Justice Yates is not a jot less absurd than it would be, were he, in reply to a witness who had said he knew A. B. as long as he could remember, to show that A. B. was even then only twenty years old, while the witness was sixty and in full possession of all his wits. The arguments on this topic, throughout these cases, are burdened with similar absurdities, the result of inveterate legal prejudices, and the slavish habit of looking simply to the bald axiom, without regarding the reasons and the spirit of the law. Comparisons are made to supply the place of arguments, and in the pursuit of little ingenuities and small subtleties, the broad grounds of the question are either partially or totally blinded. I shall bring up some of these suggested analogies and see what may be done with them, hereafter.

Has the author a perfect right in his own productions—the work of his head and of his hands—or, once out of his hands, do they become the right of his neighbor—the mechanic's right—the right of any man who may run them down and seize them upon the highway? That they are his right while they remain unpublished in his hands is beyond all question;—is the case altered when he opens his hands—when he puts his work in print? Does the work consist in the paper upon which it is written, in the type, the ink, the binding; or in those embodied thoughts and sentiments which are its living and imperishable soul? It would seem a studied disparagement of the reader's understanding to tell him that, when we speak of a book with regard to its value, we do not speak of an unintelligible oblong square of blotted or blank paper, marked with unmeaning characters, folded in particular form, and closely bound "in leather or prunella." We speak of a planned performance, distinguished by artistical combination; a structure of thought, fancy and imagination;—an elaborate history, whether of men, or nations, philosophies, or, simply, speculations,—the contrivance of one mind, not possible to any other—framed in language to a certain end,—the fruit of study, industry and invention—of years of preparation, and perhaps, also, of other years of patient, unintermitting resolve. In the effort to lessen or disparage the claims of the author to his peculiar property, some of the opponents of protection by Copyright have sneeringly objected that this protection is asked for a mere idea—the simple suggestion of one's thought. This is either doltish or dishonest. It is not an idea of which we speak, but of a work compounded of consistent ideas, harmonizing to a preconceived conclusion;—not a thought, but a building made up of thoughts—a structure betraying quite as much design as the cathedral or the castle—employing quite as much time in the erection—frequently impoverishing, and sometimes destroying the very life of the builder. It is a work having its own distinctive qualities and characteristics—which cannot be confounded with other works—upon which the author has set the peculiar marks of his genius, and given to all the certain sanction of his name. It is these peculiar marks and signs—these are the indicia which determine his right to the book, and which leave it not a matter of doubt, in any mind, to whom the property belongs. Nobody understands the type metal, the printer's ink, or manufacturer's paper, white or brown, though brought together in active mechanical combination, as meaning the book or the book-maker; any more than we should distinguish as such the person who finally wraps it up in muslin or leather, and stamps its title upon the back. These are all so many agents, merely, which the book summons into existence. It was to secure the book, already made, from mischance—to render it portable for carriage, and thus to bestow its treasure upon numbers, that printer, binder and vendor were endowed with their several occupations. They were not in the slightest degree essential to the making of the book,—only to its circulation. It was already made—a book complete in all necessary requisites—before it was confided to their hands. But for this they would never have known existence. However difficult it may be for these several tradesmen to understand this fact, it is yet nevertheless unquestionable. We can assure them that however much, in later days, their relation to the book may have undergone a change, they were originally nothing more than its agents, useful in their way, no doubt,—important to its objects, and, unquestionably, facilitating the interest from which they drew their own employment. But they were not the makers of the book, only its printers, binders and vendors. Their rights over the book were not greater than those of the carrier who, by packet or pack-horse, bore it to distant markets for more general distribution. Once paid for the printing, the binding and the vending, and their claim ceased, as certainly as the stonemason's, or the bricklayer's, when he transfers to the proprietor the key of the dwelling which he has built to order, and receives the compensation money accorded him by the contract.

In whom, then, remains the property after publication? The printer clearly has no right to it, for his right has been defined. He alleges none. It is a property of value. Does the process of printing make it derelict!—Take it out of the author and give it to the public! This is asserted, and the statute by which a right to its exclusive proprietorship, for a term of years, is conferred upon the original author, is said, by Mr. Justice Yates, to be a “public benevolence, by way of encouragement.” This is certainly all very strange. You are to infer that, in publishing his work, in order to realize a certain profit from its sale,—the only way in which he can do so—the author gives it to the public! But why should this be inferred? He himself has no such intention. He tells you he has no such intention. But you reply to him, (and this is one of the analogies of Mr. Yates,) “Your book is in the nature of a bird: as long as you kept your hand upon it it was yours, but the moment you set it free you lost it forever.” This fanciful comparison is mistaken for an argument. But you do not lose your bird forever, or at all, if you can only identify him. You have only to prove property and you recover him. Is he a parrot? he will answer to your call,—he will repeat your words, and you thus identify him. Does he wear your ring, your bell, or any thing in the shape of ornament, upon which your memory can fix with sufficient certainty to justify your allegation? If so, the principles of law, as well as common sense, recognize your right to have him back. Upon what principle is it that the author loses his right to a valuable property, the work of his peculiar genius, the fruit of his peculiar industry, the moment that he endeavors to convert his genius and industry into a means of support? In what does this right of property differ from any other? Why should that labor in which the head bears the principal part, be of less value than that which simply springs from the hands? In but one respect surely, it is more easily appropriated by the thief! But what a sufficient reason why the author should be totally denied his right? Is it well that because one is particularly exposed to spoliation, he should be entirely delivered up to the spoiler; and, failing to secure him thoroughly from wrong, must that be a sufficient reason why the laws should declare him wholly out of their protection? It would seem so, for I can nowhere find a better.

The gross injustice which marks this sort of reasoning, has very naturally grown out of the imperfect knowledge of the subject entertained at times past; and the servile adherence of merely technical lawyers to the arbitrary rules of their profession. This class of reasoners, accustomed wholly to defer to authority, seldom venture to look behind the dicta which they obey for the principles upon which they are founded, and are thus seldom able to detect the errors which arise, naturally, in most cases, from the application, without reserve, of rules which generalize too largely. Hence, in the case under consideration—a case one and thus full of difficulties—we find them na-

king no inquiries into the nature of the interest which required to be protected—no inquiry into what is right in itself,—no reference to those reasons which every new topic of discussion must naturally, of itself, suggest. Their question has been, simply, what has been before!—a sort of inquiry which, as must be evident to every thinking mind, is fatal to all new truths, and especially to that class of truths which, from their peculiar character, do not necessarily force themselves upon the popular reflection. The great popular ear once open to a truth seldom loses it; it is not suffered to sleep there; but, passing at once into the popular mind, expands into a principle, in spite of the professions, and becomes a fixed law which no after-chance can unsettle. The great difficulty indeed, in the way of our present subject is, that it is not calculated to become a popular interest. Were the people not indifferent, would our Legislature be so? Did it concern woollens or cottons, sugars or irons, baggings or breadstuffs, would this be so? No! But literature is a sort of bread and clothing for the mind; food for thought; a garment for the understanding; pleasant to the fancy, sweet to the taste, refreshing to the soul,—the food of better moments, calculated, with religion and the social virtues, to lessen the animal in man and lift his moods. For these the random, hurrying multitude have few thoughts. But the law-givers are selected from this multitude. They are the better, the brighter, the wiser. They embody the wisdom of the race; they preserve the sacred fires of thought and intellect; they have the purity, the propriety, the decorum; they are put in station especially to restrain brutality; to protect right against might; to overawe and punish the wilful; to conduct the erring and the ignorant;—to prepare laws in advance of the necessity, and thus direct the uplooking eye of the people to what they shall become, and what they shall forbear. But, what if the legislator waits only on the popular will? Addresses himself only to those subjects upon which the popular mind is aroused and watchful; seeks only for those measures upon which the populace can be inflamed, and drowns over those upon which the same mind is indifferent and ignorant! Enough that he who would elevate the national mind, must never wait upon the popular will. He must inform that mind, he must lift that will—he must open new avenues for the common thought, and, in diverting it from the slavish and the sensual, must win its reverence, without regard to its votes, as the only true philosopher,—as the only honest patriot.

The author having written his book, with his own hand, from his own head, with no help from another,—in which another could not help him—shall it be his to enjoy with all its fruits? It has its fruits—they are of value to him and to others. These things are admitted. But, says Mr. Justice Yates, "mere value will not describe the property in this. The air, the light, the sun, are of value inestimable. But who can claim a property in them? Mere value does not constitute property. Property must be somewhat exclusive of the claim of another." Was ever such obliquity and perverseness of mind as this passage furnishes! I can not define my property in terms which corresponds with old laws. It is a new property. It does not meet the exactions of definitions established at a period when such a property was not. I show it to be the work of my hands, which only my hands could have made—which no money could have bought;—It is confessed to be of value—to be productive of rich fruits;—but all these do not suffice. By the law you may protect your ox, your ass, your house and your lands. In that semi-savage state from which half of our laws are derived, these things were the only subjects of property. Mere value, though the creature of your labors and your thoughts, does not constitute such a property as the law will protect. "The air, the light, the sun, are of value inestimable, but who can claim a property in them?" I answer—the Maker of them—he who, at any moment, can cease to make! The sun, the air, the light, are given to us upon conditions. They are taken from us daily. They can be retained by none but him! They can be held in no exclusive possession by any human being. The laws can not operate against their general diffusion. I am willing to accept the analogy of the justice. The author has, of all others, the least questionable right to his property. He is its creator, and he sends it abroad, even as God sends light, and air, and sunshine, for the benefit and the blessing of mankind. But he sends it abroad upon conditions also. Shall these conditions be respected? There is but one defect in the comparison. He has no power to protect his right. With that exception, the analogy presented by the justice suits our case exactly. The right is unquestionably in the creator of the book, as in the Blessed Author of the sunshine and the air. Shall he be defrauded of his right because he lacks the might which shall secure it to his children? Shall the robber urge his feebleness as a reason why he should be divested of his right; and shall human justice, or, rather, human law, sanction the pretension? This is the true question.

Here, then, as before stated, lies the stumbling block in the way of all these shallow reasoners. They attempt analogies instead of arguments; they put supposititious cases in preference to the one absolutely before them; and their arguments are very much in a circle. The snake's tail, at the conclusion, is in his own mouth. Literary property can find few or no analogies in the early history of civilization. As the laws of society spring gradually out of its daily necessities, and, even then, are very slow of gestation, it would be absurd to expect that any should be found having a regard to a future which the mind of a people does in no manner anticipate. In the inferior condition of mankind, there was no literature to protect. Books and learning were unknown. Writing, where known, was an art confined to the religious few. Art was hoarded in sacred places, into which the profane multitude did not dare to penetrate. The great body of the people, in every nation, were mere creatures of the soil. Their souls were not above it. The destiny of the snake was upon them. They crawled with their bellies to the ground. They had no upward-looking thoughts,—no sensibilities beyond those of hunger, and the scourge,—no wishes but to supply the one and to escape the other. They took no delight in literature, or if they did, it was entirely beyond their powers of appropriation. The author was the first to awaken these abject creatures; to breathe a living hope into their souls; to arouse them into a first consciousness of manhood. "Incapable to read, with no time for study, they could yet listen. The poet appeared among them, and first unsealed their ears and unsealed their vision. Old Homer was one of these earliest teachers. He trod the isles of Greece with his glorious histories fastened to his lips. They could not well pluck them thence, or they would have done so;—not for the spoil or profit that they might bring; not to rob the divine bard of his means of life, but for their own secret enjoyment when he stood no longer among them. He gathered his audience around him,—the rude fishermen of Chios—he gave them the first glimpses of their beautiful mythology—the first narratives of their own mighty heroes—and they recompensed him according to their means. Whether these were poor or not, the case is unaltered. The poet asks nothing more from any community.—Thus he trod the coast, and the cities of his own country;—with these treasures he may have wandered among the rude mountaineers of Macedonia,—may have crossed to the shores of the Persian, and even gathered his rewards at the haughty courts of Susa and Ecbatana. The crowds that hung upon his lips caught up morsels of his song. They retained them in eager memories, but they did not wrong the poet, and he had his remedies. He could alter his lay at pleasure—could be original when he pleased—could declare his favorite version, and thus always be the arbiter of his audience. The perfection of ancient verse is due, in great measure, to the habit of frequent recitation. In this manner it underwent daily improvement—its beauties were expanded, its irregularities overcome—its rudenesses subdued to harmony and grace, even as the pebble, rough at first, by constant turning in the mouth, is rendered smooth at last. Those who stole his fragments made no money of them. They did not seek to do so. They refreshed themselves and their friends with them in the absence of their maker, and when he reappeared again, they once more hurried to the grateful repast of song and story. He lost nothing by their previous appropriations. On the contrary, they brought him other hearers. The imperfect morsels of song which they gathered from the hurried utterance of the bard only provoked a desire for the rest. Their thefts,—unlike those of the modern publisher who steals all,—were his benefits. They taught a passion for his song to listening children, who, as they grew to manhood, were always happy to welcome the venerable maker and possessor of such wondrous treasures.

For long years, while the necessities of the great body of mankind kept them totally ignorant of letters, this was the only popular mode of procuring knowledge. It was in this way that the author reaped the gains and the glory of his toils. From the poor he received smiles and welcome, food and the best seat on the sacred hearth; from the rich, such gifts as wealth and taste take pride in bestowing upon merit. The necessity of the case made the author a publisher. There was no other mode of publication. He united in his own person the vocations which are now separate, and the disjunction of which, in consequence of the art of printing, is the cause of all the present confusion of ideas on the subject of literary property. The modern wiseacre is at a loss to say in what constitutes the book—the embodied structure of thought, and imagination, and sentiment which it contains, or the material by which, and upon which, it is printed. But we proceed.

As the world advanced in knowledge,—that is to say, as the ability to compensate for the lessons taught became in some degree commensurate with the desire for them, the occupation, which was originally pursued by the poet only, became common to other teachers. The philosophers, the sophists, the orators, took up the vocation; and the various knowledge of the few was diffused by their agency among the multitude. They traversed the world. The practice of the Grecian sages, in travelling, was threefold. They acquired, with the means of life, new truth and made new discoveries, while unfolding others to those less advanced in knowledge. The practice of the apostles was due to like desires, and was borrowed from the Greeks and the Egyptians. They derived their several supports from this progress on the principle that the laborer was worthy of his hire. Besides, they taught systems, not merely ideas. They set before the ignorant vast fabrics of history, schemes of thought, symmetrical, and, whether true or not, based most usually upon the known, and adapted to the condition of their times. Each philosopher had his system—each sophist his scheme—each orator his own theories and histories of government. There were inferior orders who expressed taught the systems and the doctrines of others.

who, in their schools and classes, pretended to nothing more than the inculcation of borrowed thoughts and language. Some mingled their own with the views of others, and criticism, in this manner, was known long before there was a reviewer. We are reminded, in this connection, of the beautiful anecdote which is told of Æschines, himself an orator of great excellence and power. Repeating, while in his exile, to the Rhodians, the great oration of Demosthenes, de coronâ, which had occasioned his own banishment, and hearing the great applauses by which it was received, he exclaimed—"If it delights you thus much from my lips, how much more would you have applauded were you to hear Demosthenes speak it himself!" He used the labors of his rival, and probably obtained money from their use; but he did this only where Demosthenes could not. The modern appropriator would scarcely have observed this forbearance. He would not scruple, were this possible, to employ the speech of the great orator directly under the nose of the speaker; he would have left out just what pleased him,—would have interpolated what he thought proper—and sworn, in the face of all the gods, not only that the oration was perfect, as delivered, but that he, himself, was in truth the orator. This is what the publishers do daily. They take the name as well as the writings of the author in vain. It needs not to say that, in those periods, the profession of the author had its own securities. He needed no laws for his protection. The nature of the pursuit—the condition of society,—the peculiarity of his position, made his security also a peculiar one. Unlike mere corporeal possessions, his work could not be wrested from his grasp; and the failure of a legal precedent in his favor arose simply from his total independence of it. The whole subject was under his own control. He could publish when he pleased. He could utterly suppress his publication. He could choose his audience and confine himself at pleasure to rich or poor. He could re-mould and remodel his work at any moment. It was never beyond his power of improvement; and, dying, he could transmit his manuscripts to his sons, as an inheritance to be used as he himself had used them. It did not rest then, as now, in the power of those whom he had delighted or instructed, to seize upon his labors, convert them into money, mutilate them at pleasure, and insist, all the while, upon their integrity. If they employed them as he had done, gathering an audience around them, and taking pay for their recitations, it was only in his absence, and contending against all the disabilities arising from an imperfect remembrance of what they had heard, and without the same genius to correct the errors, expand the topics, supply the deficiencies, and adapt the character of the work to that of the peculiar audience. The moment the real author appeared,—the builder, the creator,—the imitator was abandoned. It was not then, as now, a matter of indifference to the public which edition fell into their hands. The appropriator then appeared in his own character, as an appropriator, an imitator merely, and claimed no identity with his author. His rewards were always qualified by the admitted fact that he was simply an imitator,—the repeater, as far as he could recollect, of what he had heard from the master. The latter, when he came, was naturally preferred by his audience. They knew that, from his lips, the lecture was sure, not only to be genuine, but of constant improvements. The mind that had conceived and composed it, was that alone which could properly say when the performance was complete.

It was thus, in early days, that the poet, the philosopher and the historian, laid the foundations of a national literature. It was in this manner and by these means that they raised the moral of their respective nations—and we may see, from what has been said, that, employed in this manner, a single elaborate work was a means of profit and income through the longest life. Nobody could limit the profits of the author to seven, twice seven, and thrice seven years, and say, "thus long shall thy labors yield thee bread, and after that shall they pass to thy neighbors. Thy children shall reap none of the fruit thereof." It was because of this security that the single work of an author became a great one—carrying his mighty and time-honored name, onward and onward, to the remotest lands and generations. He was not compelled, as now, to bring forth his three annual volumes, to reap the fruits of a season only, and then hurry on, racking his brain into fever by constant invention. His life, sustained by the single labor which no body could steal, in turn expended itself upon that labor wholly. Perfection was the result, and immortality not less than bread.

With the improvement of the popular mind, and the increase of individual wealth, the system of publication, by oral relation, underwent a change; or, rather, a new means was adopted by which to gratify in a different manner the appetites of another and more elevated class of inquirers. The lordling and the wealthy man—the proud lady and the delicate damsel—persons of superior taste and refinement—naturally shrunk from the jostle of the crowd in a mixed assembly. But they also craved the pleasure which so gratified the vulgar. Wealth and taste had their claims and insisted upon their privileges; and these were complied with. The author made copies of his manuscripts—his traditions, his ballads, his romances—and sold or presented them—it meant pretty much the same thing—to those who could afford to pay for them. Distinguished persons became the purchasers and patrons. Emperors and Dukes, Princes and Knights placed the manuscripts, thus purchased or procured, among their choicest treasures and were as careful of them and proud of them as Alexander the Great, who never marched against his foes without carrying his Homer along with him, to delight his heart and invigorate its courage. Their perusal beguiled them in weary journeys, consoled them in the sick and solitary chamber, and formed, at all seasons, their favorite studies and enjoyments. Each noble family had its cherished volumes. The Chronicles of Froissart, the Romaunt of the Rose and other productions, devoted equally to chivalry and love, were thus honored in the middle ages.

The author soon found it to his advantage to engraft the new employment upon the old. The purchasers and patrons of this class were not numerous, but they were sufficiently so to employ all his leisure time in the painful labor of multiplying copies. It did not lessen his common audience while it greatly enlarged his profits. The liberality of the kingly or knightly patron amply compensated him, not merely for the manual labor which his manuscript cost him, but for the rich original treasures of thought and sentiment which it contained. A single copy yielded him, upon occasion, quite as much as he was accustomed to derive from whole seasons of oral utterance among the people; and the wandering harper, who gathered many more popular tales than pence among the poor, turned the former acquisition into pounds when he stood in the presence of the rich. We all remember the unwillingness of Cecil to pay to Spenser the fifty pounds "for a song," which Elizabeth had granted him. Fifty pounds, in that day, was equal to five times the sum at present, and Elizabeth was notoriously a costive lady in money matters. It is also remembered, the tradition of Sidney's first payment to Spenser for the portions, to which he listened, of the Faerie Queene. The story may be an exaggeration—doubtless is—but it serves to show what must have been the truth from what was generally supposed to have been true. Fortunes were expended upon manuscripts—they constituted the most valuable portions of many valuable estates, and were guarded with a care as jealous as that which watched over the most spacious patrimony.

This second mode of publication brought, no more than the first, no injury to the author from the diffusion of his labors among the nobility. Their circulation lay still in his own hands. His securities were found in the general circumstances of the country in regard to education. The noble persons to whom his works were delivered in writing, were not the persons to copy them, and they were treasures quite too sacred to be entrusted long out of their own custody. The priesthood were chiefly capable, but all their time was devoted to monkish legends, to mysteries and moralities, and to the prosecution of that beautiful but expensive art of illumination which still confounds our eyes with the skill and the misapplication of labor in those days. This class excepted, our author had little to apprehend from the powers of appropriation on the part of any other. Universal ignorance with regard to letters was, during the middle ages, the almost inevitable consequence of universal and devastating wars. Not only was the great body of the people unable to read, but the knights and nobles of the land, with few exceptions, labored under a like deficiency. They better knew the use of the battle axe than of the pen. They made their marks instead of writing their names, and hence the origin of the signet. Their learning was caught up from the wandering musician and traveller. Their prayers were taken from the lips of the priesthood. They could prattle an ave in latin without understanding any thing more than its general import. They were all very much in the condition of the mosstrooper, William of Deloraine, who, in the Lay of the Last Minstrel, when the lady cautions him not to read in the book for which she sends him, tells her, somewhat exultingly, that he does not even know the gallows prayer:

"Letter nor line know I never a one Wer't my neck-verse at Hairibee."

Letters were rather discreditable than otherwise, at a period when the greatest boast of the knight was his ability to cleave his enemy, at a blow, from the neck to the naval. The literature of the nation was left to "learned clerks," and this phraseology, at that period, was not a compliment but a sarcasm.

Thus, then, we see that, up to the discovery of the art of printing, the author was the exclusive master of his own writings. They enured to his benefit and to his only. He alone sold them. We have no instance on record to the contrary. If he procured a scribe to copy them, we have no instance of the latter claiming the right to make as many copies, for his own use, as he thought proper. His securities, in the possession and exclusive circulation of his works, were derived, as we have seen, from the circumstances of his age. The physical difficulties alone were sufficient to prevent the pirating of his writings, and he himself might easily increase these difficulties and repudiate all spurious copies by denouncing them and producing the genuine. These, when in the hands of others, were not accessible; and, even if accessible, and copied by other "learned clerks," the injury was of moderate extent—the manual labor called for by the act of piracy being calculated to repel the attempt, particularly by a class of persons who, in all probability, if they wrote at all, aimed at original performances. There was no happy process in those days, by which, in the twinkling of an eye, the painful elaborations of the hand might be mocked by the simultaneous promulgation of those sands of copies, which would most effectually pluck his possessions from his grasp. Had he feared such a danger, it was then in his power to have prevented it. He was the favorite and the friend of princes, their counsellor and frequently, as in the case of Chaucer, their ambassador. He had but to ask the protection of the laws for his peculiar property, and it would have been accorded him, for the public opinion already recognized as such. The odious idea of monopoly—certainly, the most absurd and impertinent of all suggestions in the case of a person and a commodity wholly independent of the toils or the ingenuity of others—would not have been urged as a reason for refusing him a security like that which was possessed by any other person.

OUR YOUNGER, HAPPIER DAYS.

BY L. J. CIST.

OUR YOUNGER DAYS! those happy days!—

Can happier ever be?—

When youth's first, unobscured rays

Light up the spirit, free

From all the thousand after cares

Of Life's bewildering maze,—

Which yet the heart nor knows, nor fears,

In younger, happier days!

OUR YOUNGER DAYS!—Oh! then the Earth

Is robed in richer green;

And sweeter flowers have fairer birth

Than any after seen!

And bluer skies are spread above,

And brighter sunshine plays,

To lighten up the days we love—

Those younger, happier days!

OUR YOUNGER DAYS!—In childhood's bowers

The spirit, free as air,

Knows not the weight of weary hours,

Press'd down by grief and care:

And youth's first friends!—the faithful few—

Whose worth we love to praise;—

Where now are friends like those we knew

In younger, happier days!

OUR YOUNGER DAYS!—Oh! when the heart

Is sick with grief and pain,

How do our longing thoughts revert

To those bright days again!

The Warrior would his laurels give,

The Poet all his lays—

In childhood's home once more to live

Those younger, happier days!

THE PRIZE TALE. Mrs. V. Clay Minor.

STEPHANO COLONNA, OR LOVE AND LORE.

A TALE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER III.

The next night a cavalier stood leaning against one of the lofty columns of red granite which ornament the Piazzetta of St. Mark.

"These pillars were among the trophies brought by Dominico Michieli on his victorious return from Palestine in 1125, and it is believed that they were plundered from some island in the Archipelago." For more than fifty years they lay on the quay, no one being found willing to undertake the task of rearing them. At length it was effected by Nicolo Barattiero. The government promising to reward his success by granting whatever boon he might ask consistent with the honor of the State, he requested that games of chance, before prohibited in the capital, might be played in the space between the columns. It was granted, but afterwards to deter the people from frequenting it, and to render it a place of horror, it was made the scene of public executions. This feeling was afterwards increased by the circumstance of its being the spot where the ill-fated Marino Faliero landed from his voyage from Rome when he was created Doge.

The moon had set, but the stars were out by thousands in the sky. The passers-by looked with astonishment on him who stood so calmly there and whispered,

"'Tis some unhappy stranger who knows not the fatality of the place;" for well they knew no Venetian would risk his person between the fatal columns.

At length one called to him, "Signor, knowest thou not the proverb—'Guardati dall' intreco-lunnio!'"

But Stephano, for he it was, heeded not the warning; he seemed alike unconscious of the gondolier's song, the lazzaroni's piteous tale and the thousand footfalls that fell on the smooth pavement. He was looking up to the balcony where he had stood with Leonore the previous night, and his heart was far away with her on her homeward journey to Ferrara. At length he murmured:

"Alas! that our spirits are so clogged and fettered! Oh! that I might rend the veil of futurity and read my fate and thine, sweet Leonore! My studies and vigils have brought me but weariness and the unsatisfied desire; I am but where I began."

"Thou needest a guide, follow me and all shall be clear as noonday," said a tall figure emerging from the shadow of the pillar, and striding rapidly away without pausing for a reply. Stephano started and gazed after him. He was fast losing sight of the stranger, as he mingled with the crowd, when an irresistible desire to follow seized him, and hastening away he was soon by his side. The stranger did not notice him, but kept on in silence till he reached a quay and summoned a gondolier who lay asleep upon his oars; then turning to Stephano he said:

"Wilt thou still follow, or dost thou fear to meet what thou so much wishest?"

"Who art thou that speakest to a Colonna of fear?"

"Thou goest not to mortal strife or scenes, proud cavalier; thy trusty sword will avail thee naught with those thou must encounter. Is there strength in thy heart to bear the trial?"

"Lead on and thou shalt see."

They seated themselves and the stranger directed the gondolier to a lone island far out in the lagoon, on which stood a high tower. As they shot silently but swiftly over the waters, Stephano scanned earnestly the appearance of his companion.

He was richly habited in black velvet, and the graceful folds of the cloak were elegantly disposed about his tall person. A cap of the same material rested on the clustering curls of his dark hair, but a sable plume, which, confined by a single diamond, drooped across the front, concealed the face with the exception of the mouth, which was beautiful in form and firm in expression. Not a word was exchanged in their passage from the city to the island; when they landed, the stranger threw silver to the boatman, who bowed silently and seating himself in the gondola, was soon out of sight.

"Now, cavalier, if your words were true and your heart is indeed strong enough, and pure enough, thou shalt know all thou desirest."

"I fear nothing—but tell me, mysterious stranger, who art thou?"

"Men call me Fabricio."

"Fabricio! am I in truth in the presence of that ruler of spirits? Oh! deign to teach a worshipper thine art. I will be thy pupil, and yield up every thing for a share only of thy power."

"Every thing, Stephano Colonna!—hast thou forgotten the princess Leonore? Already hast thou precluded thyself from a place amongst the highest natures—thou hast yielded to earth-born love—art thou prepared to renounce this?"

"And with it happiness!" said Stephano mournfully.

"Is there no happiness in communion with freed spirits—none in unutterable knowledge—no bliss in perpetual life and youth? Know'st thou not that Leonore will grow old and die? For a passing pleasure wilt thou lose blessings inestimable? and thou, in a few short years what wilt thou be? Dust scattered by the wind, that bears triumphantly on in ever-renewed life spirits that are now looking on thee."

"Hush, tempt me not thus; I love, and I will not disappoint a trusting heart. Said'st thou not mine own must be pure, and would'st thou have me treacherous?"

"Aye, pure from earthly passions; treacherous, if thou wilt, to all such—thus only may'st thou soar where thy wish leads thee."

"No more, no more of this, 'tis now too late, but show me the future I would know."

"Follow."

They left the shore and entered the tower; Fabricio lead the way to a luxurious hall and said:

"I leave thee to reflect on my words; in a few minutes I will return; your destiny is now to be decided—be firm," and he left the room.

Stephano seated himself on a splendid divan and gazed around him. The room was semi-circular and richly tapestried with crimson velvet, on which grotesque figures wildly grouped, and cabalistic characters were wrought. The wind which gently moved the rich folds gave a life-like motion to the figures which was startling. On the plane side of the room were paintings of exquisite landscapes and beautiful females; here and there in niches were rare statues of the first masters. An alabaster altar stood before a statue of Fate, and above it a chandelier, formed of gems arranged in stars, slowly burnt away its perfumed oils. On the high frescoed ceiling hideous faces glared, and beauteous forms floated amidst clouds and stars. On either side of the altar stood a small cabinet of ebony inlaid with gold, containing amulets, charms and elixirs from the costliest of the Egyptian magi to the simplest of the peasant witch. Soft music floated around and the fragrant breath of rarest flowers, mingled with the incense of the consuming oils, diffused an enervating odor through the hall. Stephano gazed on all with a dreaming soul, and was losing consciousness in a delicious slumber when Fabricio reentered.

"Hast thou chosen?"

"My answer is still the same."

"Thou wilt not renounce love, perishing love, for immortality and wisdom?"

"Fabricio, I dare not."

"There are things then which even a Colonna fears!"

"I fear to be false only, magician"—

"Hast thou thought of all—time's changes and ravages of years?"

"All, all, delay no longer, but grant my wish and show me the future not for months."

"I will give thee one more opportunity for choice and be wise in thy decision, behold what thou may'st be!"

As he spake a snowy cloud filled the space between the altar and the wall. It collected and hung over the altar, and Stephano beheld a lofty mountain whose summit blazed with resplendent stars. A wild cataract foamed down its rocky sides, but the turbid waters became tranquil in a broad river which flowed through the smiling valley at its base. On its highest point stood a young cavalier and a beautiful female. Stephano gazed earnestly on them; the cavalier was himself, but who the maiden? In vain he sought the lineaments of Leonore, but the unknown was glorious in her beauty. The noble face was turned towards the star-writ sky, and the bright penetrating eyes seemed to read that language as a familiar thing. She pointed to the brilliant orbs high above them, and, smiling, said:

"Leave the earth and hold communion with the glorious spirits who inhabit yon brighter worlds," and spreading a pair of wings, radiant as a rainbow, sprang into the air. The youth gazed after her and besought her to stay and aid him. She looked back and waved her hand; at this action, powerful wings unfolded from his broad shoulders, and with a triumphant countenance he too floated through the air. Higher and yet higher did they soar towards a star that blazed in the zenith, and glorious forms joined them in their onward course.

"What means it?" asked Stephano eagerly, as they disappeared.

"It is Wisdom and her true seeker, and those with them are pure and exalted spirits who have cast aside the heavy fetters of earth, love and pleasure. Now behold love and its end!"

A cloud of roseate hue floated softly before them, and as it rolled away, a garden, fruitful, flowery and smiling as Eden was seen. On a moonlighted terrace, which overhung the silver wavelets of a beauteous river, stood a youth and maiden. Again Stephano beheld his image, and now he found Leonore beside, and his heart beat rapturously. They were seated, and his arm was around her slender form, whilst her beautiful eyes were fixed confidently on his face as he leaned towards her. Her graceful head reclined on his shoulder, covering his breast with a mass of silken ringlets, and a beautiful trusting smile parted the rich lips.

"Oh that is indeed bliss!" cried Stephano.

"The future numbers years, and changes through their hours; look again," said Fabricio with a smile, and a withered, toothless crone sat bowed over a cold hearth-stone, where a few embers glimmered, grey hairs strayed negligently over the furrowed brow, the shrivelled lips mumbled over a wretched rosary which she held in her thin long hands. And that cavalier so proud in manly beauty? In another room of the ruined palace an old man eagerly seized the cards, and bloated wretches sat around the small table with him, their greedy eyes glaring on a pile of gold in the midst. No sparkling wine-cup, no reckless mirth, no brilliant lights lent their usual enchantments to such scenes. They played fiercely with curses, and avarice gnawed their hearts like a worm.

"'Tis false, Fabricio; our hearts can never be found in such scenes as these?"

"Nor these, proud youth?"—

And behold a lordly hall hung round with sable and ebon plumes o'er a snow-white bier, and on it a youthful maid, still, cold and white as the shroud. Stephano's cheek grew pale as he saw his Leonore. And then—a damp, dark vault, and there was the cavalier beside an opened coffin. In the dark soft curls of the maid grave-rats had made their nests, and the worm trailed his slime over the once smooth bright cheek, but now the flesh had shrunk, and bones and yellow skin alone remained. Stephano groaned and covered his face, but Fabricio laughed and said:

"Aye, this may be—and shall. These ages have passed also over Wisdom and her chosen ones; behold them!"

And Stephano saw them with fresh hues on their countenances and with buoyant limbs, and they soared over the earth on the rainbow clouds of evening, and smiled sadly on the world's toiling crowds beneath them; triumphant music floated round them, and light encompassed them, and thus the brilliant scene swept by; the clouds rolled away, and again the altar and Fate.

"Approach and write thy name for Love or Wisdom."

But Stephano said—"I will yet consider; give me now an amulet to guard my steps."

Fabricio opened one of the cabinets and gave him a small ruby vase sealed with gold and suspended to a costly chain. "It contains life and happiness for the pure-hearted; shouldst thou determine for Wisdom, open and drink, and immortality will be thine, but beware to taste if thy heart is not firm."

Stephano promised obedience, and reverently hung the chain around his neck.

"And now," said Fabricio, "thy trial comes, ascend the steps to your right; in the room to which they lead you must pass the night. You have boasted of strength and courage—you will need them, nerve thyself;" and he left the room.

The youth stood as if spell-bound,—the low wind moaned without and the wild forms on the tapestry oscillated to the sound, their faces now glaring in the many-colored flames above, now lost in the rich folds which surrounded them. Those on the ceiling looked fixedly down and moved not, save one whose body lay an undistinguishable mass of shadow and darkness, whilst the demoniacal visage now darkened with malignity, or brightened with beauty.* As Stephano gazed upon it, the face came nearer and nearer his own, till he heard the monster's breathing; fold after fold of that strange mass uncoiled, but still its shape was unknown.

* This image actually presented itself in a dream to the author when a child.

The dark eyes, and they were fearfully black, gazed into his own, and a voice whispered—

"Away slave and choose thy master."

From the serpent-like form a hand protruded, and pointing to the stairs, it slowly returned to its place, still keeping its eyes riveted on Stephano. Mechanically he obeyed the command, and mounting the steps entered a small chamber containing a bed and a chair. Through a sky-light the starry heavens were visible. A small silver lamp was fixed against the wall opposite his bed. Stephano threw himself on his simple couch; hour after hour passed, but sleep came not to his excited mind. The lamp still burnt, but more dimly, and the cavalier lay watching with earnest thought the stars as they slowly passed above him.

Suddenly dark clouds obscured them, a furious storm arose, the angry waves lashed the shore with loud roarings, and the howling winds replied. Fierce lightnings blazed amidst the murky darkness, and loud thunders rolled deep and long through the echoing heaven. The tower shook fearfully, and amidst the horrid din the lurid lightning revealed wild forms flitting around Stephano, glaring on him with flaming eyes, whilst demoniacal shrieks and mocking laughter froze his blood with horror. And amidst them stood the shapeless monster motionless, with fixed eyes and scornful malignity on its countenance. Gradually the storm subsided as the sound of far-off music filled the air. The tones were mournful but sweet, and the youth's soul was ravished with delight.

"Stephano," said a soft voice, and looking up he beheld the radiant face of Wisdom.

"Fear not," she continued, "the spirits and demons that hover round thee, they surround the portals of my temple, and those who yield to fear of their power are lost. The talisman thou hast will shield thee from them till thou shalt decide to become my follower; then thou wilt no longer need it; immortality will be thine and untold bliss through countless ages. Keep this scroll, and when thou renouncest thy weakness, love, a spirit that watches over thee shall appear and guide thee to me."

The vision vanished, and lulled by the receding music the exhausted cavalier sunk into a deep repose. The morning sun was shining in brightly upon him when he awoke, and he hastily arose. He turned to seek the door by which he had entered the preceding night, but only a bare wall appeared. A flight of steps that led down to the ground, outside his apartment, was the only means of egress he could discover. After descending, he entered the tower by the outer door, but looked in vain for Fabricio and the room in which he left him, climbed the steep stairs, eagerly scanning the thick walls even to the top, to detect door or aperture, and looked out on the blue sea, but all was still and desolate around. He descended and again examined around with every step he took, but the rough bare walls of a rude circular tower alone met his eye. Not a trace of the past night's scene could he discern. Twice he was startled by the sound of mocking laughter, but after a scrutinizing search, he deemed it the effect of his excited mind, and with reluctant steps sought the shore. The sea stretched between him and the city, and Stephano gazed earnestly around, but not a gondola was near.

At length he descried a fisherman some little distance off and beckoned to him, but the man crossed himself, and seemed loath to obey his signal. Stephano held up his purse, and as its gold-filled meshes glittered in the sunbeams, the fisherman seemed reassured, and hoisting his tiny sail and taking his oars, soon came within hailing distance. Here, however, he stopped and parleyed with the cavalier.

"Who art thou, stranger, man or demon?"

"A man and a Christian, good fisherman, who would fain be within fair Venice."

"What dost thou on the island of Triptolemus if thou art a Christian?" and again he crossed himself.

"I am here for no evil, good fisherman, fear me not, take me to Venice and this purse is thine."

"I will take thee to the city, sir cavalier, if thou wilt come to me."

"Come to thee! how, good man?"

"Canst thou not swim?"

"Yes, but it would be easier, better far, for you to run your boat ashore."

"The Blessed Mother protect me! I cannot touch the island, 'tis accurst."

"Then at least draw nearer."

After some hesitation, the fisherman consented and cast anchor about an hundred yards from the isle, but not a rod farther would he come, and Stephano throwing himself into the water swam to the boat, whilst the pious Antonio muttered Amen on his knees.

"Why is the isle accurst, good Antonio?"

"Years ago there lived in Venice a noble and beautiful lady who was beloved by an enemy of her house—she scorned his love, and one night he seized her from her father's gondola and bore her off to this island—her shrieks aroused those around, and they followed after him—his gondola was swift and he reached the island first, they saw him land and enter the lone tower and followed quickly, but not a trace of them was seen—often afterwards he was seen in Venice, in the night, but always eluded pursuit, though once again they tracked him to the isle:—searching availed nothing; they found him not, though they saw him enter the tower as before. Since that fatal night, it has been accurst, and often as we pass it after night, shrieks are heard, and glancing lights seen: no Venetian will touch there now—thou art a stranger!"

"Yes," said Stephano,—but they had reached the city, and he gladly landed, for he wished not to be questioned by Antonio, who still looked suspiciously on him. Antonio devoutly crossed himself and pushed out again into the sea.

"What strange fish hast thou caught to-day, good Antonio," said a fellow-laborer who was lazily spreading his net, when he saw Antonio land Stephano, "hast thou turned thy craft to a gondola and thrown away thy net?"

"Nay, Filipetto, I know not who, or what yon cavalier is, I took him from the isle of Triptolemus, and he gave me this," and Antonio held up the heavy purse.

"The accurst isle, Antonio! how couldst thou dare to touch it?"

"I did not, I cast anchor, and made him swim."

"Thou art a cunning one, and did he give thee all in that purse?"

"Aye, and willingly."

"Well—thou art lucky, Antonio, thou wilt fish no more now."

"I am going now to cast my net; come on, Filipetto, I will help thee to-day?"

"Thanks—but Antonio, what thinkest thou of this stranger—what said he?"

"He said he was a Christian, he spoke no evil, and he gave me this. The devil brings not heavy purses; now, art thou content Filipetto?"

"A Christian! Why then in such an evil place! the accurst isle!"

"I know not, nor care," said Antonio sulkily.

"But would it not be well to tell it to the Ten?"

"Thou art worse than a Turkish dog, Filipetto, why, wouldst thou harm a stranger who has never wronged thee? Shame on thee!"

Scarcely had the boat in which Antonio and Stephano were seated left the shore half a league, when a door on the inner side of the tower flew suddenly open. It led to the magic room in which Fabricio had left Stephano the previous night, which was built in the thick walls of the tower. The door which opened with a spring, was a slab of rough stone on the outer side, and fitted so smoothly into the circular wall, that it was impossible to detect it. From this Fabricio and Eccelino emerged and ascended to the top of the tower.

"See yon foolish dreamer!" said the latter, "he little knows into what danger his wild fancies have led him."

"It is hard, Signor Eccelino, that one should die for indulging so innocent a pastime."

A smile curled the lip of Eccelino.

"He is in my path, I wish not his death, but I must remove him; but dost thou repent of thy service to me? Here, take this bag of gold and go, forget thou hast a conscience."

"Thanks most generous Count."

"Nay, thrice its value is thine when thou shalt secure me all I wish. Away now to Ferrara and entangle the lovely princess and her haughty father, and our task is done."

"And you?"—

"I will to Venice with my proofs of Colonna's dealing with forbidden powers for the council. He will surely wend his way to Ferrara, watch him well, and thou shalt see Fabricio that I am a greater magician than thou. The fear of his own death will cause him to relinquish the love thy powerful temptations could not shake," said Eccelino with a smile.

"And wilt thou give him choice of death or Leonore?" eagerly asked Fabricio, as his countenance brightened.

"Nay, I offer nothing, nor reveal myself to him, the council may do that, or condemn with few words from any, as is their wont," answered he carelessly,—“but let us go,” and descending, they walked to the opposite shore where a gondola was waiting.

CHAPTER IV.

The full moon shone down on a noble palace and beautiful garden in Ferrara. Wreathes of light clouds, pure and graceful as a bridal veil, lay on the azure sky above and below her bright free path, but not one swept over her radiant face. Onward she careered in majestic beauty through the wide sky, and shed down a softened glory on the beautiful scene below that lofty arch. On the Eastern side of the palace was a high tower used as an observatory. It was surmounted by a balcony of stone work, which on this night was occupied by Leonore and a young girl about her own age. Leonore was leaning against the railing and gazing on the glorious heavens above, but Fidele's little hands were clasped on the top of the balustrade, and her soft eyes rested on the moonlight garden and river beneath them. Thus they stood in silent contemplation, which was broken by Leonore's exclaiming, "Look, Fidele; Oh! is it not beautiful?"

Fidele raised her eyes and saw a brilliant meteor rushing from the zenith to the horizon, leaving a train of light in its path.

"It started near that beautiful star on which I was gazing," continued Leonore, "and for a moment I thought it had left its high station in the sky, but see, it still shines calmly, gloriously on, and the meteor is gone. Ah! Fidele, they remind me of many spirits. All might be like yonder star in its exalted steady course, but how few emulate it; the meteor's path and end are the fate of most. Their course is ever earthward, and when they might commune with the mysteries of higher natures and worlds, they turn coldly away and waste the fleeting hours on the pitiful toys of the world's pleasure. Oh! it is wearisome, wearisome to dwell with such!"

"Ah! my own cousin, what wouldst thou? Surely, there is much of pleasant excitement and exquisite joy in this world you so much deride, and what gain you by these high and mystic communings of yours?"

"What do I gain? whole ages of bliss you can never feel, Fidele—but you can not understand me, and my words but provoke your mirth," she added as she saw the smile playing around Fidele's dimpled and rosy mouth, whilst a shade of sorrow mingled with impatience passed across her own proud countenance.

"At least, enough to love you, Leonore, though I confess you are often like a dream-spirit to me, and I would you were more joyous and like myself. Is it not better far, dearest, to twine the blushing roses, wet with dew, amidst our curls, and bound over the fresh and sun-bright earth, with hearts light as the butterflies that dance around us, and then, with merry carols and glowing cheeks, turn to our employments within the quiet of our home, than to stand beneath the pale moonbeams so sad and cold, and watch the silent and far-off stars, and hear wild tones in every wind. Oh! Leonore, life is beautiful, beautiful, but it is the life of the bright and cheerful day, and the buoyant careless heart. Life where the warm sunbeams fall on cottager and king alike—life with such glory as crowns the high mountain with a glittering halo, yet forgets not to send a ray of warmth into the heart of the hidden wild flower that lurks beneath broad leaves and shadowing rocks: such be ever mine!"

"And such the meanest serf may call his own, aye, the senseless brute, and shall not a being gifted with nobler powers seek loftier communion? Your life is scarcely worthy the name, it is mere existence; what do you enjoy of which the insect may not in as high a degree partake?"

"No, no, Leonore, the insect simply lives, whilst I live and enjoy the consciousness of its existence, and of the thousand forms of life that fill the earth; I delight in their sports, and mourn when they die. I see the beautiful bird that fills my soul with pleasure by its song, whilst your starry music is not even heard in truth, and is but the delusion of a wild fancy."

"Ah! say not so, you heed it not, and its soft tones pass by you, but I have heard it, and oh! it is sweet but to dream of a nobler destiny, even if it may never be mine—but is it all a dream?"

"No, no, Fidele, I've felt too oft as now,
The spell of higher spirits on my soul.
Beneath a starry heaven, at night's lone noon,
Sweet spirit-voices from yon radiant homes
Have told in music of those blissful worlds;
And like a prisoned bird my heart has striven,
And with the wailing winds I've sadly wept,
When on they passed and left me lone on earth.
In tempest hours I've heard the demons shriek
And seen the shadow of their sable wings,

And felt their hot breath on my pallid cheek;
Whilst the lightning, wild stenographer, wrote
Strange hieroglyphics on the clouds of wrath.
When murmuring wavelets broke on silver sands,
I've listed spirits, in each wreathed shell,
Echo their gentle plaint, as back they rolled;
And all have told me purer souls pervade
Each portion of this world so fair to view,
And shall we not communion seek with these?"
